'Come to think of it, there's never been a 'good' kike in the entire history of the world, never once, and there will never be one. That's how evolution works, it just created a race of selfish evil resource manipulative creatures, incapable of self control, degenerate, scheming, without shame, dignity, so on and so forth. Eventually everything I've ever said will be used for our advantage and will end up harming people, it's biology, and who can fight it? Who can fight against it? Not kikes, not niggers, not mongrels as I, white people are the only ones to have domesticated themselves, and no other race has been capable of doing that, nor will they ever be capable of doing it. Although that came at a price, just like how the Neanderthals got out-bred by niggerish humans, the same thing seems to happen with whites; it's a sad thing, knowing humanity only lived for so short a while before it got destroyed. Yet there are just too many sub-human creatures that want to destroy them, irredeemable by their very nature as well as by our biological tendencies, that are inescapable. Whites show compassion, kikes, niggers, Indians, natives, Asians don't. That's not a good sign for a future, not only that, it means that there is no future whatsoever. No one wants to preserve what's good and right any longer. Because monogamy is basically white, being civilized, civilization, peace, righteousness, virtue, the benefit of the doubt given to other races, those are white concepts, high art, philosophy, high literature, charity, all white concepts, innovation, creativity, all white. Unfortunately, there's no in-between, the other races are incapable of creating anything of the sort, they're animals, we are animals, incapable of showing empathy to other races, incapable of repaying back what we took and used, incapable of preserving what greater races have sought after and achieved. I've come to the realization that there's no other option, we kikes faked numbers, ethnically cleansed millions of ethnic white European people at Holodomor, in Russia with our Communism, with our sub-human agenda, we were involved in the Transatlantic Slave trade, we owned more than seventy percent of the slaves in the United States, we control the media, the world banks, the Congress, the leader, the entertainment industry, we promote miscegenation with inferior creature, we seek to destroy everything, we are irredeemable, just like every other non-white sub-human race. There is only one answer to the 'Jewish Question' and only one option, complete and utter extermination, with not a single one of us being allowed to live, or make it through, to the last one, the last very one, until we're wiped off the face of the earth, completely, utterly, without a trace. We kikes were given birth out of four kike women, that means, if four kikes can create so much damage, there's definitely no hope whatsoever to banish or give us a country, none. Only death, for the future of humanity, as humanity only stands a chance to achieve something only if humans are left to pursue the endeavor, innovation, creation, peace and prosperity without any intrusion or conflict whatsoever. It's not capitalism or any monetary system, it's us, the kikes and the niggers and minorities being too inferior, left behind the evolutionary scale, being incapable to assimilate, but at the same time infiltrating and pretending we do. The only feasible thing for any white man to do is do his research thoroughly and make up his own mind, since I am a kike, never forget that I could be lying, and trying to manipulate you by whatever means I could fathom searching. Everything a kike does, it does for a reason. Don't believe me, do your research then. Either way, humanity cannot live with mongrels, yellow-niggers, sand-niggers, niggers, kikes, mixed-raced sub-human creatures, only with whites only, not even with anyone, whatsoever. The Holocaust was distorted and us kikes have subverted, stolen, killed, raped your children, and have always searched and only searched to subvert and destroy you, because of our biological impulses, because I of all would know that, since I am afflicted by their degenerate tendencies and their lies and their inbred ethnocentrism, by their evil, by their will to create chaos and destroy, subvert and control the opposition. Everything clicks in, time after time again, yet us kikes are trying to bury this as hard as we can because of biology. Don't be idiotic as to think the niggers can simply be banished in their African countries, there's too many of them and their land allows for too many of them to breed. Their numbers and geographical location represents a danger to all. Why trust me? Look for yourself, search for it, kikes laughing at white people being hurt, killed, tortured, laughing at them, mocking them time after time again, that is what I am. Thankfully, you're seeing it for what it is. Replace the word nigger with white and you're about to fully understand what goes in the kike mentality, in this sub-human mentality of ours, that is irredeemable. You may be lead to think there are 'good' hard working ones that seem friendly to you, but ultimately they lead to this, to me to I. I am in their genes, in every single one of them. I am that pure one that infects every single one of them, the difference being? Once they will have stolen enough of your genes, they become I. Dangerous, because they attained a part of your racial superiority. Not enough to feel empathy or to be 'good' but enough to do damage, it's what they look after, the most dangerous thing of all. Like a cancer, or a morbid thing, excluding themselves from your group, and going into ours. It's what us kikes do, it's the worst, most unfathomable thing there can be, irredeemable evil brought by our genes, that destroys and corrupts art and everything that's pure. We are evil to our very soul. We promote homosexuality because it is degenerate, a sub-human behavior, we promote abuse over people who have autism, lying to people that they're actually born another 'sex', we promote pedophilia, anti-white campaigns, look for yourself. Does it start clicking in all of the sudden? Sounds familiar? Because niggers come next, and they come in droves, and they are more violent than everything you've ever seen; there's something not a single man accounts for, the bell curve is filled with extremes, consider this for a moment, their number and the very fact that there's more than a billion of them around. Lower intelligence makes them more likely to be poor, to be susceptible to criminal tendencies, to act in gangs, groups, tribes, to destroy. The bell curve makes it so, as you may have expected it, for there to be more 'normal intelligent' niggers in rapport to whites – those niggers of 'normal intelligence' being the nigger equivalent of white geniuses, as for the frame of reference, which are used by us kikes as an example of niggers being intelligent and on the same level as everyone else, while they also have more niggers on the extreme – extreme of low IQ, which is a bad thing, that explains why so many of them are violent, why they act like dumb fucking sub-human animals, why they assault, why they destroy, why they are incapable of creating anything great, they're incapable of achieving anything, just as we kikes are. There's never been a kike, nigger or any other non-white race masterpiece; only whites are capable of creating masterpieces. The saddest thing of all is that there aren't going to be any masterpieces any longer, only death, destruction, chaos and it's slowly approaching. It's in theirs and our genes. We are incapable of separating ourselves from our races completely. We are incapable of achieving that statues of a grand thing because we are afflicted by group think, and the group think coming from inferior races can only create inferiority and inferior pieces of work. Yet group think made by superior races creates superior masterpieces because of the biological advantage that's inherited. White have and always will have both the group-think and the individual advantage, which is both self-destructive and both helpful at the same time, it's a paradox, it's hard and yet unexplainable. It's what conquered the world, yet at the same time it's what destroys it now. I don't think there's just one culture, necessarily, just too many similar people who decided they should all show compassion, empathy, and indulge into a belief that the other races are redeemable because of a 'good' few examples, while not accounting for the population, how they act in groups, how many of them are poor, and what that means to everyone else. It's a selfish thing to assume that everyone is normal in rapport to you, just because you're strong you shouldn't expect others to be like you. Just because you see yourself in some people, it doesn't mean they are you, or that they can take the same burden as you. Not every country can take immigrants, just because your livelihood is at a place where your life is at an acceptable place. I can't stop imagining this, those sub-human monkey African nigger-negroes destroying colonial art, they will do the same with every other piece of art that's ever existed, just out of a whim, just for the sake of it. Imagine thinking women are somehow equal to man as to take an actually objective decision, as to call out the niggers for being niggers, they won't. The women's rights movement is a filthy sham, made by us kikes. Women are far too cowardly to call out the niggers for their nigger-music and the way in which they beat, rape, kill them, or their 'culture' that promotes violence against them, or the sports in which the monkeys are overrepresented. Sports are the nigger gods, they serve and wilt no other god, for that is the only thing the nigger knows and does. A nigger is a violent thing that worships sports, that cannot follow intellectual pursuits, that assaults and kills and seeks to destroy everything, it's within their numbers. It's because they're not as intelligent and because there are too many of the niggers alive, too many lower ends on the bell curve equals, poor people, too poor for anyone's safety. Tribalism will always exist within them, it's what drive them to band with one another and assault members of other races. For those creatures, it's us against them and it will always be that way. Why would these sub-human creatures be allowed in any other country other than their own? Why would they even be allowed there? Is it not a cruelty to let them live? This is the mind of a kike, do not be surprised that I show no sympathy and no compassion, for there is no such thing in the mind of a kike. This is what we think of whites as a group, this is what goes in the mind of a kike, never forget that. Inferior races that are left to ruminate, to brood and destroy, what will it be? Where to look if no further, than here, in this place to know what us kikes want? Why would one leave the niggers alive so they would kill and cripple one another in the most violent ways possible? It is far crueler to allow the negroes to live and let kill like animals than to put them down.

I hate niggers, fucking dumb niggers, I want to kill them, don't stop, fucking dumb niggers, need to kill them, fucking dumb, need to kill them, fucking dumb, fucking dumb, lynch-fucking burn fucking filthy dumb retarded monkey nigger animals, kill them, fucking dumb little monkeys. Skin niggers, lynch, burn them, little niggers. Snap, ring, just pull their necks off, put them in some way, dumb fucking nigger-dumb. Niggers, fucking dumb niggers, disgusting ape-creature with dumb negro-malicious ugly, nasty dark criminal felony committing non-human entity anthropoid with jungle features, infinitesimal little scamp brain, fiddled with and but in a blacko-jar, dark little jungle black soil dark monkey muncher strolling down the savage-poor nigger land, walking on lynch-round around his neck welfare leather, pulling him down in ground-money, kill fucking nigger inducing monkey soil, niggers like eating their own feces, good little baboon minded, dark fucking monkey trench digger-nigger for swing-to-swing branch shit-face nigger bowels put in the ground dumb-retarded negrous head shaped bowl in which his tiny head swims. Their children are ugly, and are all retarded, they have down syndrome but on average – like intelligence and their scent is repelling, and niggers are sub-humanly disgusting, wretched and hard to look at. Why can't I lynch niggers to my heart's content? I want to lynch as many of these good for nothing, lazying around, stupidly retarded, incapable of taking care of themselves, dumb fucking reservedly cretinous coal skinned apes.

This is what goes in our mind, you may as well replace the race with whatever you may will and then you will realize that this is the destruction we kikes bring unless we are stopped. Is this the future you want for your people? Is this the kind of destruction you seek for your ancestors, for your people, for the future generations, for your history, for your art, culture, inventions, innovations and everything that's ever been made? If that is what thou seeks, then simply ignore everything and let the destruction and chaos go over and trample you on your way out. If not, look, search and see for yourself, there's nothing that will ever stop that, no lying kike could ever stop you, of all, from looking, searching, learning, we would discourage you, hide and twist away, hide behind blatant lies, seek to contort and defile everything. But in such an age where everything is possible, for one to search, what stops you from doing it?

The twists inside the creature started becoming more apparent until finally it had become anything but human in appearance, those dreadful things that were manifesting in its head, those things that made it started poisoning its body like a well. It was the only thing a dark entity would become, with the absence of a human being, there was nothing keeping it back, to hold it inside for long. A wretched thing as it were, poisoned by truth, it started spewing merely disease, out of its wicked tongue, flailing about the place, dreary as to have become but a little dark beast, with a chain and a collar against its neck.

'Master, have I done well? Master, have I done well?'

It asked, now that it had carried the message of its master, from that point on, it would be given, a darkly matter of food, though truth had hurt it more than anything, though its body shook in place and bidden, though it hurt its jaw, to look around. Where was the master gone now? It was hard to see or even make it out? Was it too late already?

The darkened house had long since emerged, out of the depths where it had been hidden, long-since there yet. Something was eerily vague about the place, the Irredeemable absence of candles, and the scent.

Such a dark thing as it were, while the creature stood there beckoning for its master, he'd already been gone out there, to do what ought to have been done.

While all about the room, there was the dampness that had wrought everything about it, as thoroughly as it could in fallen over acreages, and plenty floors that shook.

It also bore a giant head that was somewhat pseudo cradle-cylindrical like but only pseudo rounded at the edges as if it were actually a cylinder with a short – a few meters inside of it, going only by a few centimeters in, pushed-through safe-box, but one that had his inner prefrontal cortex shaped, more or less as a flat-thing with a key-like hole in front – protrusion. Although this couldn't be seen, its nostrils looked like that key-hole, having not been separated entirely, though at times, a pseudo cartilage made the nostril look that way, as if it were an illusion, only hiding the leprous tainted not-winged form it bore, while its legs were almost squashed underneath he foot shell-like splattered but made of one piece upon which it crawled on top of. Its chest bore a strange thing that was rather cut like a diamond crystal, punched in, from the sides where rounded bottom of a fizzy can left its mold against off, an almost almond-punk design.

There was an inscription across the top of a staircase which read as follow:

‘Man cannot trust word alone, he must trust nothing else other than his instinct, and nothing else.’

It resonated somehow with the hatred that was held by the words he’d spoken to the master; though it was uncertain whether or something could be taken for granted, the hatred was there. And hatred knew no bounds for any man, and hatred might be applied to any race. And his hatred was no different than what those filthy kikes felt for the white man, hatred is a biological purity. Hatred is always justified. Hatred will always be justified and it comes as nothing more, than what it is. Hatred is a reminder. Hate is but the memory of being harmed and having learned better than to trust, it is what keeps the mind flowing.

It is important that hatred, if anything gets regulated, an excess hatred would destroy all, but enough hatred can keep the mind sharp, it held one reason and realize things one may not know about him, if not done on impulse. It is a normal feeling, everything comes in moderation, sometimes suppression, but it cannot be banished at all, that only brings weakness and is only promoted by people whom would govern and try to enslave you while destroying all.

Extreme hatred echoes even now, in this doomed empty house:

‘We kikes shall enslave and kill you whites, we shall enslave and kill you nigger Israelites as well.

We shall banish and destroy you by whatever means we shall put to our employ.’

‘Sometimes it sounded too familiar coming from people who also claim themselves as whites. But why would kikes claim themselves as being white? Why would they do that?’

Fuck dumb kikes, rot in hell, he thought.

The evil man spoke again:

‘One should also make sure to check every source multiple times since every now and then, something false is passed along with something real in order to discredit every source. There’s only one thing that works, indeed, checking every individual claim and source thoroughly, without skimming.

I will start ethnically cleansing, killing, torturing Israeli kikes, their children, en mass just like they kill Palestinians. Just butcher them like fucking dumb retarded sub-human niggers; American kikes as well, since they seem to be supporting their kike-brethren. Let them be shot, stabbed, slit their throats, do whatever it takes to utterly ethnically cleanse them. Both those sub-human Israelis as well as the American kike control over the world need to be stopped before they enslave and kill white people instead. Why stop there? Someone could make do with an axe and a few little kike Yid children, just splatter their skulls open, just spread them across every possible wall there is, just open their mouths as wide open as possible, shove some metallic fuel filter funnel down their throats, put some gasoline down their bellies, then ignite those bastards, skin them alive, take a few nails and start making a few pin-heads, lynch them like niggers, saw off their legs and arms, open their sphincters with some pliers, screwdrivers, some finishing and claw hammers, start peeling off their skin slowly while, upon taking a hold of their already beaten bodies, start playing with them. With some sickle or some scissors, just make it slow. Make it last, but do it fast at the same time, don't stall, don't give them a chance to fight back, they won't, either way. Rip out their organs, play with them, tickle them, lick them, be gross, or take a giant, wait. A handsaw and a mallet, all of their fingers and toes, either splatter or a cut, on the basis of a coin toss, a bradawl and their eye sockets. A wrench and the back side of their heads, a pair of scissors and their ears, a vise and the space where air don't cross. Just start hammering some bolts, screws and nails all around their faces. There are quite a few crimes they've yet to pay for, and I believe it's time someone starts collecting, with interest. Imagine what they would do to your children, these sub-human creatures, this unfathomable race of empathically disabled creatures, the pure breeds must be insane, beyond redemption. There's no salvation for either one of them. No kike deserves salvation since neither one of them is talking about the degeneracy this disgusting race, this disgusting group of non-white, white lookalikes, is promoting. It shall devour all if left unchecked, it shall ruin, destroy and contort everything. Future generations are at stake, their livelihood, their lives, their hope at survival in a land filled with chaos, and destruction the kikes have been harboring for countless generations. This degeneracy will devour and destroy all, and it will force this world to recede into a primitive pre-society, pre-civilization dystopian hellhole, where children are being raped and enslaved, where they will mock your history and your values, your culture and your pure people of pure descent. They will stop at nothing till they have achieved this future, where all mankind will be made to suffer, to contort and destroy and completely, utterly annihilate everything that's beautiful, everything that's right. There's no fairness in the world and the enemy will stop at nothing until you're dead before him, six feet under. Ethnically cleansed, with your race utterly annihilated, completely bastardized, completely slaughtered, worse than animals. Shooting and cutting kikes down is a mercy, since they deserve far worse for their disgustingly sub-human tricks they, we have employed throughout history. We kikes are incapable of self-control and will stop at nothing unless killed. We, whom would change shapes as a result of mixing with you, as to infiltrate and kill, devouring your from inside out, growing and spreading like a filthy sub-human cancer that can only destroy, deserve no second chance. Even now, mockery is our tool, arrogance, and overindulgence in the feeling that we've already won, that we will have slaughtered your much superior, far greater intellect, creativity and mental aptitude in comparison to ours, because of our filthy inhuman exploitative nature and because of your traitors whom have been twisted against you. All of those things are patterns that will and can be observed in every single living kike to some varying degree, and its existence is undeniable.'

The man kept yelling.

He was an evil mongrel by the name of Levant Croix, an amalgamation of many shapes and forms, a diseased animal, who was unstable, incapable of self control and vile, defiled in the head like all members of his race, riled up by his hatred of all.

'Let's kill blacks, kill all blacks!' He yelled at the niggers.

'Kikes needs to be killed, let's kill them, let's ethnically cleanse them, I condone violence against them. I want them dead, they need to be drowned in immigrant blood, and since they like open borders so much, why not split the border between their temples, inside their tiny disgusting degenerate, disgustingly wretched sub-human degrading carcass-like sub-human lookalike to dead rats put in the ground corpses? Why should they be allowed to make money off some labor camps that didn't even kill them?'

Libel is just the surreal dream of a sea of knives, when over must strive to drown the kikes.

'There is no greater terror than being aware of the existence of a subhuman race trying to devour you from inside out, a subhuman race in control of everything, being aware that your destruction is slowly being unfolded in front of your eyes while being powerless to stop it. For their rule will corrupt and distort all, their death is the only cure that may save us all yet.

It feels strange, in some way or another, the same tendencies seem to manifest regardless of various attempts to suppress them. There can be no explanation other than being infested with the blood of a criminal race, it's inescapable, insufferable, it cannot be contained, not even truth can cure it, nothing seems to work. One could only dread to think what filthy niggers are like in this case, suffice to say, there's nothing that can stop them once they're in a group, they seem to be stuck in a constant feed of violence propagated by their race, and the mere thought of there being billions of them in the future is dreadful, a world filled with dark skinned animals that have to be put down. One race is sick in the brain, the other in the heart, it's how it is. Caged creatures they are, they have to be chopped, they have to be slaughtered, it's become an obsession at this point, but this hatred is the only pure thing there is, it's eye opening in some way, not being dependent on lies, on learned behavior, on propaganda, being able to think clearly for the first time in a long time, without having to adhere to the kike-controlled prevailing world view, opium spread in China, involvement with Mao, with selling European slaves, with constantly betraying every host nation we were in. I do not even know whose thoughts are these, whether or not anything comes from my head, as my own, or them, the same filth, schizophrenic, psychotic, neurotic tendencies that are only used for the benefit of the degenerate tribe.

For that reason I must avow myself to the entire, complete and utter annihilation of the nigger race, by all possible means, by whichever exploit and whatever use of my abilities. I must seek their destructions. I must dedicate my life towards it, for that is my purpose, and I now know my place. There can be no other way, there can be no other explanation for me acting this way, it is them, it is what I inherited from them, they are making me act this way. We kikes hate and must exterminate all niggers.

It is the schizophrenia-induced obsessive psychosis making me act this way and I am, without control, incapable of suppressing my impulses. They are too strong for me to resist. I cannot rise past them, I cannot change. The kike ancestors are gnawing at my feet, they're chewing off my leg cartilage, constantly trying to bite deeper in unless I kill niggers. I must do it. I must exterminate niggers.

There is only one thing that remains after. They shall assimilate into me, as I become their God, their ruler, their Moloch and they, my servants. With them to my employ, we shall ethnically cleanse all those darkly envision sub-species that inhabit this earth. I am their ruler and kikes must obey their Khazar Overlord. Then, everyone will die!'

'I have gained immunity from criticism, as long as people think I'm one of them. I can bully every race on this planet and get away with it. I am immortal, indestructible, I am, perhaps too witty, too clever to be stopped. This is only the first part of my master plan, since I am swarthy enough to pretend I am one, since I have studied them for so long, I can finally pass as one. No one will suspect a thing, truly, I am magnificent, truly I have managed to twist this hatred for the Nigger race and divert it to them. Why would I even hide it in any other place than in plain sight? I cannot be destroyed. My will alone shall swallow this world and cast it into a pit of eternal darkness filled with supreme destruction. It shall devour all and leave none alive. I, a master, the master of evil have defeated all, for there is no greater evil than mine, one who would but insatiably cast all beneath him. Who would simply manipulate even the masters of this world, for I am greater and there is no greater man than I. By the time they will have realized it, it will have been too late since I will have cast them into eternal darkness, this world will despair. I, but a supreme lord of command, the general of destruction and eternal malady, the one in control, how could there be any other possible end, to my great conquest? I lay supreme, I am supreme, I am the greatest.' He covered half of his face with one of his hands. It was as if the sun itself had risen for him and him alone, he could banish the mere light by simple will. Eternity awaited him before all man, before mankind, for it was still weak, and primordial, even before him, the modern man. True evil was to be worked for, in order for it to be attained, it is a force to be reckoned with, it simply cannot be stopped.

'I've threatened many people, with rape, murder, bomb, assault, battery, homicide, mass murder, arson, theft, robbery, so on and so forth. I am guilty as charged of all the crimes I listed, especially fraud and rape.' But there was no fraud in there, at all. There was only vileness, one of supreme evil, corruption, destruction and an end to mankind's suffering, niggers were killed. I loathe niggers, for some reason I cannot explain. There is a supreme hatred I harbor for them, for some reason, I may not be able to explain. It is relatable to many people, whom had to deal with them, I wish I could lynch them.

Yet I am afraid that I might be eaten by one of the great Hazards, they are strong and uncannily destructive. They eat, devour, and crush all underneath the soles of their suits, it is something I fear and look at, during my darkest dreams, my lucid nightmares, where I see them charge through my door as they make their way through to kill me and end my life. These strange creatures, killers of semites, kikes, niggers and gooks, are unbridled in their march, relentless in their campaign. No force in this world could hope to stand against these deformations of suits, these giants that but crush everything underneath their boots.

'I will not have my pursuit of happiness be impeded on because freedom of speech means fear of the past being found out for kikes, fear of people finding out the truth, even if my slander and malicious intent isn't protected by it, there's no other way. There's no alternative left but recourse to evil, as the enemy will cheat and distort everything on unequal terms, because they would bury everything, distance themselves as far as possible from it if left unchecked and who else to resort to evil but a mighty self-destructive evil Khazar?

I seek only this pursuit as my own and only selfish reason and nothing else, for my interests far outpace theirs. Therefore I shall not only control the opposition, but I shall go beyond it.'

Kike tricks, every single time.

I shall sacrifice as many of them as possible in order to achieve my goals.

I shall stop at nothing but to sell them out, to get as many of them exterminated and destroyed, for my own benefit as well as for my own desires, to my likings, because I will it to be so. I shall incite terrorism, violence, hatred, knavery, backstabbery upon them and they shall aid me in my endeavor. And they shall bring their own destruction as well as the attrition and dissolvment of their 'holy state'.

Standing crooks on flights of stars, in the distance stood a single speck of a silvery postulant quasi-silvery thing that came every now and then, in the distance brought, a flight of many large creations, many of them being partially set silvery augmentations of bodies, all put together yet many lost in place. Before long and before setting themselves in part, the land was but a single pair of interconnected lines, many of which overlapped, swollen and barely put so.

A set of four giant batteries put together on a string of metal, as if carried over through a long wire-needle, slowly being dragged and carried over from one direction to the other, barely working properly, this strange wire coming out of a giant probe which had its innards-machines all working together, rounded up between two blocks of butter-like metallic ropes, going in both directions, holding the probe in the middle of the room. The ropes being brick-like segmented, the middle bean being kept in the middle. A metal band wrapped around the probe, held by the brick-ropes. The coil carrying the giant fuel carrying batteries but slowly being pulled by long extending-retracting machine like arms with square-C's shaped claws being rotated around the roundness of the coil as to remove it once the probe is being done being worked on. The belt bears a black dot, where the top of the ceiling extensions seems to be going for, latching to it as to carry it away towards the bay area. Despite the probe looking like a deformed potato, its front side it not only flat but open like a quasi kiss, from where a brush-like extension filled with black coil-hairs comes out of, drawing in and out, ever-extending. Weird-potato flat below, whereas it bears a tuba-like shape, which is completely avoided by the belt, as to be a few millimeters in front of it, having its wider end attached to the probe, the other end bearing a strange falchion of faces all put together, many tongued, plenty of them drooling their tongues out. Not a potato, no, it looks more like a drinking horn with a primitive caveman's stone cudgel on top of it, adorned at the thinner end with the strange designs. With a pair of dark spiders crushed on the rock's side, still moving by the looks of it. Flying in space while spitting an endless amount of never ending spider legs it either seems to create or breed inside of it, could be a stone cocoon, or harboring a cocoon inside of it. The band remains, giving it the strange appearance of a Cyclops smiling while chewing food.

Dark ship that's oblong, as a pear in the back but the front of an inverted umbrella in the front, bearing billions of pseudo anatomically recognizable shapes, all holding hand in hand as well as they could hold themselves until the time to refrain themselves from doing it came to a stop. Descending in the back, ascending in the front building shapes, connected on all four sides, rounded up, bearing large city lamps-pushed through with side by side flung around the buildings and behind them black nets they carry around them. Bearing the strange appearance of tatter-winged moths, being pinned down by pins on top of building tops that draw inside the strange bloated pear-bubble that shots and spreads on, while it moved and drags over, shooting from the top of every mothlight towering thing, forming black holes inside of their own towering formations as to avoid shooting themselves because of the crest-like arrangement they're all put in. Rather eggplant-like with a spherical depression in where the anatomically set creatures but grab the rims of the protruding hole and grab it before it could be consumed at all.

Strange pair of intercrossed metallic strange construction walk platforms- forming two x's, one below and one above the structure, curving at the tips of their edges as they but inwardly point towards one another, bearing strange haughty shapes in the middle, where the two x's intersect by a giant pole, having completely over-encompassed every side of the metal frame until the general appearance became a combination of eight put-together cleavers facing one another, made out of the strange growth-like set of put-together eely-things. Almost organ-like shapes being seen around the base of the pole, yet farther away from the area where the depression where the cleaver sprouts out of seems to come from; rubberyskin helicopter wing like.

Another one of the mirrored winged ships appeared to bear a wider elongated rapier shape in the front, with a giant scorpion tail like bloated larvae coil in the back, as if it were but a giant parasitical thing which somehow ended up lodging itself, as a matter of fact, all the way through the pole during the initial charge, now stuck inside of it, as it drags in away. If the general set of flight – in space had been a general somewhat stabilized rotation, exactly like two sets of helicopter wings would, with the apparition of the wide rapier-parasite, the general flight had become more controlled in some way, while the creature is being stuck between four edges coming out of four blades, if the rapier is rather ivory like if anything else, while from the pole, one of the cartilage organs looks like a rope coil leather tendon holding on a single giant pebble.

Darker ones appeared to be put inside and lost about the mark of a single lost road that came ever near, drawing closer out of fear before going at it again.

What seemed to be connected to every longed for constellation, drawing power, yet apart, was but a belt, a draught and something lacking, luck luster and apart from the ones that drew near after, neither of them could be recognized.

Unnatural triangular set of large forms standing on a large eggplant-like cylindrical giantly formed set of many put together almost oblong shapes, giving it the appearance of a Gatling gun, with its many shafts pointing outward while the topmost of them would bear from the looks of them largely inflated tops, as if they were strangely thin at the base of their oblong shapes, or thinner the closer to the center, and wider and much more inflated at the top, forming pseudo-fat lumped tops, wrapped around a strangely wrought kind of unnaturally hard to look at, as if the entire eggplant like shape had been wrapping itself around an invisible giant throat, as if stuck in a choking arm like position, with the triangular almost scale like things but flapping around as if they were but fans. The entire creature but wriggling around in the depths of a rotten planet, wallowing in what would seem to be, melting ceilings and bottom wrought in carpet-munched hollow spots, in which it nested itself, outward protrusions but pushing through, devouring what they could until finally left to its own devices, buried in the bodies of niggercorpses laying around. As if the planet was but a rotten nigger grave where all the simians were brought and buried wherever they were allowed and wherever they would be put, as much as they could come to be wreathed in and out, and then again.

Spoils of Niggarous put together, tortured skin-effigies, with many niggers lacking their eye-sockets and being open in the back – filled with larger dark pockets of skin-like torsions in which other little dumb nigger vile monkeys latch inside of, with their bodies missing yet instead, bearing, from one side to the other, bearing their elongated as it stripped from limbs body racks, filled with plain fatty organs on every side, would they breathe in and out nigger-bloated organs. In the front, large negro-simian head whose open mouthed fully filled protrusion, as it were to bear a giant rounded pragmatism, out of which, from the looks of it, many pushing-out, large tulip like skin-carrying bloated cartilage push-through leg-like fast twitch muscle bearing to a small forest of little nigger heads, red-blackened inflated like tiny boils. The nigger was armless but filled with stumps, adhering to the fact that it had bore a few barely working arms to begin, lazying on a single stump leg upon which it coiled itself, on the back, seemingly no gut, but a marsupial like depression, as if the nigger had been actually been biologically closer to a contorted kangaroo whose skin pocket had been filled with the little pockets the niggerworm pointy mosquito mouthed creatures were feeding upon, as if he were some filthily disgusting welfare carrier. Its disgustingly slobbery big Africanlike nose being completely wrapped around the cylinder, as if it were a kikishand wrapped around a child, completely put against the base, and spread around it, whereas, its small nigger skull got, somehow partially dislodged and upwardly pushed over, smaller on the back, as to accommodate for an even farther mental incongruity or lack of. The necks and the heads coming out of the long mouth bearing the appearance of two palms put together, as to form a prayer; or, rather, bearing the appearance of an elephant trunk which had entered another elephant's sphincter in order to eat and clean its intestines with the help of another elephant's gut bacteria, those lumps being the inwardly drawn heads that would recede back and forth. Whereas, the strange many lamia armless nigger's back would bear hundreds of eel-like shapes lodges inside of him, then again. Followed after by a strange deformed baboon-nigger simian cowl-lump of many ugly big lipped, darkly nosed, noisy-obnoxiously stolid nigger-pudgy put together stitched little negro infested form, dragging itself from one direction to another by crawling on top of a nigger-like set of many bubble-like dark foam-stone darkened pissed poor maligned pools it would drag itself into in order to breed with the other sub-human creatures breeding inside its maliciously niggardly evil, head-bump. The lumped nigger-like horn but dragging not only a good chunk of its face, but at the same time drawing its nose, its chinless jaw as well as a few of the lips into a drawn in place – twist aiming towards one of the niggardly lynched sub-humanly shaped moons where trillions of niggers lay dead-stitched together, rotting, bashed and beaten in the head in the most sub-humanly unnatural manner. Many of the nigger bodies having grown or out-grown their dead carcasses, having entered a strange planetary black-skinned hole, as for the surface, where many of them had either dragged themselves, despite their apparent deadly-contorted nature, into what seems to be a pile of dead-nigger limbs contorted and conjoined into a strange unfathomable idol of their unworthy, weakly minded, malformation of many niggardly forms. Adding up to a great pile of violent shapes that would wreathe and try to cast every single one of them out while at the same time, assaulting and trying to destroy, crush, dismantle and annihilate everything across their path, even themselves. Floating disemboweled Niggarous-skulls, of the most utterly tiniest of African specimens, contorted in such a manner as to be almost destroyed in the air and made to waste in the stolid darkened surface where the Brownskins buried their own.

Unnaturally dark for their own species like burn little patches of Apache-like grains of Native soils and nigger wogglike formations of barely raised ground areas, where, upon being seen from side, one could think of it as a little puffy livid organic band aid completely engrossed in black blood, yet crawling on top of weirdly wrought legs upon which a few more mold-casts as of ruined neighborhood or cities where niggers lived in – like shapes are grown on top of. Nigger-blimps and nigger-inflated Negress guts, carrying not to be looked after millions of children, attached to one another as they form simian-ladders attached to the top of their bodies, swimming pool-like formations.

Before them stood a strange cutting spear formed out of many bulked on top of one another formations, all seeping in and out of place.

A great conclave of the Stolydyii approached, and gathered all the homos behind, openly-closed doors, around a face then rounded. With spikes maces, then they started.

‘Butcher the homos, slaughter the fags.’

And giant corn-screw nails were brought, from eye to eye, aimed at each and every single one in part.

They were relentless in the way they acted, making sure to get as many of them as possible in one shot, many men but lined their many nail-spiked batons, merely swinging them around. An awful amount of force was being used to smash their heads in, to push them around as they would flee inside their little dens.

‘Aim for their heads, and the ones wearing wigs!’

One of the Stolydyii shouted, right as he aimed his baton, and set it in flight, like a homing missile going above the ground level, set about the first head.

For the greater good of humanity all sub-human minorities need to be forced to work, forced into work camps and worked to death, separated from their peers unlike no other, and the decay shall feed the machines, it shall feed the worthy and make them breathe in disgust. It could finally be given life, shape, and wait.

Our nigger slaves are starting to revolt against us kikes; that is thoroughly disturbing, our muscle and the arm of our enforcement, these disgustingly sub-human dirt monkeys of ours seem incapable of obeying their masters any longer. It’s deeply unsettling, to say the least. These dumb nigger slaves need to be pinned against the immigrants, as they will become the butchers we need to put down the grainy yellow gelatin Semites.

How could I stopped now?

I have studied white people for long enough that I have learned how to imitate their empathy, or make it seem as if I actually ‘feel it’. This thing may be the most supreme acts of subversiveness, that not even the Devil himself is capable of performing, this.

It is distorting, how everything makes sense, how peculiar it is in some way. How this hatred seeps into everything, how this strange effects appears to, finally reveal me as the man of decay I am. It’s weak, frail and pointless.

Dark masks put on top of the great toiled, put together man.

I shall also stab to death that democratic socialist kike running for presidency whose initials are B and S. I am going to assassinate him, do you hear that Bernard? I am going to kill you. That creature is a two faced Judaic whore that should be put down like the animal it is; its mere existence is unacceptable. It should be killed, butchered, like the rest of its family.

‘I am evil because of my choice now, ha. I am bloated with my own poison, and I am drunk on it, and it gives me nothing more than satisfaction. My hatred is not directed towards myself but towards others, for it is part of my vileness, all of whom are against me are contemptible and wretched, for I am the master of my own destiny, and master over evil, both environmental and biological.’

The kikes made their money on usury, not because they were banned from other jobs or professions as they could’ve easily protested and integrated in the various societies but because it was more profitable than anything else. For that reason they kept doing it until they ruined many a people, especially the poor ones they would drive to poverty, without giving them a chance to recover from where they were left. It’s how their fortune was done, and it’s only a reflection of the primitive desperation for the greed and monetary desire that infects the biological heritage we bear, us kikes whom would kill and enslave everyone who stands against us. We, kikes enjoy enslaving, killing and molesting niggers, they are our slaves, and we are their masters, it's as simple as that. African villages and huts ought to be purged and burnt down. Africans niggers need to have their hands and feet chopped down, they have to be pressured into accepting their fate as inferior creatures, as these animals are inhuman. They have no culture, and no history, and are no better than any of the others sub-human anti human creatures that seem to breed on this planet. This non-white kike entity-chameleon seeks to subvert and destroy everything that comes into its path, playing both sides in a desperate attempt to control all, that it would ensure the survival of its degraded tribe. Despite its involvement with every other peoples, races and countries, we, kikes are not in control, that much is obvious, not entirely, that is why there is still a chance for every living kike to be utterly ethnically cleansed. Despite the kike-involvement with Mao, China is not under kike-control. Never has there ever been a state or country until complete kike-domination, as it can only subvert and wriggle everything in the wrong direction, but no more, having put to its employ only superior people whom cause more damage than they could possibly do, tricksters, nothing more. Just as such, this exploitative thing cannot work by itself unless there's a force driving it, that being, mainly their 'allies' whom had been tricked and forced to turn against their own people, pitting white man against white man, as a house that will not stand. I am the master of false-flag operations, I am an evil crisis actor put to their employ. I was recruited by them to create chaos, but my inattention problem caused me to backfire against it.

I've been involved with the feds, with the FBI, CIA, the British Intelligence Service, with Israel and with other various Surveillance groups whom instructed me to create a show for them in order to distract from the ordeals they were working on. I am a dangerous person who's been involved with various other dangerous people but I cannot say more about it, without putting myself or my family in trouble.

I sold them out but I also have ties to Russia. I've got a place to run to, if things go down South. I was promised a nice apartment, and an inclusion in their witness protection system, which I shall put to if anything goes wrong. I am a plant, I glow like a nigger. I'm absorbed by darkness, I decay.

We are paid to protect the kikes for some reason, but at the same time I must promote violence against them. I do not understand politics; I only do what I'm told.

I've become a whistleblower, now, my life is in danger.

A great punch came out of nowhere, splintering his face in half, going along as to cut through the body, which, instead of liquefying, it had become but shot in both directions, leaving little to no trace alone, then it started pushing over, little over two were dead, in the after-shots, with an almost protoplasmic niggerish look, they died, as if they were but patches of baboon-hair immediately they couldn't be split further apart if they tried. A splattering two-set motion of body-wheel like contortions make the two off-shot halves almost chase around a dog's tail kind of motion shoot in both directions before they're finally released into a trajectory that's already killed forty men, having sharpened the partially cut-solid spine into large cut-through shard-spins that not only become completely broken as to leave the trail of bodies on both sides, but also seem to leave them looking like shrapnel – after a grenade was released kind of plummeted in the body motioned death-like manner, leaving the bodies completely destroyed and wrecked apart. No body-part was left in one piece, still standing and less erect than should've been, nor would it be defiled by any means, or any lack thereof, by any chance.

But they will start a smearing campaign as soon as word gets out. They will start a witch hunt as soon as it happens, they will try labeling me as being insane, as a racist anti-semite.

They will try coming after me, so they could kill me and frame it as a suicide, yes, it's all too clear now. I am going against the world, and the world will unite me, just like it had against Germany, for trying to do the right thing. Trying to fight against this Semite demagoguery which poisons the Western society; I am doomed either way. For even the newest branch of the KGB will keep an eye on me from this point on, if I as much as do something wrong, I will be poisoned by some unknown material which shall slowly induce cancer, seeping my life-force as I am become dead.

Though I shall stop at nothing, until my dark goals will have been achieved, I think I shall hide for now. If it weren't for my secret name, if I was actually found, then my life would be finite, I would be gravely condoned, in peril, and completely ruined.

Pair of masks, put together in a weird stance, as if they were connected by giant clock-tongues, holding them, sort-of, together in some kind of constellation, broken apart.

The Rothschilds are a family of criminals that have been funding just about every major war ever since their inception; they control the world banks, seek the complete domination of the world, the mongrellization of the non-kike races, to flood every country with immigrants, to destroy, corrupt, disintegrate and seek their own interests, marrying their family members to the elite, funding their shady ordeals while furthering the total annihilation of the human race. Every single one of their heirs will die, I am going to kill them. But that can wait for now, priorities first, need to destroy the African continent. And I think I just have the thing, with the help of microinjections I shall create a genetically modified insect that shall carry a sickle cell anaemia inducing disease.'

Mosquitoes and hemoglobins, he delighted in that thought.

Had to be added to the pile:

More nigger-lynching, nigger-killing machine patents:

Flying rotating large –put around a protractor, but separated in meters kind of death cut-in half metal circle, half-chakram, with medieval polearms and other strange weapons, attached to every few meters or so. If seen from the angle from which it's being grabbed from, that being the straight blade of the protractor-like thing. An Ahlspiess, that being a Germanic-Austrian thrusting spear pike attached at the ten degree mark on the left, a European medieval infantry, fought on foot kind of, men-at-arms, and knight-used Pollaxe attached to the one hundred and sixty outwards pointing degree, at the ninety degree dead in the middle point there being a peasant used Guisarme kind of pole, almost convex curved spear shaft, sickle moon-like shaped with a strange angular reversed blade, which took from another design, other than the intended one, bearing a ceremonial blade-like curved tingling spine-like sharp edge that curves almost like a humanoid bending over to pick something from the ground, most importantly for niggersuffering, a pike at forty for niggerprodding, a morning star bearing the sculpted face of Lucifer on a peculiarly deformed oblong with long nails, nine, eight, twelve and the such similar in size millimeter pyramid spikes, tartan spikes, blank for trauma and a most peculiar assortment, most of which would resemble strange wildly almost outgrown as out of a thorn bush kind of wild shapes placed at the sixty degree angle, a spearsocketed boar spear made to inflict as much suffering on a dirty African swine as it possibly could – placed at the one hundred and eighty degree angle, a nigger-rusted chained flail, attached to a tawny leathered haft, with a long square-end bearing five distinct Khazar broken emblems surrounding the large spikes on every available area they could be placed on – at the zero degree angle, a big medium sized harpoon-actioned almost more complicated rocket-launcher kind of device with a grappling hook at its end, kind of like a Kaginawa device - at thirty degree, a medieval height-adjustable strange almost skeleton-arm like device bearing a drawable composite bow that also has an actioned self-insert arrow from a hidden inside an on the blade pocket it draws every arrow from inside of weapon – one hundred and thirty degree angle, a Handgonne, late fourteen century AD firearm canon placed upon a fire-cart wheeled stand that is also attached to the back device that actions and forced every weapon on the rack to go on ahead with their motions kind of apparatus – one hundred degree angle, especially good for long-distance putting down runaway fugitive nigger slaves, a living organic device smeared with many growths and put together faces that bore many teeth and many open mouths that almost seem to eat one another in their chase of spread, with almost large bulb-pointing eye moving strange cartilage limbs, all of them bearing long-ray organic guns with shooter-mouths pus-spraying, infesting kind of open-gushed wound seeking wasp-shaped disgusting filth-projectiles – at the one hundred and fifty angle, a strange boomerang motion formed out of reeling back and forth kind of spear-made out of torso-chests like peculiar lines of swimming in the air kind of motions thing, like an almost flat-inflated platforms of hands and arms and unnatural shapes – eighty degree angle, a giant thorn-spike the size of a calf, meatier but stronger than iron – one hundred and seventy, an adult of average size's welded together arm stuck in making a fist like motion at the one hundred and ten degree angle, a red-bellied piranha at the top extended, coming out of an attached in a line intersected iron rubber band with metallic monkey paws latching on top of one another with an iron pole bar pushing through them and through the fish-shape, that being a shaft from with large explosive darts willed from another world are being brought and shot from - at the twenty degree angle, floating heads rotating in every possible direction, contained within a few centimeters of one another, having molded themselves in a strange cartilage of electrical drawing power with mutating figure-like limb protrusions and other unnatural hard to look at forms that launch strange homing dark glowing nigger-bloated blowing into shreds ape killers – at the seventy degree angle, a jelly that grows in whatever medieval weapon the master wills it into, bearing only the darkest of the lot at the one hundred and forty angle, leaving the one hundred and twenty and fifty degree angles as some seemingly missing depressions that bear strange power-popping electrical arcs aiming towards the outer reaches of the ground floor area, upon being forced on top of the closure, to fully press themselves into dark-matter atom, quantum splitting kind of complete foraging destruction fields contorting invisible nets that would utterly fill and reconfigure the nigger DNA into a self-inflating dark device that would destroy itself within a single bloated atom of his cell, as if a starved young nigger's belly was become a nigger's head, body and limbs, before they all popped in and out, then exploded. All of the weapons being attached to some strange almost piano key –like- with grabbable handles on both sides, which would beg the question on how one could press the keys in the first place as to fully action the weapon to the full extent of its power, wielded perhaps by a four armed man in his never ending hunt for the niggers. A strange almost trunk of ammunition key holder with handles on the sides more so, would it look like, a mess.

'I am inciting a riot against Jews in the States, in the Congress, the ones that own the seats of power and the ones working as journalists in the media, as well as the niggers who do the same and the poor ones who are committing crimes. I want as many of them dead and killed as possible, and if terrorism and the use of force needs be used or put to your employ, do it, I condone it. The more of them are dying the better, there shall be only one Kike Khazar alive and that shall be I, no other.'

And thus the Lord of Hatred was born, for he ruled upon the realm and looked upon the shores, of all those that were wrought and beaten, on the bastardly defeated, on the wretched and those whom would see themselves defiled and destroyed. On the lesser races, and hatred for them, which would bring life back upon the rightful shore, whom would have but all distraught and dine upon each other's bodies, falling over in the batter gore. For he would butcher all, upon command, as it would happen, to cast them all, out of the heavens that were long before the Paradise, the Earth which was alone in such disgust.

Though his name was yet to be known, he was rather tall and made of a strangely forged dark-metallic airshaft vent explosion like giant sculpture, always open like a butchering-stove, being constantly fed the bodies of the filthiest of races that were brought from the distance, farther and closer for it to devour as the many long spiked-deformed columns that laid protruding and out-pushed out of his back, like burning chimneys blowing smoke-black puffs gathered around the air. More of them would he devour when allowed to and called from here and there. It spoke, within the voice of wild commands:

'I require further sustenance that you may bring them on, from as far as you may bring, the darkest of fiends that I may put to my employ, so as to devour. The nastiest and most defiled, the ones I asked of you to suffocate.'

As in the lands of States there was nothing more but a long-lasting chaos that would not and never dissipate. This giant legless, burning man, whose faces waited at each end, whose wild obscure, protrusions standing, the piles being brought on top of him, many impaled as it happened. Many kikes from around their States, brought much closer, and brought to stave, pinned and wrung and hanged about, deeper more and more in doubt. Upon the standing long-speared anchors, where they bled and were but defiled after, as the brave men from lest around, just came from droves and threw the kikes in the burning thing that would not shout.

'Bring me more, I dare say, time has come to be, delectable as they are, I need them to be done.'

To wreathe about and keep changing, as for the least of all, that's what he spoke off. It was a tiresome beast that would not leave the sight. A great fashioned thing of many facets, faces, all metallic, falling about the sight, darkly splintery legs wrapped around the great machine, like little legs and puffing ills. A pile of malodorous falling over itself, melting metal with little more erupting forms, the kikes that were brought from various spots, the singer and the cacklers, the laughers, the niggers and the slaves that not only came after but were brought from far away down south.

Ethnic cleansing was in his blood, and as he wretched, his collar shook with millions of niggers lynched and hanged, all but struggling to get away, but none and neither being given free will to go out of their way and heave.

IT beckoned the approach of the people as it stopped half way through, upon forming a dark line that had cut through at the very least, four adjacent states, it then approached them. For all the hatred that gave form to this violent looking ill shaped thing, it paused, and waited.

Upon being approached by the Hebrew Israelites there was something in the god of Hatred that made it stop and consider this, upon being met by the real ones, the strongest ones, the ones that hadn't been twisted and forcefully turned away from their history, it stood there with its hatred quenched.

One of the Hebrew Israelites but stood there as a beacon of truth, seeing how his brothers, that had turned away from their people were punished, destroyed, completely annihilated, he began speaking:

'Hatred incarnate, I see that you've come upon us in a time of great decay, during a time of punishment and utter desolation.

I see that my brothers who had turned away from our past and our future were completely cleansed along the pretenders that turned us against one another as they were punished as they perished with our kin.

But hear me, symbol of hatred, and malformed disgust. I have lived a fine and glorious life. I have kept my proud African line pure and have never mixed with no devil of any kind, I have done my share and I have killed pretenders when time beckoned me to do so. For I knew that the pretenders would lead to the damnation of my soul and the pure soul of my people that had to be protected, I was made aware of the true nature of these Khazar pretenders, who would twist and destroy everything beneath their maddening talons. I now stand before you as a proud Hebrew Israelite, who has not only managed to keep himself pure, but also his people, both of heart, of mind and of blood.

Our legacy is maintained. This had been a great we fought for our people, and we have won it only by faith, in ourselves and our legacy, in our origin, in our courage to stand against the pretenders, banishing them against the paradise we have created.'

And upon hearing this, as this disturbing beast lifted its talons as to destroy them, it suddenly paused, or it had been frozen in place, as if there was a much greater power, a greater barrier standing between them, and their destruction. This barrier would've completely and utterly weak, wearier out, meaningless, and powerless, if it weren't for the fate the Ebony Israelites of the purest of Breeds had kept within themselves, as those who had been mixed but perished long before this trial of destruction had even come to the States and the African lands.

And within reason, the god of Hatred turned away, as it continued its rampage and destruction, over all that were corrupt, twisted, and filled with the malice of lies, of their poison and venom which would've brought the complete and utter termination of all.

Going along as to grab a few of the depigmented Semites by their heads, squashing them with a squeeze, while its many hands but started branching away, killing as many of them as possible.

Hatred lay un-laid, for there was no goddess out there to quench the malice that flowed in his veins.

A pause to hatred, entry to disease

Ethnic plague

'It is rather clear, my dear friend that there can be only one thing left for us to decide on.'

They stood in a quasi plain room, with large mosquito shaped, deformed heads on every corner of the room, on the walls as well, facing them, severely set. Their bloodsuckers were but strangely wrought hoses, anomalies that could not be easily put to any other use, but what they were meant to.

In order to break through the genetic code needed to create an ethnic plague. It was the only feasible, the only reasonless thing, and the only acceptable answer.

‘If I could somehow, cleanse them, if I could create a disease that would only target the Negroid race of the Specimenus Africanus, then perhaps there would be hope yet that I may use my own blood, that I could somehow put it in the mix and create a plague that would destroy the people whom blood I share.

It’s little more than the only hope I have to cure this world from the disease that turned it against itself. My only hope towards making a change and it will happen in this room and nowhere else, do you understand?

I’ve been looking into these things, these living apparatuses for some time now. Although you may yet to know how to properly work them, I will.’

Little flying torsions, all barely put together in a wrong state, like put together puzzle ties that cannot work for too long without being broken. Cracked on top, little noise machines that would distract from what’s going on, large lights, popping in and out, coming out of them.

Small round to round formed pair of bullet holes, all attached to each other, on the other side of the hole.

They kept patches of skin permanently in sight.

‘I shall become their Khazar Kagan, their dark overlord, their Messiah and I shall bring total annihilation upon all, I cannot be stopped, I cannot.’

Levant was incapable of resisting those vile influences that made him step forth, those things that overtook him almost entirely.

He had tried to lead the American forces towards the only change they had to save themselves, but instead, he ended up leading them to their own destruction.

‘It is clear enough that there is only one great truth in this world, this Kike disease is but a bloated animal that would spread and infest everything in its path, contorting, corrupting and completely wreathing all in the most unfathomably unrecognizable thing there is.’

Thus he would lead whatever forces there were left.

And as thus began:

Levant’s Ark

It is a land of terror what the States have become, even before the ever-sweeping cloud of hatred which had destroyed just about everything, it seemed like the walls and the wills of men had already diminished.

What a bare land this has become, so much more, what could've been left of its homogeneity gone, such it seemed likely that there won't be anything from this point on.

By the time, he had drawn near, it felt likely that there would be nothing anymore, nothing to strive for, nothing left to rebuild on top of, only the first and the last marks left over, the destruction that wreathed every race of man, as to be part of the land. He, Levant had been a part of it, a creature of whose soul was wreathed in just about every tainted man there was in this wicked world, a man that was completely twisted beyond the appearance of man. He alone would serve no purpose any longer, but to watch over the fall-over that came after he was to be killed and done.

A peculiar thing, a speckle of almost red sand-waves emerged, all of them mainly in the air, ever forming and ever near had they drawn, until neither one of them could be spared of disappearing in the air before their time. It started looking sickening, bothersome and ever drawing to a nigh-substance in the air, an ever-encompassing unnatural thing which was made of them, the land that came after, given to them in plain of thought.

'And whom better than to greet them during such a time, but one of the culprit, whom shares their blood?'

At that point Levant was approached. He couldn't engross himself in the anticipation, but was left in place, much paranoid as for the strange, it was tall. The body of a dummy, black, with a tall pole, a head of pins, many of them bearing larger, almost beaks, but not entirely. All of them stretched and curved, and walking on top of them as if he were but an unnatural thing of many girths, it was sickening to watch and listen to, since the bloated things it walked upon, ever-drawing forth, increasing in size, going farther in and out, and ever-pushing, ever drawing, crushing and ever-enduring, had they come to show.

A bloated bile corrupted yore, in its chest but oozed like a giant transparent dandelion whore; it was clear that all this evil could only have sprouted from one place and one alone.

'Why did you turn on your fellow man?'

The creature asked Levant, and there could only be one and one explanation that would do.

'Because of a woman, I swear to you, I swear, nothing more, that is the source of my evil, for I could have done nothing more to appease her as such, everything I've done now is for her and her alone, that hatred alone. It blinded me, I had to do something, I had to fight, I had to do something to draw back and come to life.

How could such a dark creature understand? That I would alienate myself from all man for any other reason and anything else? I've done and harmed, and brought distraught, I've defiled and contorted and ever so closer, have I stumbled and approached her. But, yore, alas, I was but filled with fear and because of it, I'm not become evil.

If only I had half a mind, all of this could've been avoided, I would've been saved, this world would've been fine, but how could I control myself past this point?

I'm but a poor man in both mind and soul, but they, they are the culprit of all evil, the cause of destruction being brought in this world, and nothing more could save me from my fate now that I realized what I've become.'

Even the likes of Levant could not understand, how and why and what had brought everything to this state, even by the means of which he sought to defile. He still could not understand how could such a fiend bring so much destruction in the likes of man? How could such a thing but contort everything in her name?

‘I swear that all that is brought here for, everything to the slightest most and lesser of the things defiled, all caused by that of which I admire. I wish I had the chance to use, to claim one for myself, misuse, I wish I had been loved by one when I had the chance.’

‘It is too late for that, and now, all life is brought to an end, all of the women are gone and life cannot continue past this end of the line.’

And there was no other, more distraught and more solemn sadness, even for those whom survived, for their existence could not last for long. What life could that be, spending it all alone, without being surrounded by the likes of a woman to make one’s home? It is one filled with violent, virulent hatred and destruction, one that could not be explainable by any means. Vile animals it’s what they’d turn out of man, without a chance to lose it on a whim.

Seeing how this evil pushed him to the point, when taken away, by each joint, there was nothing, nothing left for him to seek. It was something nigh-close to being the culprit, it was impossible for one to fight by himself, without, in turn, destroying everyone as well, as in turn, himself.

‘Every fiend shall die with you and there shall be as such no reason to contort, back to the world where you came out of. It is not the hatred for the fiends, but the poison, used, by whatever means.

There’s simply no way to make do, as to contort it, as to form, of latter, due. There’s not good thing that came of it, and no salvation, towards you or others, towards any nation, that much you must know.

You brought your own destruction and now you must reap what you’ve sown.’

And thus another war ended.

Most men of every land had their bodies wreathed in and out of their sockets, as they were brutally and violently beaten to their deaths. If only is had been controlled, if only a few of the dark ones were killed instead when there was still a chance for one sun to shine upon. Alas, there was no future either way, no matter where one looked towards; the future could not be saved. Only if he had succeeded into creating chaos, into creating a sickle cell virus as well as a virus that would affect those of his own breed, then the world might’ve stood a chance, but now, all was gone, all was lost, total annihilation, brought to their feet at last.

Another abhorrently evil plan failed, just like many of them, all ending up in ruin and in chaos, all but brought down before there was even a chance for either one to be drawn to a real emergence. Yet the essence would never, by any means, possibly be contained, suppressed, or brought to an ill.

Mlethiung, a dream.

‘They called upon the hour for you to come and you were to show yourself before every single one of us.’

‘And who is the one to bring himself to me and ask?’

They broke the peace and formed two lanes, and it could barely be seen around them, as dark as was the path around, like curtains rounded on each side, they moved, as in a ballroom, suddenly a tall king-looking figure rose.

Its eyes were tormented and from where it stood there was as little as twenty bodies attached to a belt but only in form, they were welded and in part.

‘Lieleigh Myga.’ An attendee called to him on time, and brought to him, of little mind, but one of the grand candles that could be used, one of them being shaped like a great staff with the shape of a chandelier on the top.

In an immediate awakening, many of the statues that were embed in the floor were suddenly awakened, as they all drew forth, never wasting a single moment from that point on.

Their sudden rise startled Myga. His outstretched hand suddenly beheaded one of the statues by chance.

Not solemnly a hall by all means, it was all, too suddenly forged into a head-piece upon which the statues crawled back inside of. A slit shape inside one of the walls fading as soon as it could be allowed, every now and then appeared, it was undeniable by every fact and every facet and every single thing that was around.

There were wild amalgamations, every now and then appearing in part, more of them, every single speck of light.

Hleihno was the pair of heads or the small doll-like things attached to the arched black metallic wire coming out of his back. It was a tool of destruction, a tool that would bring his body back to the way it was, whenever weary or wasted, whenever tainted by his surroundings, whenever possible if all. They were completely broken in the head and had small, insignificant, inhuman shaped mechanically malformed heads. They wore themselves outwardly, caught within their own little tubes and power outlet machinery, worked on, as the dead-machine was being wrought out. It was to be admired, now of all times, that they would be abandoned in the little fallen over pair. Both of them were incapable of breathing any longer, being completely deformed, as would their congenital organs be, completely and utterly designed, designated for the usage of laceration. Since the little servants, whom were already present there, sharper than their inhuman already modified appendage-contorted shape could be allowed to push through, they were rather, set on never having to attain anything else. There was only one thing that could be pure, that could be repurposed from the broken apart body of the damned simian creature by the name of Levant, as those chemicals from his brain, those pure things were completely extracted, the rawness of his mind being completely repurposed at to create something that could be assimilated by the machine and repurposed into something much, much greater. Since his autopsy was a complete success, it looked like a bloated little pucker, born and bred out of desperation, completely and utterly useable. Something was given birth from it, something only a few living things could possibly understand, something desperately usable, a malign mutation that was being attached, and being fed upon. It was his conscious, this hatred, this degeneracy, madness, this schizophrenic adherence, boldness that gave birth to them, as they were slowly being taken apart, them as machines, slowly being wrought into smaller, longer, more servile pieces. Serviceable by the worst of things, being incapable of moving or spreading, being torn apart from the rest; it would take years to grow on top of brown soil, on metal, on air-convexity, mild elongations being present.

All of them wreathed as to look deformed but they would last. It was the only thing that could be put to use, something beyond the obedience of man, and his inferior nuclei, perfect by every mean, and it would be part of him, magnetically, almost to a fault, being stuck together while leaving no possible, feasible place they could move or be taken apart of, but most importantly, canceled by its own nature. A mindless pair of self-attaching, self-rejecting machines that could not endure one another, could not ever hope to hear themselves be given life in an automatic manner.

It was so empty, in some way, yet completely and utterly useable.

All those bodies put to good use for once, after everything that's been done so far, everything would be usable, everything, without a doubt, without hope to look away, athwart one's eye or mind from it. An unnecessary evil after another; they were finally done, as the entire side of the planet had already been contorted into something. It was a hardened pool mixed with just about every possible chemical made out of the stolid things that were left.

The planet was wreathed in whichever way. The chaos of hatred had entered it through one of the most incessantly degrading hole it could wreath itself in.

In some way, it was degradingly beautiful, deformedly so, in the most unnatural way possible.

Every single dead being having bore a single pair of head-alike, limb-attached and many unnatural things wreathed in one piece, dragging from whichever corner of the world there was, making it seem, likely as it would've been, many of them being within, the slightly area of noise and sound, where either one of them could open their mouths.

Many men and women and the deformed as they were, being held up high, in the most unnaturally defect manner they could be put in, like growths, bubbling about, ever-so close to rising up to one or either one of the bloated atoms that would help them breathe.

They were impaled corpses up to the throat, where the blocks were merely there, in shape and form, but nothing seemed to lay inside, no device, no wire and nothing that could be put to waste, or hone the means of an echo, by whichever lay there was. It was ever-so dragging and ever so nearing the satisfaction of seeing them reach or grab a pint, to rise. As if they were cockroaches preparing themselves to climb and come back to life, they stopped and wasted away. No Semite could've foreseen this happening. It was a surreal dream that backfired on them.

An act of supreme misanthropy, of global terrorism, which left everything in shambles, ready to be picked on by whichever entity found it feasible to approach and pick on it, like bloated vultures on a worldly cadaver.

As thus, in a dark corner when once there was naught, lay abandoned as such, one great dark voiced box:

'I think I've finally done it, I've done it, I found the purest tool of evil I could wrap my hands around, the supreme tool, that being nothing else other than propaganda.' But there was no one there to hear it; there was no one to test it on. There was no living being that had enough neurons to possibly be susceptible to it.

It was so close, it was so close, that dreadful thing, it was still incomplete. There was still something missing.

‘How could I be the harbinger of death, fear and destruction if I am yet to be heard?’

Dreadful thing it were, was it not? To be feared by none and lay only in the presence of, to be accompanied only by a few cockroaches and rats:

‘But I won, I won, I’ve destroyed everything, I’ve brought supreme destruction, conquest, dominion, schemery, kikery, gookery, niggery and plunder to an end.’

There was no one else to go at; there was no chaos to bring, as the species of man were gone.

‘Whom to be used then if there is nothing and no tool, how could this be?’

Who to turn onto, myself, I could.’

It is the fate of all whom are chaotic beyond reason, to the point when one would self destruct, beyond the sense, of little more than there is after, wretchedly contorting itself.

Thus when all had ended, the voice had stopped.

There was no one else within reason to hear itself.

Henceforth ended, little dark voice of the mind.

A mighty set-on foot and plain anchor, not to leave any body reach any possible surface, detractor.

With many huge impaling many pushed through pouting openly boat-shaped jigaboo, with an open below the belly, with colored spades coming out of him as if they were dropped out of Negro-skinned helicopters with little bloated in the eye specks of barely fitting in shrapnel like usage, long deformed eye-open little dark put in the ground sounding cook, burning stakes, deformed Africans being put down like animals, one by one following all the way through until no longer capable of fully opening, then stopped.

Large platform, standing in front of a large stretch, a calm looking land filled with the most grand of creations, all put together from different angles as to form themselves out of different sights. Large tender fruit-bearers forming strange Stair-roads, inclined as to lead to puffy-made triangular-oblong squarest blocks gleaming clouds-shapes, hardened and floating in the air, but just as organic looking as the peculiar roads leading to them. Curved even like swings, pushing through from the ground to these, hardened structures, with almost pointed cone-roofs, like angler-shots being reeled back and forth, every now and then, inside the great set of black see-through pebbles that bore the remains of the previous inhabitants there were, before a time where all was brought to ruin. During a time where the owners died at peace, with their consciousness made. Many of them floating inside the bubbling thing, broken in part, and made to lean, large towering formations, like factory smoke-makers, from deep or deeper inside the retracting in and out-caves that form the Empty lands.

Insect-palettes reigning in a supreme manner just about in every possible spot they could be placed in, without the slightest change.

Structure of insolence there, in the middle, a thing of mockery, yelling and wailing every now and then:

‘Ha, I cannot be stopped, I am a conqueror, I am not to be held to no rule!’

The structure looked like a thinner watch tower or a lighthouse, with wooden plank formations that looked like fish-waves, put together like puzzle pieces, eating one another’s tails which going on a large upward grinding vortex, many of them being incapable of stopping this advance it started on. A pair of wooden wheels attached to it, shaped the same, going around as it spoke to the nuclear power plant shaped structure, which started pushing deeper below until many of the receding caves could no longer be put to any stop.

Strangling arrow-faced blocks being shot.

Little pins-like cranes began appearing, with their cut-like motion shaped heads:

‘You were missed, great pillar of insolence, where have thou gone?’

‘Nowhere, nowhere, for I had run out of fuel and of touch, and of the plain that went around, passed above the ground.’

In and around each curve they could not listen or understand, for what reason they started moving and advancing past the line ahead.

Twenty largely shaped unnaturally wrought on the side plain-heads.

‘Grain, I’ve finally brought you home.’

Bloated things en volatile, they sang for as long as they could move off the road and back and forth.

There was no other chance to fix it, other than that, both of them going at one another’s throats, being met by one another just as soon as they let go, right around the pit, just as soon as they could have their feet planted in. Two and two faced one another, right before they started leaping like frogs, on non existing stones before they caught each other by their arms, two steps in and already they’ve been tearing each other off like animals. Balk-Torn, Bulk of head followed.

Stretched arm marks came in just as soon as they were released from one another’s grasps, fingernails stopped right in time before they could be released from going into one another’s spots as both of them came within inches of, splattering their bones. Bulkhead twenty centimeters in, having pounded through both of his arms, leaving slithery bile-skin, gelatin-bulb cylinder where his arms had been, like a Gatling gun then he twisted both fists, throwing him off the ground.

Largely deformed unnatural thing, with a pin around it head.

The Gouch was strong and eely skinned almost to a fault, largely grown in an almost deformed manner, like a jelly of whose back was an elongation of a much more common to look at kind of factory belt with many mason stone carving like tools made out of some barnacle like organisms. As if the back had been elongated and random jelly on top dropped barnacle carving tools but put inside of them like insidious little bastards trying to carve their way through. Incapable of controlling themselves as they would push on and off, always trying to tip the scales of weight, many of which would enter, every now and then twenty meters in without making too much of a fuss, trying to degrade their overall staunchly manner.

Strangest thing of all had happened, to the point where it might've been forgotten there, as larger shapes emerged from both sides, no gate was open there for more than a second, but one could see, almost a room standing on between them, at a distance, like two split ends leading just about anywhere else. An elevator-like depression down, dowry from the base to the plainness of the base, if it were rotated and lead to one direction or to the other, from the looks of which, neither reason, neither standing would help to strive, of a lack of reason, twenty more raised bumps to look upon made the objects of the strange room. Neither of them readily given or misused by the looks of which there was no way to make anything out just yet, too many headed lighters being there and being there not for anything.

Large plain guitar-like stringed formations, attached to utmost peculiar rooftops, drawing in and out of what appears to be elongated almost deficient-open mouthed sore things. Raising up and down out of hidden holes inside the strangeness of the strange floor they are hidden in, like nutcracker toys being actioned up and down, with soliquitous punt marks around every single one that was present in the room as well as everything else around the place, a swoon of armaments droning in and out, and then about the room after. There were things about it that didn't fit at all, nor would they work properly if left or allowed to.

Larger, extending on the back and on the front things, with nigger-killing prodding spears.

In the dance of feet only one and two could be seen, just as soon as they started and switched places.

Darker discs with two by two looking unwell kind of over the top lookalike to some barely capable to stand box, standing there for a moment before disappearing out of place, inserted into it, only a most peculiar eight by eight with little more than a four diameter almost wronged kind of shaped horns lay attached to a pair of intersected horns, a lot of which, from the looks of it molded to form a fumigating long piece. Like a wreathing in and out, hard to look at large reptile skulls by the looks of it, barely attached, rested a floating jewel of cartilage of bone, caught on every side by the most unnaturally hard to look at, chained-up and around floating circles through which it proved itself capable of not only flight but some contortion that could not be stopped.

A cripple walked, slowly kept in an utmost hard to look at stance, barely trying to get from one side to the other, a long bridge waited before him. Wearied out as he was, he asked for nothing else but the company of a direly estranged man whom wore around his throat, nothing else but a strange rope missing a great piece that made its absence be felt by the man.

Worried that he would not reach the other side, he simply drew closer and asked.

‘Will you watch over my raven?’

But to his surprise he was still somewhat unmet by any reasonable response. It was as if the figure in front of him had been just as confused as he was, seeing how he had been standing here for hours, yet to get a reason, within an acceptable time, to leave this place and find another, where he could be met by the fortune of family and a grave upon which he may base his land's name upon.

'I must apologize but I'm already lost, good old man, I've been standing here for hours, days, weeks at no end, and I've yet to see a soul return.

I feel as if, at time, there's nothing in my head making me mourn the ones that went ahead. I am only wearied as the time pushes on, my friends, whom I had dearly kept in mind appear, to near that certain stop where they might see the fallen heaven to the side.'

'But what is that, there, past the canyon-dug? And whose hand was it that had pushed down when the time had drawn it, to be gone?'

'In time you shall understand, Leahyg, but for now, I swerve that, as much as I can draw from dust and sand, from many town, from that which takes but mind apart, there's nothing much for soul there left. Many men whom had gone down there, now lack, for better thought that which draws man to seek, that which makes him look past and such as there lays down, at his feet.

Of servile land where maiden, so, as such might find him where, past the time when he should know, can you not see what they have done of touch?

Can you not see or understand what had happened there at last?'

'They, but was there no single beast you claimed to have dug such trench?'

'Old creature that you are, old man, you got it all wrong, you wrote, and of all day and of all age long, I would not have decided to bother you so, yet I've known as such that I should've drawn your clear, least be sickle wild attention to be weary of such servile and indirection.

You see now, I've seen no reason back then, nor there. I would've found you, back, whence they had stared, to look for reason to set forth.

For those that died beneath the poke, are still to live and long decay, to haunt the lands and lest of all convey, that which compares to naught, that, which may not be forgot, it's what you looked for yonder when there was no time as such, that you may seek to look past, that you may understand at last.'

'But, lo, I cannot understand where you are going, young man.'

'That's because you do not understand, and you shall never, unless you ask me to be done instead. I now remember, of many days that passed, what happened when, in time, during evil day, I was cast among them, made to live.

And made to breathe through the same air as they had, past a day when I could not stand it any longer, at my feet, I walked and plowed the land, with cattle and would've starved myself with such disaster.

I whom would have cast but all, I whom had but dared do something as to know, of lesser things, have found. There's nothing purer but the clarity of mind, this thing I found and cast myself into, this thing that's but hard to explain, this sudden break, which might not claim my mind away.

You, of old shall yet to understand what's going on, yet pity is something you may yet to cast, as I have finally looked into my mind and, stumbled upon. ‘

‘What, what is it? What have you stumbled onto?’

‘Peace, alas, my dear friend, a beast of all, for I have found but nothing less and nothing more, but to go and walk, and never have myself but open, to release, in part, whatever piece there is left of my mind, in exile, whence I stay, and nowhere else, for whence I go ahead and lay.

For whichever moment, I but lay surrounded by many men akin to I, for whichever ration I am but to be given to, I feel my mind but lump together, and made to die. And for that I reason, I seek naught and nothing more, to yet be followed. For amongst them I feel only need to wreathe and cast away and to seek such as were it, to follow. And cast away, and let alone as one would say. I, of whom might yet be cast, and poison as would any man, alas, in turn, to look in past.

Of spirit long degrading, fading, of I, a ma, whose spirit almost ending, I have come to know, of no glory shown, but instead I must just stand alone. And nothing more and nothing less, and not to talk to anyone, of whom may but awake me from this cypress I may have found instead. I shall lay here, where I'm safe in mind, here, all secluded where I may not hurt, nor thine, or blight, that I may listen, that I may learn, from the spirits down there, whom, for countless generations have stood and mourned, for those whom would've been but undeserving, who would've found themselves in such countless things, and generations that would be, scorning such life as I've lived.

I do not know what other life if left for me to live, and for that reason, here I stay, until, when time comes, I am to be taken away.’

Pops in the air began forming like air bags being actioned by extremely over the speed meter drive through a fucking wall kind of car right before the moment of the impact actioned almost breathing bag filled in with air to the full lung capacity kind of extension in the air, attached to the unnatural things but chained unnatural to look at cords put together in the most capricious manner, chains or mirrored snakes wrapped around and fighting across the air-plains, as if they were in actuality but multiple sand-valley like desert flats, as in the Nevada desert, with the difference being that the space between each cloud being the same of a single trunk, couldn't stand it for more than one second. A few meters between each of them, with the lower puffs of every clouds being flat-like cut as if by a sharp razor. Different flat levels being put to the strangest most peculiar employ of the place they were trapped it, which would explain why these ‘pops’ or these strange almost womb-like formations simply stand in the air rather than float or levitate, since, by the looks of it they are but trapped in there. Every single sky-fragment is systematically divided in these almost hallway –shaped levels, in which the skin formations appear to stand in, mostly unnaturally formed, by the looks of which, it's where the arms started appearing every now and then in the proximity of the bags, as if they were but made to put these organs into stress, to put them under high duress until no longer was it made acceptable for them to suffer, yet the sound of the human like voices could no longer be contained inside of the fragmented space they're put in, some closer put-drawn shades but entering them from the side.

Its eyes were fully formed cameras inserted tubes, forced halfway through the eye sockets, from what would look like peculiarly formed outward pacing tendons, put half-way through as if crawling on top a donut, then curved back out of it as soon as it would be allowed to return to its own doings. A strangely elongated dark piece of the head, going all the way back to an area that would feel like the insides of a traditionally used stove after being cooled down, which would also be indicative of the texture, as if one would account for the pain as well as the liquefying skin, only slightly on top of the jarred wood on which it had been placed on top of to begin with. That is to say that the temperature caused by the burning of the wood, and the cooling time after would somehow go beyond the likes of a normal stove, or a normal kind of burning caused by an intense flame, making it seem as if there are or were iron rods mixed with those fire lodge wooden flint-kind of wooden cut-through lumber-mill top of the cut, which conferred the back of the skull in question a kind of metal plate implanted in it, as for a war veteran, whom had suffered from a shrapnel by the side of fallen artillery launched bomb at the back of his head where the heat melted not only flesh but a good piece of the bone cartilage that belonged to his cranium, a band being there, as if this shrapnel had forced some kind of deformation kind of cut that could only be fixed by inducing the same result, that is to say, head elongation as if it were a cradle boarded man, by the addition of a metal band between the two removed bits as well as several metal rods keeping everything together, from falling apart. Bolts being placed every few meters or so, every little speck being as little sized as to be much shorter than the average sized bolt, that difference amounting, or might as well amount to the size comparison between the smaller sized skull of a member of the Negroid race to the skull of a well fed, fully grown and mightily developed Caucasian, that being the fact that the bolt is much shorter in size, not as well working if working at all, rusted, and easily replaceable by a bolt of much higher, superiorly working quality than the fucking dumb nigger. The nigger-bolts being useless by all accounts; yet the skull would seem to be a good pointer to the type of creature it would be like, since the band-inducing elongation as well as the cameras are actually made of livid cartilage and not of any kind of machinery or implant, adding up to the sides to what would seem to be some ear-like apparatuses on both sides, which upon further sight, would seem to be, largely wide-spread as to become disc-like in form and shape, almost to the extent where it would've been recognized as a sea-floor carpet, as well as a most unnatural to look like splatter-balloon that would elongated, on either side as to completely cover the head, attached to this, which in the initial state, is nothing more than an almost oyster-like thing, or a smaller boulder-rock kind of hardened formation, before being properly elongated as to leave behind, in the ear-entry, upon the carpet-like spongy spread, a vortex with a long doctor-like hearing apparatus, in his ear – like small sharp ice-picked at both ends entering the skull kind of hearing devices that are attached to the inner cranium that is placed inside the outer chitinous one. Or, if one could imagine them being nothing more than a single straight through the skull bar, at one point, this bar would bear, on both sides, compared to a humanoid, in the place of his ears, but slightly farther removed, two lumped beads would take their place instead. This strange bar but then is curved on both sides as to point towards the collar bone, but not entirely connected to the body's exoskeleton like form, leads to the, if there was a chance to see it from inside the skull, an almost 'M' kind of metallic looking cartilage-hardened, barely textured kind of bloated device, entering a large almost chemically grown top of a tomato-like fat- three lumped fat, to which, if seen from the front but slightly to the right, at a curved angle as if the viewer took a side step to the right, the throat attached to the middle lump, the two 'M' bars to the others, being spread in the way one would imagine strangely grown roots implanted in the tomato sides, or rather, looking like an almost organically covered by muscle basin bone, or the bone that holds the, pelvis thing, unless, the one that holds the leg bones and the spines, behind the groins, with a down-rooted turnip sagging flaccid growth of meat-bone, whereas the lower formation that's but pushing even further than that, from a wave-like eaten core-middle point, -transition, as if the point where the turnip fat and the lower side of the formed body was eaten around the middle as if someone had chewed an apple around its base as to form the leg of a stand in which an almost humanoid lower side of the body textured like the pointer – index, middle and ring finger from both hands were put together in a way like both pointers and both ring fingers touched one another and stood side by side only at the tips – on both hands while touching their counterparts, while the middle fingers would stand on top of them, that is to say that this lower side of the body, and the humanoid simian legs, or anatomically formed modern men-like things would be formed in almost lumpy finger formations, hardened with a strange chitinous carapace as well, while bearing no feet. Muscle exposed almost while the peculiar, not arms –extending out of the middle, where arms would've been holes a square if seen from above skeletal frame with rounded sharp almost outwardly convex like edges, with the few centimeters off, at the very least ten or so, ones that enter the holes and are attached to the body, that is to say, the few centimeters belonging to the sharp square-frame being not only duller but also slightly thinner as they are but attached, as if worn by the creature as some kind of ramming blade, perhaps not as thin there, but, most likely an attached blade, with the grabbing hilt like region being inserted, and two more similar square-overall-shaped blades coming out of the same socket like sprouting muscle tendons that hang onto nothing, being, least of all, unattached to anything else, at a slightly higher and a lower angle, causing some nuisance since the highest one, judging by the flipped angle, and all three of these square-blades being twistable, as if they were flapping wings, if they bore some kind of material between their frames, or flippable, adjustable, as for the angles, would reach at the same level as the creature's camera-like eye-protrusions. Harder and wider than blades, even, as to bear outlandish spikes, but not on the front edge, on the flat surface that's but similar to squares, being curved forward, and sparsely placed, as to form a partial fit between them, creating two pseudo mouths, once all three blade regions are connected, and bull-charging horns on top, while they would all look like bull charging horns, despite the clenched blades, these ones, on the top, not the ones below would be somewhat closer in similarity, while being painted red-orange, filled with boils, while bearing organic growths on top the squared blades. An almost robe mannequin figure with the mouth-nostril region an inward vortex-depression with multiple similar features all mixed and bore in. A charger this one, but trying to tackle any other creature down as to completely and utterly chop it while charging. Nasty unnatural songs sung from the vortex nostrils and all the things wrong, perhaps a rubber-band formation pushing the elongated skull in the back, while the cartilage rods being nothing more than overgrown head veins, connecting with the rest of the head. Muscle-filled legs as well, with more than a few overly wrought and exposed things here and there, with painted scrawls and two dimensional like tribal features and stronger, lesser being like tumor- interpretations as if the kid's mother had just given him the news that she was diagnosed with a terminal illness his mind could not comprehend, as to give birth to multiple iterations of strange darkly drawn creatures on top of these, seen as if from on top of, as if hills kind of a view while being a little man from the flat surface kind of wider, longer wave-like almost hill, deformed even more, of course not from the little man's point of view, since the lines would be night or close to be almost incomprehensible or undistinguishable from there, but from the kid's point of view, the monsters would still be deformed.

They were just as soon surrounded by darker panes, all of which appeared out of nowhere, bouncing between each other as they drew and upon the cane which flopped by each tide, a row of teeth but set on flight right after, after each and every single time a blow came after, sickeningly daft, a culprit bounced upon the soles of his feet and found himself just as soon reminding himself where to and fro and where to bounce and just as soon he could himself but a baboon on a frying pan. Tar on the ground, the pit was done, and filaments of flying specks and dust were burn and mice were dead underneath them. Bob and

Carl but stood about, they punched each other, in the ground with neither one waiting, seeing how they each fell through. A few inches in the ground, and rue, but neither of them knew how to continue, kniving as they were, at each other's throats and then again. It followed, just as soon after, tomorrow, came along. They spent a day crying in each other's laps and found each other dying as their faces were torn off.

'It's been decided, since both men were cowardly waiting for a draw, that both of them would die immediately and at the same time. There can be only within reason, something to follow after, let's continue past the time.'

A few of them gathered around the place, many of them having already formed the lower sides of their bodies in an utmost animalistic kind of matter, barely contorted yet fully-developed, as if they were actually unnatural-hard to look at predators of some kind, incapable of stopping from the looks of it, deranged in some way. Aggressive creature that they were, seemingly, as soon as it could be allowed to, they started charging one another, with their blades fully stretched, properly and feasibly exposed, as if it could not be helped by any means. Such was that state they were in, that their elongated heads were but forced to bobble upon being met by the full strength of the impact, having twisted one another in their hard to counter and barely suppressible kind of way.

Little turpentine like things being attached every now and then, like tubes from the ground they shared.

The race of Fleshy runners but began their long attack against one another, rising their square blades as soon as they would meet their horny-teeth, their bowels merging below their aching bellies, right before they were attached, before they could get pinned against one another, then they'd try, and wail upon the side-long stretched that came soon after, one of them suddenly appearing from behind, charging as it would cut, trying itself before cutting both the back of its throat, and the two cords that kept its head attached, then not. It fell on the side and bled, both camera-shaped eyes but dangling out their sockets then. No longer standing on a piece, no longer feisty, then at peace, they bled on the side.

More of them followed after only to lower themselves and butcher the body, just as soon after would they begin eating what was lumped and broken apart, thrown out its way, grabbed and gobbled as if a bite. It just happened then to draw, many of them alarmed by a strange being, the pole-like thing that drew behind. Seemingly out of nowhere as soon as it appeared, before either one could near it, the creature started again. Without the slightest touch they'd start, and would to show and follow yet about the hour fading.

There was neither a reason nor a possible explanation for what was going on there.

Slaughter machines shaped like prison-cells while the hard to look at bars but pointed, and largely as they were curved and jointed, would they show a piece and would to be, latched upon the closest thing, they wrapped around a long diseased, darkly mattered wrong contorted, insufferable double necked bile. A pile they were attached to as if it were a darker mule, it sat upon the place it winced and glanced about, no longer set in doubt or watched.

Wildly deformed moving triangle like blade protrusion once added and seen from the side, it wreathed around the place before finally being placed in the same spot it sprouted out of. Either way and in whichever direction one looked as much as this could be seen, a few arched together plain around their own heads construction fields were attached by what appears to be some god given eleven hundred miles all attached and wrought together in an utmost unnecessary manner, as to be seen from the adjacent areas every now and then, not only being barely attached at a surface level but by the looks of it, grimacing if seen from above, or from around, from whichever other angle, always wallowing as if in pain while almost always changing. It got accompanied by a few flying rocking chairs, painted black, but carrying marks around the worst possible places they could be placed in.

One of those dark chairs' name was Basskorn, from left to right, seemingly no longer capable of breathing, or breaking away, dark little pints around every single corner, and little more than.

Little more than a few meters away, corner elongations.

Regardless of it, the wind was strong and the chargers had already gathered around a dark-dim fence that had been completely elongated as to surround a good side of the splatter. Their square-blades but shaking off as they were approached, no longer standing in one place before they would start shaking again, always for a piece of the ceiling, most of it having already taken into account that there was nothing moving any longer. Most of the meaty things in the sky were broken, regardless of them being fragmented-bloat stars, or pieces of the furniture that was completely made to move in wild directions, there was this much in one of the first recognizable Chargers, a piece of it being lodged into him, as hard as a simple, single lump made out of no longer capable to breathe fiends, almost mouth-protruding as well as many tooth-lanced around each of the prime blades of their tribe.

Their incessant dangling of square blades could only add up to the fact that they were incapable of helping themselves, as to draw back or out of their encirclement, as to say, there was no possible way of escaping it any longer.

A giant standing figure, that of an almost hardened lump-bodied, sharper bladed to an almost tooth-elongated pair of leper-shafts stood before them. From what appeared to be a pair of nearly cracked open heads erupted a single speck of large, mouth-pushing holes that released hardened lumped drill-shaped gut-stones that slowly flowed down, below him with the rest of the bile, no longer being fully in control of its every and utter fornicating dark-tendons, it started heaving itself forward. The giant could've charged and trampled most of them as a testimony of its sheer size as well as the leprous manner in which it started drowning itself as well as the lower sides of its body with the stone drills that entered him as soon as it allowed it to happen.

He was nothing else and nothing was inside of him.

The period of struggle had come to an end, and from there on out they seemed to be inconspicuously hiding in each other's bony throats, even if it looked rather, in a silly manner, like some kind of passing illusion.

By the looks of it, many of the rooftops were placated and covered in several strange fallen on top of one another layers of some stranger systematically placed, and wrapped around as if some iron-strings but instead of strings – strips, inside of clay statue casts, but closer to curved sheets of iron on top of which some strange liquid-hot hardening substance appeared to take the mold – foam, spread, as to also act like flour mixed with vinegar- bubbling on top as it spread from the main growth kind of form, which kind of looked like some organic cotton with air bubbles stuck inside of it, signaling the growth, leaving no trace of the strangely peculiar forms they took as to grow from one point to the other, leaving many clusters, or weird bubbly-waves put on top of them. The houses were made out of many walls that looked like segmented one strong flat shade at a time kind of black and white gradient, where, instead of the overall side, if the house in question had been a normal one with four walls, it was completely heaved outward and at the same time slightly tilted as these one-sided almost man-thin with his hands still hanging outside his body walls were, or the one in the middle, dragging each other off. They were also curved at the top – like sharpened or forced by hand to imitate a pseudo ramp, holding the many lumpy clouded waves in check, creating the illusion that they had come from inside the house. At times these strangely shapes casts would change form, creating various sharp-pikes that would thrust in and out violently so.

What was that?

He knocked her up by accident.

‘Men don’t, it was her fault, you must understand it.’

‘Calm down now, slowly, tell me what happened.’

‘I got so close to it.’

‘To her?’

‘No, not to her, I just, I think, I’m.’

Fleiffn stood still for a moment.

‘I’ve come close to feeling something real. But it’s not there any longer.

Regardless of every attempt, I simply cannot replicate that genuine feeling, that emotion. I feel stumped, you know? All mechanical, empty, every single time, I don’t know what to believe any longer.’

‘You can’t return to anything, any longer, not after, wake up already.

You killed that Jordanian child, remember?’

‘The foyer, the inspectors were there, weren’t they?’

‘They still are.’

‘I don’t know what to do, where to go, or how to go about it.’

‘No one knows, your point being?’

‘I think, I think I felt guilt when I killed him. ‘

‘But now?’

‘I don’t know, I don’t think I feel any remorse over doing it any longer. I’m afraid I’m just going to go through it all over again.

There doesn’t seem to be a stop to it, you know, it’s blinding in some way. But there’s just no soul inside this body, not one I could touch or feel any longer. It’s all too bothersome, trying, waiting, trying again, arousing nothing in it. I don’t know whether those feelings are genuine or not.

I’ve killed that child, haven’t I?’

‘You’re in the same house with the inspectors as well. DO you know what means?’

‘They’ll find me, they’ll find the truth, the one thing I cannot hope to let go off, the one thing I could not let them wrap their hands around, if they did, then.’

It was a shuddering thought.

The inspector-coroner was almost completely done reminiscing of the divorce-autopsy he had, vivisection in actuality, performed on his wife, widow. He killed himself, but there he stood.

‘I survived my every suicide attempt there was. Without a doubt, there’s nothing stopping me from breathing this musky air.’

‘You know what? Of all the times I’ve listened to your absurd stories it never occurred to me to actually call you out on it. You’re full of shit.’

‘I’m not, how could even imply that?’

‘So you killed yourself, but you survived, doesn’t that turn it into an attempted suicide?’

‘Of course not, it’s a failed – kill, but not at attempt. You see, now, I actually made my own poison, I actually fashioned it out of eighteen hundred apple seeds I’ve been saving over the couple of a few weeks during which I’ve been non-stop planning my next move and how to go about it.’

‘And you’re telling me this is supposed to be the result of it?’

An almost greenish-man standing on a pile of fleshy, fallen over meat, barely standing, yeah, I would believe it. If it weren’t for the contamination that’s occurred before we met.’

Decay did not and would not wait for no crooked people, not of bone, nor of mind, it seeped it like a penitent leprous animal, twice the heads, and less amounts.

A strange peculiar body of fragmented nigger-casts forming large swimming ironical circles, since they can’t, a paradox of unnatural forms, attached at the middle region of their bodies, like kite-but inward like cone-steel skeleton holding them over-impaled upwardly but outwardly spread below like a lamp stand that’s cylindrical or domed. Kind of like conical frame, with swords, bearing metallic punching arms beating on the niggers as well, yelling and shouting wild recordings such as ‘Take this you dumb fucking nigger, yeah.’

Strange apparatuses at play in this concoction of steel that's barely put together and barely capable of preventing itself from puncturing through its own ribs in order to get as close as possible. Unnecessary cogs working it from left and on the right as well as on top the adjacent following long, almost perspective shaped buildings, which appeared, as if seen from above to be curved along the projected lines coming out of the point of focus, or the middle dot, curving outwardly on slopes, from which large almost coiling shapes draw out of the top of the building, slicing as well as whipping the niggers into submission, butchering and beating the dumb animals until they cannot breathe any longer because of the arms, not the whipping that's happening. The whipping only being meant to serve as a psychological kind of punishment that would distract the monkeys from the pain they're put through. Saws appearing right in their small heads, creating strange mixers that would turn their inner focal cortex already sickened cognition devices into bile-like gelatin oozing things like splattered boils underneath the finger nails.

Niggers have bulbous clock-tower eyes, not like hand watches but the ones you'd imagine if someone cracked them with a giant bottle, it's what I'd like to do to a nigger if I had one of my hands wrapped around his neck and the other holding the shattered on the edge of the bar-table stained bottle.

Shard of a larger cast, chitinous in such a realm as one would stand himself crippled by the side of a, watching over it as the crazy thing wallows into place dark corner of the world, put in part where it doesn't belong.

It was rather clear that not all of the chargers were as deformed as the average one would happen to find itself like, rather, the lower side of the Special Chargers being, more so, rather more shaped than the others could ever hope to become, adding more to the outlandish type of thing that it's become rather than being a humanoid set of below the waist kind of body. A set of scorpion like open claspers or conveyed bats – as in contemporary or post Industrial Revolution but wrapped like parchment around two almost horn-like pincers that face one another with some almost medieval looking bumped kind of patterned shielded things, all around the main form, bearing a dark stratagem of hidden square-twisted pockets with heads inside of them, being hidden inside this specifically, almost war-like dug trench kind of, or rather, Vietnamese-like man holes where man-on poles, as if impaled but more animated like dancing figures, hide in. All of them bearing weapons, twisting themselves as they would contort out, reveling that these outer bumps that are spread all around, but systematically so around these two elongated pincer-like horns upon which the Special Chargers are walking upon are in actuality, but the rounded, blunt tips of the strange poles that had had impaled them. The Special ones but leaping on top the sharp pincers all along, in the distance and forwardly thrusting, while their square blades are become, but vortex like pincer-like tornado-like eye of the storm if seen from above kind of barbed wire destroyers or two edged pointed inwardly blades.

Floating bodies created by a iron beads being forced to bounce all around the edges and the wall of an inwardly set kind of floating pop-balloon that would not allow any kind of interference to occur, hidden away from sight, from the looks of it, always there when not needed, especially when drawn from one side to the other.

Dark cylinder with two elliptical holes at the top being completely pushed out as to slightly protrude, from the insides of which two giant unnatural poles drawing in and out as they would start pumping out like strange unnatural hard to look at capacitors with lodge-heads at their farther ends, glowing.

A wheel-chair accessible on the side, with wheels attached to the main frame of a lynching stand, that has something like eight or seven- fall through trapdoors as well as eight systematic places where the niggers are set into their respective positions, as to be prepared for the lynching, standing on top of circled in-rotating wooden stands that face outwards, in the direction this lynchvehicle is heading towards Lynchville, Kentucky. Bodies are disposed in the back where an ashtray-like kike-in-the-oven drawn on rails small cradle releases all the dead-niggers on top the marches, where they might as well openly rot.

Niggers are all looters, they cannot help themselves but steal whenever the occasion arises, they are to be put down and have their skin peeled off their brittle nigger bones. Filthy thieving monkeys.

Witches were obscure in this kind of deranged kind of way.

Some large cockle-shaped horns appeared to be protruding out of the shield-shaped dorsal removable packet that was attached to his back.

A large domed labor camp shaped like the top of a frog that's been balloon-inflated, to be completely jaw-closed and fully propelled in the air, as to bear some outwardly but inwardly at the middle grown almost curtain-dress of various put together layers and sheets of old-skin left behind by a snake kind of organic casts, that would cover hundreds of machinery-like working limbs that would spread and work constantly towards trying or attempting to lift the main domed camp higher into the air until it will have reached the mid-point towards the other side of the valley it's located in, where, from the rims and innards of the openly gutted frog, a large platform would extend to the other side of a taken out of frame, as to be lifted through a large elevator shaft, to which this frog-bridge is extended to, nigger-cemetery filled with dead filthy-fucking dumb-killed in the worst possible, most hilarious to observe kind of manner, by their own people as well. Be it as it may, the cemetery would most likely be filled with nigger-children that died during their various Crips and Bloods gang fights, resulting into a lot of them dying, most likely so, fatherless. Featherless, niggers can't fly either. Limbless, since niggers can't swim either, an entire cesspool of dead niggos.

Large sustaining pillars going around what seems to be the good frame of a single fallen over arch that would not move from the point it's put in, a weird exemplary helmet-shape fallen over it.

As the beast drew one, it was considerably hard to ignore it, since its head had been but air turbulence if eight hundred and fifty on each side, one thousand seven hundred peculiar growths splattered, bottle-like liquid kind of growths formed a great body of many elongated dark shapes with maw-like upward pincer-with spear coming through its middle shaped like giant bloated crayons, that, the thinner they became at the tip, the sharper the thin-wriggling training dummy like longer pin-heads threw out, with their quasi-reptile but uncanny valley kind of humane splits would there be. These peculiar growth-like formed small volcanoes-bottles with strange thin candle with worms coming out the top of it being set on a great cradle-cranium cartilage Viking ship shape with rounded pucker growths on the side forming leaping legs connected into V's upon which crawled and seen from the front, bearing strange puffy-bloated incisors like close-ups of spider mandibles, conjoined and spread enough to form an almost vaguely recognizable harp form, with its strings being spiked but pushed out to form the same kind of vaguely worming things with faces that bear long tongues at their ends. That look like snail-eyes with bubble-balloons at their ends that bear X's drawn on them with black markers, because of the features being too hard to be recognizable from the distance. Its body, from the front quasi aligned in some way as to look like a deformed cunt with eerily tape-wormed infested flame-candles put on top of a non-existing belly or pushed through. The beast walked in African Nigger chain neck kind of make a ringing noise upon being hit at the back of by the other chained ring kind of manner, or dominos, or a pair of pendulums more likely. Perhaps less candle-like but more shot at the top – champagne bottle like, with the candle being the inside bone cartilage making it push through. Could be bloated, pumped from one angle to the other, in an animated sort of way, or a balloon being squeezed then released, pseudo insect face from the front, or a pseudo-grasshopper face, at the end of the v'like harp, while the entire body of the creature resembled like the fore-front piece of a foot belonging to one of the Ghasyhls' general body composition.

But the beast was afraid, for it was but incapable of comprehending the power of the dark blade that had subjugated and put it under supreme control. Unaltered by power and by the seeping in motions of its swing around motions, it put itself forward, heaving every here and there, with its dark maligned, almost heaving through siphon of lights, which made it ooze around the beast as it drew on. No metal but some flaccid dancing eely-steel, a replica that looked but willed itself to wriggle into sight. It cackles and shot glances spider-like. A dark set of crystals and a pair of arms, all grown in a fattened lump from which sprouted a singer-sting that would but drag itself out.

'I think the car's broke.'

'The car ain't an ATM you damn bastard.'

'Think it's the oil?'

'I think it's fucking diamonds but still no blood money, you utter billboard.'

'What?'

'You're dead, like the doomsday sign.'

'You want me to change it then?'

'The end?'

'Diesel, not that.'

'Fine, as long as I can get you off my back.'

They walked away from the car. In hindsight, it was perhaps the only, way. To fix, it, the car. They had to walk away from it. Its wheels were heads screwed in. With bombs, and spikes, but soft-spikes, whose elongated tendons were used to lynching the simianly made nigger-monkeys that had to be put down and ethnically cleansed because their race was still evil. Niggers were around, they were 'scouting' the car. Trying to loot it, break the windows in. Not yet alerted by the image of underneath the hood of the car hidden niggers that hid inside the car. The nigger-niggers being more ebony skinned, having been expelled out of their hellish realm, where dark-filthy-niggers beaten in the head, chimping around, good for nothing inhumane creatures are born in. Where they suffer for their crimes, constantly being punished for committing the worst crimes, most of the felonies, all of them, sub-human creatures, they are, still committing them.

‘I keep telling you Yank, those niggers want to steal my, they’ll stop at nothing until all my car plates are stolen. Perhaps there’s something here and there.’

‘What is?’

‘There’s a nigger in the hood of one of the billboard sings.’

‘Why does it have a?’

‘It’s a way of saying, ghetto.’

‘I don’t get it.’

‘The hood in the billboard, it’s, it means nigger ghetto in the music industry. Billboard hood niggers destroying music, those monkeying around niggers, they use it as a way to make other niggers more aggressive.’

‘I hate you so fucking much.’

‘We’re buying diesel, it’s a convertible, converted.’

Strange lynching device with coil-ropes attached to niggerthroats, uncomfortably tight, coming out of a strange dome on top a truck, that would act as if the niggers were tied to horses while the dome would constantly spin in place as to cause as much suffering as possible across the entire duration of the execution.

Pump devices with a hole put through at the top, as for a rope to be tied in. Rising as high as a flag while lowering itself in order to give the negro a breather before it resumes lynching him.

A spinner-device, watering the plant on your lawn kind of formation with the ropes being actually rods with dog-catcher like iron wires wrapped around the blackies’ throats.

Highly raised –round tipped staircase or stairway with a move along the wall kind of cylinder that’s guided across each step, as to increase in intensity with a rope coming out of it, adding to the satisfaction of seeing the body dangle from one side to the other while being carried along.

A room of torture with reeling back and forth ropes being taken out from various sides, various walls, out of every corner, being attached to an unsuspecting ape’s wrap-around chicken-downers’, having his throat completely crushed as it’s being actioned from every side and every angle, or at least emulating that feeling despite only a few ropes being involved while the asphyxiation happens.

Giant canon with a smaller canon shaft attached –interconnected by a hollow-line, as to fit a ball and a chain that’s also being lowered through another hollow-empty line, perhaps not two canons- but more of an ellipse hollow addition, a dangerous build by the looks of it, but worth it, as the chain is being dragged along, the ellipse being just wide enough for any possibly occurring damage to be hopefully avoided. The chain being attached to the negro’s throat, as he’s being flung by the fully wrought force of the cannonball being launched. Kind of like a metal blimp without the rounded tip at the other end, and two openings below and above the cabin-like structure that’s attached to it.

Swimming pool with a hidden super-magnet surface underneath a hermetically sealed normally drainable floor, the sink being made out of non-magnetic, magnetism triggering materials, where the niggers would simply be chucked in the water, with their iron chained neck being attached to an iron ball, dragging them down for good.

Helicopter like wings with some kind of thin pillars attached to every wing, churning a power-disc like butter that has, as its center piece, below it, a wider disc that's made to spin in a counter-clockwise motion, both the discs and the helicopter wings being connected in the middle by a great iron pole attached to the asphalt. As to draw away from this strange carnival wheel kind of device, the lynchrope being attached to the wider disc, while the wing-pillars bear shaking-rustling incessantly annoying ringing sound producing rings and other trinkets put there to annoy the nigger as this slow-to medium speed rotation is to furthermore progress into a deadly kind of speed that would kill him in a matter of seconds.

A bed of lynching where the pillow slowly becomes foamy, dragging in the head below as it would slowly contort it as to snap the neck while it's happening, while the nigger throat is being eaten.

Metal champagne like bottle –giant in size, devices with rope-hoses attached to a slightly but not entirely removable tip that has the hose almost drilled in connected but stopped from drawing air inside the giant bottle, drilled from the side then in, like a water tap, then further in was the tip –wooden like bottle holder thing pushed in as to stop air from coming in, which would result in the hole being filled with bubbly champagne that would not only inflate and bloat it but would also completely crush the neck, that not being completely tied, but tight enough to hold in place, while the further end is being kept, open ended, actioned by a man who would put pressure as to open, lock it and allow more air to come it while it's happening, a grip and a pseudo-knot still being wrapped around the nigger's throat at all times.

In a strange box there were a few needles placed, randomly stagnating as if the surface below them forced a few of their metallic bases to melt. And the iron-alloy like thing mixed with nigger-skin which in turned caused the needles to grow and become violent as to commit felonies. In order to proceed, they would have to cry out before each hit, since no one in the least would bother checking. Their spherical nigger-eyes dragged and put through linen-beads, the ground but boisterously flashing with shades of dead-men the colored. Killed and bashed left and right, their lives were meaningless and didn't matter, none at all. What entered through one side came out the other. Niggers being killed and mixed with gun-power, made to explode.

Large railway system from the looks of which, it was turned around and made to look like a curved, oblong at the top o' with a u, extending as to be some sort of deformed planetoid, or half of it cut and implanted in the ground, the iron lines but lopsided on seemingly encircling hills, hollow in the middle, but the trails, dragging in the coffin-shaped depressions, beneath the trails. Whereas one could expect no less, wagons would only travel as such. Even now and then, hundreds of cadavers would lift the top of the tomb and carry the womb-cartel wagon, with all the dead brownies off from one side to the other, slowly descending and growing into land. The mass was only ever so welcoming once the wagons went off the rails, once it was chucked in the moving-sand soil, where the cadaverous had derailed it. Playing with utmost mockery of shaped, emerged a red-clot smeared cunt. She didn't know where she was or how she ended up here, the epistle that is the state of art, it's what the critics called her. Mockery followed, dumb-wench driven into dirt.

‘Will I be settled from this point on?’

‘There’s no one whom might take you.’

One of the corpses said, as he pointed, with a molded to the almost barely standing curved to the right cockle-lamp post. He winced as he played with a floating fist whose knuckles were caporals with molded in the skin. Only their insignias served as a distinguisher from any other humanoid there was.

‘See those wild machines there? We’ve been lynching niggers here all day long, and for some reason I do seem to believe that it never gets old, trying to get as many of them down as we possibly can before their masses invade our land from that point on.’

He pursed his lips, the fists were drying. Already from the moisture being dragged, the caporals being largely, standing yet defying, one yelled:

‘Abandon ship, abandon ship, there’s a gun-wail on the way, I can hear the echoes trespass the land of water and the sail.’

‘Lo’ there is broken, whatever thine call be, I see no point in prolonging this agony.’

Yet neither man could kill himself, it was all too uneventful, and wretched as it were, just about in a second more, it seemed to have passed. Already of a motion that involved a few flickers or skin. All of them tawny-melted, the beast was to appear, as to feast.

It drew on, and appeared to have gathered, a few niggers from around, and every now and then, he almost found himself dragging yonder. A few more chained baboons, all of them but, nothing to prove, surrendered, as soon as it was found out, that some of the machines malfunctioned and there was no possible way out, none that would help them follow. Not right after, and not around. A few inches of dark soil rested atop a dead-ship, a headless whale, a few headless baboons, a few of them bearing large blue flat instead of holes, so much for blue-ultramarine, as it was all gone to waste.

‘Who is the man who painted these pieces?’

‘A dead one at that, and I’ll see to it that he doesn’t live past the day.’

The nature of the dark cephalod was innocuously quaint but at the same time bothersome. It drew on gnawing on the floor, eating a good part of the rotten-but presented on a platter scumnigger fish, which was already spoiled and cast out of the house. A great foundation could stand on little more than a few well-worn put together clever wits. Some good designs put here and there, flung from one side to the other, then left on around. Mathew was one of the first man to raise his fight against the drawing of the light, upon the first strike of the coming out of the cave.

Large gun with multiple tubas-shaped reverb kind of formation shooting an unnatural kind of strapped projectile bullet spread. Out of it drew an unnatural amount of growths that shot and grew tunnel long as they started devouring everything in their sight, encompassing just about everything they could. Not stopping even for a moment before they shook in place, already having split the walls, already having replaced them with a strange tapestry wall of shaped like reverse flag tiles. All of them but tombstone like. With every epitaph bearing an incessantly vile message as well and a poorly written name not there. Not for a while, asking.

For the last century machine was still wreathing back and forth incapable of discerning friend from foe, by the looks of which no longer swaying, haunted-bloated.

Staircase – lyncher

Regarding the staircaselyncher, or at least one of a much different built, this much could be said, simply put there are too many things that could go wrong about it for it to work, not to mention that the type of motion would simply not do well in any other case. One could also look at it from a different direction as to fix the built itself. The main motion required for it to work would in some way have to mirror that of an escalator that's being constantly frozen in place in order for a man to manually lift it. There's too much power being consumed in that case. Another option would be the addition, to each step to some kind of metallic- set in place U' bands in which the rope-cylinder would be dropped inside of. With these U's being set in place in the steps themselves like holes dug in the design. The latter would be most preferable since it would add some kind of thump upon being released into these 'sockets', the thump not only coming from the rope holding cylinder but from the constant wringing of the throat upon being forced to go up and down and up and down in that kind of motion. Yet that would also imply that there's some sort of mechanism on the other side, or in the wall that's lifting then dropping the cylinder into place. Could be that a set of mirrored stairways with U depressions wouldn't hold it in place. Not to mention that a metal claw would have to be manually actioned in order to grab, lift, move further in, drop, rinse and repeat. Too primitive in nature; yet a factory build could actually work in some way. If the motion is already determined to go that way, a large stamping-like machine that would go through those motions as to slam the nigger into the ground, then resume lifting him afterwards could possibly work if that's the case. The motions would be a tiny bit awkward in any case, rather than going along, the noise would be bothersome as well, but. Perhaps the usage of a few conveyer belts might somehow solve the issue.

An upwardly inclined, progressively upwardly heaving conveyer belt would most likely not have enough power to life the lynchcylinder. U-depressions seen from the side of the staircase; the wall could have an outline kind of hole that's as wide as the size of the cylinder that's going along it, with their respective drops into the depressions being there as well.

On the other side, in the hidden, behind the scenes kind of quasi empty spot where the machinery actioning the staircase niggerlyncher, the cylinder has an elongated metallic pillar-like device attached to its end. The conveyer belt could stop on a time. The pillar could simply dip the lynchcylinder in those depressions. In which case the usage of some modified curvatures, kind of like middle to the higher end of the bell curve, to add insult to the injury as to remind the niggers who's doing the lynching would allow for a thinner end the closer the cylinder gets to the 'outskirt or other end of the staircase.

Therefore, this niggerlynching build would have four main components, disregarding the machinery involved into the motion making:

Seen from the dead-shot front of the machine, starting from the left:

A crane-like upward and downward dipping thin pillar that's easily movable by the conveyer belt. It could be a two piece, or a long enough tube to reach and be attached to the ceiling. With the lynchcylinder bearing a hole through which it's being pushed through, movable by a rail on the ceiling and one on the floor; in which case, a small hard-pumping piston that's inside the conveyer belt could bump the action, right into the depression before the lynchcylinder falls back into place.

Power pistons, at both ends, one that's slightly shorter, that's inside the conveyer belt and one that's longer, almost like a tiny pillar itself, at the end of the stairway, inside the U'-seen from the side view depression, where it would force the belt to resume its trajectory. In that case, that would mean that there's one piston in the belt and several for every step inside the stairway.

A few pistons in every staircase depression doesn't sound too bad of an idea either, adding different intensities to the pounding that's about to happen while the nigger is being lynched.

The second part, the belt:

A short designated area where the cylinder is placed in. Could have a pseudo cage as to prevent it from popping out; the belt could have a small horizontally flipped U-shaped, from the side cage. Or just a stopped that would keep the lynchcylinder in place after being bumped by the piston inside the belt.

Then there's the wall, this one being simple enough. The trajectory being guided by the hole that's been made inside it; in some way, one could see it as a circus act, where the entertainer is trying to balance a stick while slowly advancing on the rope. There's no rope here, only the stick.

Seeing how the stair cases have a few pistons themselves, they'd be rather useless; more likely, their only use would be to add some pressure, as for some vibration to be felt.

Not to mention that at a certain point in height, lowering this crane-kind-of-oil-pump machine would be useless, unless. Different sized in depth, stairway depressions. Yet these would interfere with the conveyer belt stopper.

The main reason for this would be extending a nigger's suffering for as long as possible, as to lower him down the floor in order to allow him to catch a break before going back at the much needed automatic motions. An iron cord could do instead of a normal rope.

Could be much more conveniently designed; like a football field, since it's only fitting for the gorillas to be lynched there, two opposite spears, one in the middle where the rope is wrapped around, where the nigger would be drawn and released constantly until his neck got wrung up. But that would not add the pressure the previous device promises to bring.

A lynch stand with a retractable then upward thrusting platform could also work.

Actually the staircase pistons would have to all rise in order to set the lynchcylinder in place in order for the conveyer belt to start moving again.

Possible stoppers attached to the great wall-frame between the belt and the stairs that recede downwardly when the lynchcylinder is being forced down. The stoppers would provide a smooth pathway as for the cylinder to keep its trajectory after being forced back into place, kind of like a gun-trigger, if the gun's pointed at your foot. And the cylinder is the finger, pushed back into place by the stair-pistons.

The wall-attached pipe to which the lynchcylinder is attached to, could be connected to the conveyer belt as well.

A trebuchet that, instead of launching a nigger in the distance, it lynches him; being wrapped around the tip as if it were a projectile; or some industrial washing machine that has a rope tied to a rock inside of it but has a modified lid that allows for the presence of a gap in it, performing semi-circle motions.

Lynching stand that would normally hold eighteen people at a time, but has multiple ropes of different lengths that get released, like a domino effect that keep the nigger in place, release him, then keep him in place, then revert to their pendulum-like motion.

Kike Israelis did nine eleven, Lazar Kaganovich, a kike ethnically cleansed European people at Holodomor. Kikes fuck kids, promote niggers, act like a tribe, you hit one; you hit them all, perfect. All fucking kikes need to fucking die. Israelis constantly kill Arab children for no reason. Kikes have no empathy because they have nigger DNA in them.

'Kikes seem to be specifically susceptible to 'Amygdala Hijack', it would be mightily evil if I used it to bully them every time I came into contact with one. Niggers seem to do the same when one calls them niggers. With the exception being that niggers seem only to chimp out and assault whoever called them by name.

It checks out with kikes smearing people they dislike.'

The use of an engineer would be required for the machine's control cabinet, and AC induction motor for the conveyer belt, an angled conveyer belt.

Niggers act like chimps in groups, turning on you as soon as they're with their own. Need to avoid nigger groups at all cost.

Slight reminder, I should hit a woman, if she steps out of line with the back of my hand, around the area of the stomach or the midriff while taking care that the velocity is kept as low as possible in order to avoid producing visible scarring. I could use a pillow before punching in order to avoid leaving any kind of mark. Hitting the soles of the feet. Need to avoid hitting bone, possibly employ the use of a palm instead of a fist.

A strange cotton-made house, whose but ill-wrought and plenty brought and ill-elicited and after that. Wrought in most uncanny marches, brought from largest of distances, from thence and yonder forth; with little panther-decayed, with skull-but fluttering they sang to it when it came forth:

'Let us sing and listen when time and time again in begs of us to listen.'

‘But who are you, little man, and what have you done to listen to it?’

‘I’ve opened my ears and pulled the plugs and in reality, I did what I had to and I would do it again when the time calls.’

There were so many awful places in the world before they were put down. It felt as if, all of the sudden, all at once, a hundred million raids had come out of nowhere, all banded together in order to put them down once and for all, for as many of them as there were, there was no certainty of knowing whether or not either one of them was real.

In the left-over place, there’s a chaos, such as the one where the nigger got kneed, tiny raised structures, all but primed in place, almost made of a single piece by the time before they were drawn to it. From the initial reckoning there weren’t many if any at all that managed to survive past the collapse. Streets started slouching, muddying with pigmented nectar. Some buildings that had been vandalized, some business preyed upon, seemingly forced to fall in place. Animals incapable of control capitalized on everything they could. They ceased thinking, bearing a consciousness, as it’s already expected. But most of the material which formed the waxing, the yellow foam, the fillings of the frames served as the means for incineration, for the spreading of a great flame which hit them back. Not many survivors appeared to be left, over, although the losses were barely meaningful. They could not have gotten themselves delivered into justice sooner than they had been there.

In the midst of the daylight, the land was almost left to a crumb, like that of a piece of bread. It oozed and dripped.

A great lodged column stood against the tip of the morning. A stone lodged black tooth of bitumen that’s dry. It was approached by one of the first men to arrive on the sight, his clothes bloodied, a man who thought he would not survive.

It was hardly a long way down the slope, it seemed rather uncanny.

Although the bar to which the lynchcylinder wouldn’t work, even as a sustaining piece either, unless it was somewhat inclined as well as to match the set.

How they could so easily abandon everything? After so much time has passed; no matter.

The lynchcylinder device might as well be an oil refinery rig kind of crane put on top of a railway, pushed up and down as the nigger’s lowered then drawn back into place, there’s no need to overcomplicate it. The motions are important. Could be an oil rig put inside a giant wagon that has chains attached to it, dragged and lowered by a machine on top, still on an incline.

After the clay sand

No one wanted to approach the house, being victims of some of them being present there no longer.

‘Someone wailed. I’ve heard the song of his people’s stopping.’

There was only one line of wool above them. During the second reverberation, when it happened, without them knowing, there was as little as one fallen-over-voice that was driven to a stop. It could’ve been forgotten in the falling of the top, but Hymock Lyemnt drew on with no sign. His face was already bloodied from the looks of it, and he stood beneath a table cloth.

‘I’ve fought for my home and yet I’m driven back.’

‘Where were you the night before, when they piled together in a world as taken over, claimed, when they shattered whatever piece of asphalt-crumble, yet before you even had a chance, you retreated upon such high command as you would’ve been forgotten in the midst of rubble.’

‘You’re wrong, I was here, in this place, in this exact spot, I wasn’t hiding, you’re wrong. Incorrect, I would assume as such, you’re a liar, a deceitful rat.’

‘Am I now? If such is the case, how come the dye lays in ruin, just as the one in the Southern region of the markets, where we had been before, where you have stood there in front of it, cackling in the same way as you’ve done. Without any reason behind it, without even daring to have any kind of shame for that, why is it that every time we look, we simply find you in the same circumstance as you have been there?’

‘Is this an attempt to besmirch me with a lie?’

‘There would be no lie there unless you had something to hide? Do you now?’

‘Of course not, and I am going to swear on the great Pantheon of Fajjad that there was not a single moment when I cheered upon the deaths of our people.’

‘Our people, are they now? You do seem to have us slickened to a misunderstanding here, there are no people that are ours. You’re but a stranger to our plains.’

‘But I, how could I be belittled like this and.’

No one wanted to take Lyemnt’s side for some reason. All too struck and all too low, no one wanted to look at the strange device that was left in the dye-hole.

A puddle was there, made out of threads, and in the middle the already elongated wallowing branch-look-a-like to a tree’s trunk tongue was already peeling everything out. Most of the stones were already in shame, covering their faces as they but floated away. It was too colored, with too many glow-through shades, all of them on top the tongue and many drawn faces yet remained.

Sings that came after:

‘You’ll be judged as to be punished and enter thine realm, if you are deemed guilty, there will only be cold inside, as will be the shades. If there is something of a pity, then warmth shall be given instead.’

But no one listened to the tongue. They all wanted to kill him for causing all that.’

‘What proof is there?’

‘You oily snake, you left your footprints everywhere, pay heed to his shoes and you shall understand.’

‘I’m, these are not mine, I swear.

I switched them off with the likes of a beggar on my way to spare some coins towards communion.’

‘Liar, pest, you rubble-brained ingrel!’”

‘Don’t let him escape, I’ve seen it happen again and again.’

Much to stone had gone now by. Little of it formed the outer rims of a bloated king-sky. It spanned in purple.

‘As I was saying, there’s something you’re hiding. Behind your back there’s a, there’s a pick with dye on it.’

‘I got it on my way back, you see, I am a worker.’

Another sentinel-wretch came forward, ever so much closer to him.

‘You’re a liar.’

Much of every house looks like sand-soil hovels with larger conical helmets, with skulls elongated around and open mouths that shot out hammering pumps with oily bloated balloon-ticks with citizen-bodies, whom were beheaded, rotating in their transparent bodies, in patterns of four interconnected rods- around a circular motion in which they were bore through. Puffing out smoke out of every possible sewage hole, a pair of floating organ-citadels could be seen hiding. Walking inside the lower-ground on petty yellow organic put together legs that belonged to antler-king-rat insects they took them from.

Clouds flew towards the ground horizontally and were filled with little screw-shaped little angelic lords whom were dressed in sand-garbs with soil-pouches for their eyes, whom controlled the weather, but only in the lower-regions, where their friends and their brothers, the elongated organ piles with ratoid legs lived in. They phased through objects, but even in the clouds, they were incapable of phasing through these strange beings.

‘You’ve betrayed us for them!’

Iag threatened him immediately so. Before he continued. ‘That pick in your hand, you stole it on your way here, haven’t you?’

‘I have not.’

‘The same thing happened before, when we caught you.’

But they didn’t listen to the tongue the last time, they wouldn’t again.

‘There’s no possible way you’ll get away this time, you won’t cheat or lie your way through us, do you understand?’

‘I’m sorry, I apologize for destroying the dye shop.’

People turned, gathered, took out their ritualistic masks, which were like large dumbbell lifting horned masks with giant melons on each side of the horn, or rather looked as if, hand prints depressed in, spikes coming out of the oblongs as well. With heat-producing vents and veins and spinning circles being created constantly and driven into the outer shapes god-like figures reflected in the visions with skull and strange sceptered-rods in their arms, which were awkwardly placed, as if they only had a hilt where they could grab a hold of them, but the rest looked like a scepter-welded in pile. All too wrong-doll heads attached alongside the end of both sides for every scepter that drew along, dark dolls with horns and large teeth that were hoses connected to their doll-sockets and pumped in little boils that looked like insects crawling inside of them. Vision from their deities, whom were laughing at the crook being caught:

‘Couldn’t work the third time, couldn’t work the last time.’

‘Was there another time he did it?’

‘You’ve no idea how many times he’s tried it.’

‘And how many of them died along the way.’

‘How many people were crushed.’

Cackling all too soon they said, but not a single one of them made it as if he cared, not out in the open, where the pagans would amass.

Derogation machine with large shard-like cutting saws attached to it, with large extending whip-like lassoing device, catching niggers and dragging them in as they’re butchered, with a stop while large outlines, which had already been drawn all over his body, like cattle, as to bleed half-way in the multiple saws that had been aimed towards the regions that had been outlined for the cutting to occur.

The nigger should be placed in the position of a beef cow. And killed just about in the same manner as one, his throat being slightly removed from the back of the, although that would be too easy, eerily so.

He could be placed in a modified cattle head holder, with both sides pressing and squashing as far as they can go. Until nothing’s left, a dead fucking filthy good for nothing dumbled-down nigger-cow.

A harpoon launcher, whose harpoon has rusty jagged edges curved in such a manner as to fully penetrate the other side of a rubbery run-around chimps throat’s trachea, dragging him into a peak-edged would start slowly nibbling on the nigger’s throat, like a small maw gnawing and digesting as it vaporously eats. Acid spewing in the monkey’s veins like a venomous anaconda’s largely misplaced incisors.

Few little house tiles coming into place, some of them were seemingly there, holding all the machines hidden, and wrapped around.

A hot-ironing table with two ice filled water containers on each side, with the nigger being tied to the table while the rope is wrapped around two traditional, vintage hot irons with hot coals that slowly melt through the ice, needless to say heavy enough to not only apply pressure on the throat but also, as it melts through the ice, completely smashes the throat.

They were hidden in the midst of the world, or at the very least where no one seemed to look, as told to.

‘No one’s accusing you of anything for the time being.’

‘You prepared yourselves to have at it, my life being along the way, I think I ought to sit down.’

‘Should he be allowed to do it? In all honesty, this should come as no surprise, his Larynax is but a cry, to tear of his little snout, ought we?’

‘Nay, we should converse with him, destroyer, you’ve broken one of the dyeries, your ‘oughtn’t have’ already passed. What is done cannot be undone no longer, now that you’re caught, all would serve here as such reminder.’

And they were gathered and stood around him like any such pass would do and force around him, leper-hue. Would they have done it? In any either case, not in day light for what is worth it, they could not gaze at him no longer, not when they were lesser, to be called, such as they were satisfied, with such remains. Many men like them have gone through such pains as to have their loved ones killed and neither man would have it, not any longer. They continued.

‘This is a public execution!’

‘Lissen now, he admits his guilt, then I believe there’s no longer something we have to discuss about, I think we all know it. Let us begin.’

How would the execution yet to come?

Brown-dirt-scum in from their eyes, many buildings were lumped, cones were fatter, bloated-pillars lighter and they stacked upon one another. Just like they would be supposed, no longer in trance, no longer as such, and son would have it, darker things yet again they rose:

One Kikzyie drew up forth, his face like a door, flat. With a knob for a nose and little pallid faces all around his cheeks they opened their mouths only to reveal floating lumps inside the huge vacuum that was inside his jaw, inside the region, again, inside of him from that point on.

‘Dark masters of dye, they speak of this. I see, inside the tongue, there’s a message you would not seek to convey any longer, not when at peace with one self and what they burnt in order to get here, if that’s how one would have it.’

‘What are you talking of, Kikzyie? Surely you’re not trying to distract us from gathering about, as to bring justice and jaundice to this man, would you?’

‘Nay, I am a man of great renown, have I not proven myself enough now? You’re a dire heeded, such as there is pretender, do not dare put me inclined, with such pieties as one would be blind to turn to the deeds I’ve done to this community. I’ve fought hard, and I, as is it for the time being until disproven, am no such thing as an outlaw, or a two-faced scum-shrubbery, which grow and spread like muscle in a forest of pine. Much supine to it.’

He remembered a tree with a spine etched in the core of its mass, a part of it with many dancing forest people inside of it, who could never leave the area, inside the groove they were trapped inside. One of these kind spirits cried to him, of the land:

‘Spare us a tear, spare us a tear, it is all that is needed to quench our thirst. We’ve been trapped in here for many a fear, that they might come and drag us away so, beyond the wild thorn trenches, we may disappear.’

‘I feel your pain, to which I say, I bleed you with the likes of which one could not, even for such likes obey that, which is poison for thine soul.

Worry not, for I shall make sure that no dreadful spirit might come to ruin or infest your grove.’

Otherwise of such benign, would he have stood if such were the case and realized, he has done more than anyone could have ever imagined. For the groove was hidden and bastardly, a foreman joined him, if that is such, as it were, his reaction:

‘You mustn’t have fed them. They are slave of the dogged-creatures of the lower regions of the innards inside the Station.’

‘Who are you now to appear as such, queer in appearance, saying such obtrusive thoughts?’

Wretched thine appearance is, he thought as well, not beyond it, put it forth, then again.

‘What have you come here for?’

‘A warning and a sign, you don’t know what these bloated things, these so called spirits, these so called sprites are truly like, you wouldn’t, for the likes of you truly understand anything about them.’

‘Then explain to me.’

Born, in, wretched, wretched conundrum, such a thing that no one has yet but realized.

No man in the city, of which abandoned, the machines and the tongues that would wretch the dyes, being mere extensions, below the earth.

That is to say, in the city, from whichever direction.

Neither man could see it yet, but beneath each dyerie, there was a giant wide depression with many men, contorted as they were, conjuring it from them. But no one spoke of the creatures below. Most of them killed instantly as the dark tongue wreathed itself into existence before either of them could have a say in, therefore, they showed little less and plenty of no matter, such compassion would’ve been but true. Alas, they spoke of evil hue.

‘What is there to say, but less? You are to be killed for what you’ve done, unless, our kind you may impress.’

‘By all means, might I try?’

The man was desperate for anything, even the slightest chance to try.

Less-projection

Not much remains around, definitely nothing distinguishable, yet it was pointless trying to search for anything any longer.

‘I could get use to it, finally. I no longer feel lonesome; I am no longer lonely, now that I am left to my own devices. As long as I am here, as long as I remain locked, by far, I remain undefeated.

Without the means to contort or destroy, without having to bother about being judged, I don’t have to answer to anyone. My life is here, my memories, everything that I made, staying here with me. In my perfectly wrought tower, where my mind could stand a chance not to be poisoned by any influence, at all, here I lay.’

‘And what if they come after you? What if they show up then? ‘

‘I know where I will end, and I can spend just as much time in solitary confinement as I will it. That means nothing to me. As long as I lay locked, I stand a chance to be pure, like them. I don’t have to be poisoned or corrupted by the same degeneracy that flows in my veins, I can be the master of my own will, I can slowly be distracted again. I can just as soon forget.

The perfect tools, at my disposal, and with it, I shall become immortal.’

There was no way back nonetheless.

‘No more second thoughts, no more backpedaling, nothing, if all is right, thine will hast still half a life to go through.’

‘And I shall still manage to live as I will it and must. I will still find a way to, to lay undefeated, somehow. Even if I am disdained and hated by all, as I ought to. For every vile thing and every action I’ve said and done, it’s only fair now. I live; I live the way I am meant to. It’s in my blood.

I sometimes regret the things I said, now. But there are other people like me who don’t. And they get away with it unpunished, doing things that are far worse, and no one’s ever going to know about them. No one’s going to find out the truth at all. Someone has to take the fall; otherwise more people will suffer because of them. One man’s life means nothing in comparison to the lives they destroy, especially one such as I, who has always been like this.

I remember what my old comic books teacher used to tell me, now. He used to say we were all placed here, on this Earth by God for a purpose. In a way, I think, this is my purpose, I believe, at the very least it’s something worth trying. I could never fit with anyone, no matter how hard I tried fitting in. Being rootless, incompatible with every single person out there, I just think. I never stood a chance to begin with, we were always just incompatible, mentally, physically. The people have always been kind to me, but I could never appreciate that for some reason or another.

Sometimes I seem to think that, I truly am soulless, in some way, infested. As a result of no religion, as a result of no environment, of no tradition, but of the way I was born in. Who would've thought? That the only way I could show people their true face was to be myself?

When I was a teenager, I used to constantly stare at the palm of my hand for some reason, imagining an eye being projected on it.

I used to think it was there for some reason, to guide me when I was lead astray.

But now, I have drawn from it, the true meaning of the eye. It is meant to project upon me the most atrocious nigger-killing devices there are, I need to give birth to the means of their extinction, it is the purpose I was made for. Since they will always associate themselves with me, that being their one and true weakness, I shall become the poison thrown inside the well, the disease spreading between them, their shame, and guilt, as long as it's done out in the likes of the ever-watchful eye of man. He will know what to do about them; more importantly, being, other people associating them with me than anything else.'

There could be no other end, no pause to this madness. But what the eye says. What it projects.

The likes of a nigger-killing rod with spinning-around spikes that would enter their farther down ends, splintering them as if a split and a splatter follows after, as they're completely ravaged, from inside out.

'All shall fear the dark eyes inside the palms of the Evil Khazar, all shall know true evil, once fully exposed to the nature of the creature that stands before them.

I am the very essence of vileness that inhabits the kikes. I am their source of degeneracy, for I am pure, and well beyond them. They could not suffer being in my presence, of a much more bodily decaying creature. A rotten god, sickly looking, weak and distraught, a thing of worship for heathens that's deformed. A paranoid embodiment of many broken limbs attached, forming a grave concave pair of mazes, at the back of a wreathed in and out body, that's been toiled with and made to be cast in the darkest pits beyond the likes humanity would even hope to face during their lifetimes.'

No darker essence would do, not even the likes of the cannibalistic dumb niggers could, suffice to say hope to compete with such disdain as there is. As the veins of the dark wreath slouching creature that wreathed itself over could possibly achieve. Its whispers were all lie, corrupting documents, spreading propaganda and disinformation, a tool of mental eradication and complete connivery.

Next to it stood a humanoid thing whose body was a building-like cartilage block if the top had an upward close maw, but made of prison bars, revealing the hollow inside of it. Both arms connected like a waist. Three legs on one side, one on the other; it simply outstretched a single bolt of dark oozing power, drawing out of its chest, that entered the Khazar, pulling out his head, which was then slowly taken inside the being, worn like a suit.

An entire race of these Hlyosiits awaited their companion.

Far too much time was spent in the realm of man. In their dark inception they didn't walk but made appear strange tram boils around them which ate the surroundings and took them where they wanted.

Left behind was the headless body of the Khazar.

But far and far between they reached, upon their journey, a constellation of Earths, all made in part to match one another as if of girth. All feared what happened there, such was it, that they brought a member of every race from across the original globe, but not the niggers, despite the Khazar and the other kikes having nigger-blood in them, being an unholy cross of sub-humanly non-humanoid modern man kind of entities, they had a pass, since they had gotten desperate, after all.

Something happened there, in this region of the universe, this unnatural constellation was made as a result of what language was and has become.

Great sage of lesser tongues, whom was a hollow moving livid-mountain with smoke-like push-out hollow regions at the top:

'You are deemed to be somewhat worthy of the much needed assistance we seek. See now, as for what it is, your doing, wretched humanoids, bask upon your doing so you may not forget.'

It wasn't likely that it would do it, nonetheless, despite not pointing, all could expect to see what it truly meant.

'In all your desires to reach the stars, you've created something of a paradox, an iteration of your planet, of your galaxy and the stars.'

'How?' Another one of the men asked, it must've been one of the hard at thought Slavs whom had joined the midst of the dark regions that had come from far and worth, as it were, he was answered.

'You have spoken, as humans for countless, endless, generations. By doing nothing less and nothing other than stepping on the ground, leaving your footprints behind so others might step onto them, leashing the darkest creations that could ever be gotten or entrapped, causing the death of all who lived beyond you, in this world your actions have hijacked.

In all my conquests and my visions, throughout my endearing, of all, protruding, if all, travels, I've never thought I would stumble onto this. Inexplicable as, is, you do not seem too concerned. The deaths you've caused only pile up, upon each other's worth. You do not want to see what lays beneath the ground.'

'A mass grave, perhaps?'

'Do not toil with hypothesis or what if's. There is no time for that.'

'What is there time left for?'

But the creature-pet only appeared when he blinked, as to scan the entire area every now and then, before disappearing out of existence, as he was brought closer to the dark hour.

Strange hood of a car kind of long trunk with many engines attached to a rounded-twisted wheel-by-wheel facing one another, placed in front of the trunk small back and forth, as the head piece plank attached to this motion forcer, spinner to which a coil goes through at the far end of. A pair of engines working a washing machine-kind of rotation-motioning device that flaps a lynch-plank back and forth, where the chimpanzee-skinned man if but shaken and beaten into submission until his head pops open on either side.

A great wallowing creature with two heads, completely submersed into its body where its every limbs fits as well depending on their location.

No living being was there at all, for some reason, all was peaceful. A little more to the right, they considered running across the streets, while only trying to get themselves as far away from them as possible. There was still to be solid proof of the man beneath the earth, in the locked up place, the sallow feature of a walk-through-the ground as well. But it was undeniable. There were a few escapees that made it half-way through. Limbless in a most salacious manner, many of them just as incessantly drawing blood out of their guts after, yet to align the beads of blood, part of the sacrifice, the lesser-past through left-over, delightful burning of the candles and the bodies they left after, the initial hits. Ritualistic killings, much abandoned.

‘I seek some kind of forgiveness for what I’ve done, brother, but I of all do remember the fact that there shall never be a man like you again, whom would but brush and pace, no other way for thee to see. I cover thee, and pass, through me you shall reach yet higher end.’

Whatever justified kill him as well.

They covered the holes they dug, unlike moles, they only left the inner guts of the tongue, but wreathed out, incapable of making through, not entirely wasted, but past the moment where one might even find, as, hues were left. But no one talking.

‘Whom shall I approach in waste, in vain I see no reason, yet along as I go past, again I see no reason to prevail, not as long as there’s naught to see.

Do you hear me, brothers? We’ve failed in this reverie, even after we’ve been warned. What is there left for us to see as well?’

Who could blame them? No one, the answer was no one, for they feared the sand-covered soil-maker Buccaneer-dressed Pioneers of the Ruby-Mohr, near the salt pile where they couldn’t see the outer reaches of the dead hour, when it approached or made its insurmountable noise, they snapped, rapidly bowing to each other as they barely came to life, it happened thus:

‘Dire earth, there’s suffering happening near one of the pointed lights, will you seek any other further treasure, as to lock yourself in nasty earth, the farther you go down there, in the earth, the less of a chance to resurface.’

A tidy Pioneer said. He was dressed in metal junk, his face-contorted, a skull-distorted, a corkscrew rotten to the impress the outcast of the Dye.

‘What have they done to you down here? Is this a result of digging deeper than the likes of earthen soil, were it to allow any other passing so?’

‘Nay, we’ve always been that way, I fancy, luckily for either one of us, as the plaint motif and rather rancid as there’s still to look, I see no other bothersome toil, but shook when I have seen you come. Even before you penetrated through the inner wall, I could still sense you at a distance coming, I could just envision your unchastely form.’

He was no looker himself. In all certainty, the eyes moved around and crawled. Past and in between they had, all around, and never-clad, would they happen to move this way. Onto the spiral and then again, would one look at the eyes. It was far worse for the incisors, as those were no teeth, spikes lodged inside a thin rat’s tail, but all bone. And they seemingly came out of nowhere and were simply drawn in. Weren’t even forced out a deformation of a mouth but simply reeled between the spaces that drew on from one point to another, leading to a strangely formed neck that looked like a hardened skin-covered parchment thread, a net that’s become those things, emptiness within before a cup-flat depression. It was peculiar speaking to them, especially since it was joined by many others like them. There was definitely nothing there, inside, for a brain, only that wretched pack inside its back and tails – no legs but crawling along. He dreamed of a world that was dead, filled with the spirits of the slain- unborn, the children whose wrath would but burn through the sockets of every man and woman who allowed it to happen and those who had been torn from reality, long before. Where all suffered.

‘It was prophesized in stone, that it would happen in such a manner.’

‘Where to? If you don’t mind me asking.’ Followed Dyer Plehphaff:

‘But do mind myself and my brothers, we’re still bleeding as well, we had to sacrifice many a nail to get here.’

‘I understand but I do not concern myself with pain. Our kind cannot feel any.’

‘Could you at least pretend you understand what’s it like?’

‘I don’t have to, do I now? You don’t understand anything, or the future that’s been told by the torn-out stone, the heart of the ground-worm.’

‘You’ve killed it.’

‘Magnificent a catch, is it not? Although calling it a worm is a bit much.’

A fallen over giant man of dirt, he seems, likely, as to have fallen but was caught between each stone, a well, as well as what had remained of the strange catch that wrapped around him on his way down. No one could much forget that there was a cast of iron- through this forgotten fallen over web he had created, of every root and piece of well, of every stone and dwelling, even a few etched bodies that were caught in the drop, all attached to a wriggling device.

‘We could never figure out what it wants, or what it’s been trying to tell us over the past century or so.’

‘How did you come onto the idea of the fallen that need to return?’

‘I imagined it all.’

And there was no escape from that place either, the moles and the corkscrews, all trapped inside.

‘Brother, we need to settle this dispute.’ Fossorby matched his teeth with that of the pretender.

They were both trying themselves, for as far as they could go on there.

But there was a much darker secret neither of them knew.

For the prophecy was true. Yet those giant casts of Inborn creatures were tomb-giants, in which hid the dark-lancer Spearers whose Shaking-tottering large spears spoke of darker pasts. Until the child-like features of the giants they resided it turned into more animal-like, properly decayed like mushroom domes fallen-planted into the conical dome of what remained of the broken city, once the dyeries were no longer in place to serve as the omens for the future that was to come.

‘You are to blame for everything that’s been going wrong in here, generation after generation and even more so.’

Strange twist of a death-mask, like an iron maiden torture device, but made in the shape of a trench, or a strange case-like glasses holder, with every giant nail- a hose, where ropes are put in and multiple porch monkeys are made to struggle and fight before slammed in and out, they’re forced to die in droves.

A harpoon-launcher with a rope attached to the harpoon, but granted, it would need a lot more power in order to kill the nigger, or at the very least, if mounted on a ship, enough weight to drag the nigger down and drown it.

Domino-graves aligned, with two holes on each side where a rope gets passed and connected all of them, not directly but wrapped around a nigger standing on a chair. Iron spikes on both sides of these coffins as to die upon the effect and the falling-over motion taking place. While, if one negro is brave enough to try something, he would only drag the other directly to their deaths. Much worse than that, it could possibly tip their heads or other body parts inside the spikes.

Three churning giant buckets with plane-like engines inside, with large tips to which three cords are attached, all wrapped around this black-bamboo picker’s soft area, all simply ripping it apart. As they begin their motion at the same time. Utterly defiling the monkey:

The top of a castle and a ladder, the rope being attached to a climber or in this case, a device that would descend instead, like a wagon-but simple enough, designed to be a heavy wooden piece with two joints attached to the sides of the ladder, with some tiny slippery wheels attached to it. A flat top to which a sink-like tip would provide a good area for the rope to be attached to.

‘There still isn’t anything here, is there?’

‘The box?’

‘Of course not the box, not in the, least of all, there’s nothing in its heart left, you can see it prodding from one, one.’

‘As soon as it’s implanted in me, that thing will grant me eternity, at the tips of a finger, at the activation of a single touch.’

Wretched pair of two headed animals with unnaturally put together wrapped around as if on bands of skin, a rib of jelly on top, keeping them together kind of animal tenure.

The subhumanity of the nigger race deserves no sympathy. Filthy animals, all of them, time and time again they prove to be nothing other than sub-human mindless creatures capable only of violence, ruining everything the first chance they get. 'Systemic racism' is a natural reaction and an aversion to nigger behavior.

Whom to speak of the weather-disturbance that happened in there? For if it weren't for the ones that drew, much so. It was shaking, in a dust-mice pattern like of wild dances, flowing through the air in the most unnatural manner, no one could attend to it.

'A breasted beast has come onto our path, and I see no reason why we would see it in any other manner than what it's like!'

It was supposed to be the perfect husk, yet it seemingly came out of nowhere, driven mad, it lifted its talon atop the sky, then swiped his master's body in a few halves.

A phallic spiked object inserted in a nigger-child's sphincter, completely tearing him from inside out, its entrails and little nigger-drug affected rotten organs. Not normal spikes either, but grappling hook-shaped with fish hook sharp, more outward facing sharp points to stick in for as long as possible as they're even more deeply inserted in the other side of the niggylet's body.

'Could there be no chance to return yet, to that place?'

'Can't see a way back, there's a few more steps before and behind it, always cackling after dark, the one that's doing the pavement.'

Chained by two sides on each back-protrusion, especially the ones fading from the looks if which there was never a chance for either side of the road to get away without being shattered and scattered in as many spots as possible after the initial roll-over the top that followed after.

The machine would've most certainly stood the test of time, if there was even a chance for it to, make it seem, by any other way, there was no doubt any longer. Since, from the looks of it, all had lain contorted, begging to be allowed the solace of wreathing back and forth, even for a few minutes, if that made any difference whatsoever. A few more large diametrical depressions could be seen on either side of it. A great cart going coming through; it wasn't, by all means a simple thing, or at the very least, it wasn't simply made. Some fewer sprawls appeared to be knocked together, up and then mixed, put through a falchion, then spewed out of this thin open-ended rod like some kind of cement-mixer, then allowed to push on, from side to side, over the top, this being one of the outer guns that were inside the cart, its wheels not being present either. As this cart bore but four cricket legs, with smaller wheels attached to the joints that forced these front heaving v-metallic legs, the tip being in the front, then in the back, eerily peculiar-kind of movement being put to the employ of it, with larger diaphragm flying around it. A peculiar stray of symbols in, praying with strangely strapped mouths and arms, repairing everything as it was both torn out and put together at the same time.

'A boom machine if I ever saw one, ready to pop out of its own socket at any moment.'

What's it hiding in there?'

'Free-riders, what do you think they were? '

'I did not know, especially since, it's hard, for the weather, either one of us could be lost along the way. The weather doesn't look like it's going to improve any time sooner.'

'Should we wait for it to change in that case?'

'I don't know, we're not doing anyone a favor either, standing here, you know?'

'Then leave.'

'You can't drive me away, no, I think you like me too much to allow for any of that to happen.'

'What gives?'

'I can read people extremely well, especially those who claim it otherwise. Being unreadable.'

'Being proud of, alas, there's but something in there.'

'Lenah, we've been through this already, we cannot follow it. In a way, it is perhaps too dangerous a thing to follow. You just don't know, wouldn't know how to interpret the variables.'

'Then teach me how to do it and I shall do it myself, perhaps I might even out-do you as well, if you're arrogant enough to think you'd stand a chance against me.'

They were unsurprised and had remained so for the longest time now. Since, over the past few months, they've been seeing the most maniacal tantalizing creatures following them around, this was nothing, it was absolutely nothing at all. It couldn't nor would it make any sense to pressure one another into accepting that the world like they knew it was unrecognizable for the human eye. It was finite, tainted, bloated and infested.

'The Simian, I am afraid of him, to him, the life of whom I have detested. I see him every now and then, I fear what he might do to me if he catches me doing something I'm not supposed to.'

'What are you going to do about it then?'

'I do not know, but now, since you've seen me approach it.'

'Shh, what do you mean by approach it? Have you established contact with it? Were you in contact with its physical form?'

'Of course I was, of course I have, you wouldn't know the things it did to me when I was in there, near it, when the lights went out.

It removed a portion of my brain through my jaw, it put in a few mechanical cords inside, then it pushed it back in. And I've dreamed of lynched niggers ever since. I cannot help it, I cannot stop it, it's the only thing I think about now.

It's beyond an unhealthy obsession and yet, I do not understand why it's doing this to me as well. They are his servants after all, or he was their tribesman once.'

'Something must've happened to him, to have this man driven by force out of existence.'

They would not settle with reason either, humans have always been unreasonable in these parts. All that getting to their heads, all that inflammatory tendency to draw and take the life away:

'It inflicted some things onto me, burnt into my memory.

Him, that one, the exact one I dream of suffocating by force. I dream of shoving my knee into its throat, of killing him over and over again. Bastardizing what's left of that monkey by the name of Floyd. I know, the god Simian wants me to kill it, to put the damn beast out of its misery, but lo', I cannot explain why it would push it onto me during a time I couldn't even stand the likes of being left alone with myself.

I've been avoiding looking into reflections because of the guilt I've been feeling lately.'

'For what you've done?'

'Over not doing it sooner, knowing that leaving that creature alone will do more harm than anything out there and anything even remotely touched by it ends up piling into a spot filled with things destroyed. A civilization fading, some nerve endings, something ruined and barely put together, made to get lost. As if history was erased, as if there are people whose faces and identities were stolen by this creature.

The reason being, that it wouldn't allow either one to continue living while it still breaths. This damned simian, this beast. It cannot suffer others unlike it to live. Others who are different and would shove, with such imprudence, their pitiful cause on us; we are brainwashed into thinking, or even considering them as our allies, as our friends, as our kinsmen, until they lump together into groups. When that happens, then the destruction follows. When one leaves his guard down, they will strike. It's animals, as simple as that.

I should've seen it sooner, I should've enacted the means necessary to drive them to extinction, Niggarous beasts.'

'We should leave them, if that's the case, you know where this trajectory might lead us, correct?'

'I know where it goes, I know where it leads to, near one of the moving jungles. If we sit and wait for too long alongside them, the beasts might think we have something valuable on us. They will attack. We shall be distraught as to be taken advantage one. Beaten in a worse manner than animals, broken in place, where we stand, made to waste in such a manner that not even our gods will rebuild us.

I'm afraid. Knowing, having seen, having experienced their true nature. I can no longer lower myself as to be ignorant, in such a bliss as to completely ignore their ever-pressing presence.

Our so-called 'people' expect us to comply with their nature. To make some changes we should not allow or adhere to, allowing them to breed and to spread, to treat them as to a standard, as there is, or would destroy us.

Mass Hysteria would not serve no man, it could only spread like some disgusting disease, eventually being driven back to its master. Everyone's watching for some reason.

‘I’m not going to spare either one of you, do you hear?’

Even if I have to; you should have never placed your trust in me, ha. Filthy wretches, I was going to.

I was going to, I was. I can still have you all. It’s going to take a long while, but I shall do as best as a man can do, whatever it takes, no weakness being shown to people who would attack and kill you like the beasts they are. Even if I have to do it alone; if they can be as self-destructive and turn themselves into mockeries of their former selves, then I shall out-do them, by all means.’

If there was ever something, if there was.

‘Loyalty is worth everything, loyalty is worth everything this world has to offer. Without it, there is nothing. All a man needs to be left with is a cause, someone has to take the fall. Otherwise wretched animals, abominations will take over. Amalgamations without sympathy, feigning it, but they can’t trick everyone.’

Large cylindrical compactor with blades in it, twenty niggers being thrown in at a time.

‘Only the weak and the wretched hide and cower when they know they have the force to drive for change. Only they meek in silence as others suffer, while sub-human kikes promote miscegenation with inferior nigger-like races.

It is unfair that every single man on this planet would stop at nothing to attack the European ethnic groups. Even, doing as much as turning their people against themselves; therefore, it should only be fair that these monkeys, both the semites and the Africans are repaid with the same coin, in the same way, in the same manner.’

There was no other solution, but.

‘A race war, a race war needs to happen. The inferior race of the nigger needs to be completely driven to extinction. These sub-human animals need to get completely wiped out.

Filthy simianiggers cannot even hope to survive the ethnic cleansing-war that’s to come, incapable to think dumb-retarded monkeys! It is time for the 'Holocaust' to happen this time around. And this time both the niggers and the kikes are to be killed.’

Modified Ferris wheel balanced on a larger base, as for the wheel itself to be raised a few meters off the ground. A few drilled holes where the ropes go through, being attached to the horses and other animals, using the same concept, of, lowering and rising the nigger’s throat up and down, with accompanying music. Some proper adjustments would have to be taken in order to assure that the ropes wouldn’t get coiled along the way, or stuck. But multiple lynchings could occur at the same time.

The land was open half-way through.

‘Eventually the dying beast will return, don’t you think so?’

‘Perhaps it will, perhaps it won’t.’

Truth be told, it was hard to actually guess it.

Strangely drawn to a point, as to be inside a straw through, with the help of a great vacuum of force, while being split from four sides and the liquid allowed flowing out of the straw, spreading momentarily for a few moments before being hardened, all four sides of the straw being removed at the same time, having formed a peculiar roof-top structure put on four trunks.

Large four square on twenty five, with some wheel but stuck, between the two of them, beams of metal that would roll in upward thrusting motions, then downward while pointing back. It was completely impossible to see it from an angle. It walked and thrust towards the sky, from side to side, but wrapped around what appeared to be, specks of lighted gray hoops of steel it formed around it, attached to every cervical rounded almost ring like structure there being but key-hole openings that were fit by, what appeared, to be, from the four square on twenty five's, this being actually a kind of split at the half-floor almost platform-building, with the wheels and the many claw-like arms that climbed upon these floating formations, not only by grabbing but by opening, from the middle, if seen like bands, one flat bland in the middle bearing the key-like protrusion, attached to this rectangle, on both sides being two grappler-shaped sides of the great claw that would stabilize the main structure as it would continue climbing. Apparently, actioned by the spinning bands as well as the beam between them that also works as a power station, completely activated by a small engine inside this pseudo building. Which, at all times would remain somewhat still, kind of like a crab formation, in terms of how it tried pinching and moved, although a crab would be incapable of proceeding with these kind of maneuvers. Still, it would continue going to the great placement-point, being fart-stretched over a great eighteen million miles with support pillars – drafted great base where many similar machines are being placed in, this great restorative supply placement base bearing filled with many movable surfaces that would serve as nothing other than the placement heel on which these machines would be placed on top of.

Darkly shaped gun with eighteen hundred thousand barrels with skull-heads that had socket-horns that were like worms with gut-like incisor holes that bore missile shape-innards coming out, wreathing about and drawing breath, every now and then when shaking and getting their snake-like tendril blades that started shaking with bitter-nigger-like nigger-nigger – niggers kind of cancer nigger growths that spread like nigger-diseases that being either Aids, taken from monkey-fucking niggers or crime. As dumb-fucking monkey-niggers have to all die.

Pretty petty clothes waited and stood attached to him. Ready to lynch-a-monkeynogo on a whim, a strange machine with an extending metallic arm, beam-like in nature kind of thing with many put and wrapped around, in this kind of matter, dark things attached from one side to another, belts with human-like tombstone sculpturesque figures adorning every few segmented rectangle line, in which, beneath each section a line of many ropes are being lowered and retracted, from the looks of which four and four, evens, as if one rope wad down, the other one up, eight for every segment, eight Nyiggyis, pushed around what appeared to be the other great beam below, granting it the general appearance of a stapler, with chains dragging the upper side on the lower one as to crush them. Below in, or on top of the lower beam, from on top this metal frame, seen directly underneath the shadows of the Nyiggyis, kind of light lined-about open and aligned cardboard boxes that have metal-frame-rectangle-like shape-mechanisms holding the chains and the Nyiggyis, while there are two main gaps, from where the iron chains appear to drop as well as they perform the main drawing and releasing action. Wheel-like devices as in lowering the bridge being placed on both sides, while, the last cardboard-like hollow rests in front of a squared pillar that connected both of these metal beams, or rectangles that hold the nigs. Kind of like a jumping-swimming board, but thicker and instead of the board-platform, there's this frame holding them together, the empty boxes holding the lynching devices. Or a mechanical alligator head, whose mouth is closed by the chains.

The Niggalligator-mouths were placed all around a building as to form a pseudo-banded hard-squared crown. While, it could be a band, drawn back into the socket as to have even more black cattle wrapped around in order for another batch to be executed; reverse conveyed belt being replaced, meaning that inside the upper frame of the beam, there would have to be enough space, as to account for a few meters or more than that, in order to retract and drawn back every black pulled inside after they're suffocated or splattered.

Strange-two-pointed two batons-aiming for the eyes device, connected to a small engine that's being mounted around the throat and set as to main or permanently blind the target, aimed for Nyiggyis war veterans.

Tender moisture drawing organ within a leprous looking back, it bore, as a phantom cover's that's but coiled around its face and boils, whereas most of them could not stop from this incessant screaming as they're trapped inside. Hundreds of them, thousands even from the looks of it, neither one could live for long unless seen for what they are and unattended as they're hurt, every second but aimed, in reverse, at their master. As if this fascia of put together things had absorbed and swallowed for every second and every man and every being it killed, inside the great piece of girthed growths it turned into a great cover. Many arms trying to reach in but seen from outside like the empty depressions of long arm socks or gloves that push-within. But this thing of whose arms remained the legs, both attached to one another, slightly separated by huge spinning bands that emerge. Dark little piston-like move around motions, weeping; a great head split in half, eyes that could be seen on each side. But with a large almost star-like, two dimensional drawing from where the little things emerge, most of them, implanted there. Spitting circles that become cogs and Cong-men, humanoids with small heads, whose open mouths reveal desperation, no teeth and bloated bellies, for their brains, open up and reveal horns and other protrusions that spread, apart. The strange beast but a belly was, four limbs down, with the split head hard, like two pieces of a harvested and misused crater. Whereas the Congo-men stood between the eyes, of course they weren't true men, but growths that looked alike, soufflé-like spread beneath their waists, with adorning spikes around the circles they became instead. Some winged-like heart depressions in, seemingly pushed around, and thinning out; bloated verdure-muck and boils, wrapped around a coil of singing encased in golden metal, figure-heads and toiled with, for the longest hour.

'Our lords are dying unless we keep feeding them as such, and would it not be to tiresome unless you found a way to poison the rest of the world only if it meant allowing them to live for a little longer while?'

There is but little can be to, for the paranoid, and those who are devoid of emotion and lest would they had gotten the memento of lesser joy.

The room was filled with ceramics and plaster-eggs put in cauldrons, stacked together, with other dead-birds that had not, enter the first of the sub-clavicle formations, underneath which rested the corpses, that were; since the cauldron had a hole in it, beneath which a great cylindrical subway system-like hollow rested, as to say, there was a great push-through, of elongated melted in, metal-pieces that were welded like weld-wires in, with screw-like bolts put around each side of theirs, sprawls as well, forming the great sublevel, that stood between this cauldron. That is to say, there was an area. Where pieces of metals were lodged in the ground, going through the girth of the earth, dug in; there was enough space for a man to fit in, crawl through it, as if it were a pit, then allow himself to simply float through, in that hollow-empty space.

‘It was a near-cave like thing, although, it appeared to be grossly engrossed with papillae-formations of highly-compressed figures that kept everything in check. Arms extended, moved around, as-if-on-rails but only in terms of motions. Bearing picks but armed with four great-set in place-almost forearms with workable arms, and elongating or capable of doing so fingers. Many of them being slowly pushed-through and inter-connected with what appeared to be, the prosthetics that stood above them. ‘ – They were held in kangaroo-sacks, having giant-plated held in front of them, where the forearm and the arm connected where there four apparent forearms were not only part of the plate but were hybridized with the prosthetics to which they were attached. As these flying figures flew from one side to the other of the room they were in, slowly they began cracking each stone and rock they could wrap their grabbers’ around. Drawing into their chests, adding more as they dissolved everything; somehow it grew back, sharper, much more perfect than before; highly jagged-edged.

And they flew, as malignantly as they could, incapable of stopping or preventing themselves from acting in the way they were.

Engrossed, rather, as it was observed, by the fact that, they were puffy; oozing-growing-shrinking, shaking-vibrating, while doing the things they were. Sometimes they seemed to splatter against the walls, gelatin eely, but without a nursery of tendon-branches which could be seen up there in the dark. Many nay pins were below as well, among the rabble. With so much more of the groundwork being lain the way it was, stepped about, being closely observed. Prepared, it had been prepared for someone to walk in. To step with their pretties, soft and tender, made to rub it in. Despite the presence of pins and rubble, gray puff, as such, there was clearly something in there preventing scratches from being created of gotten through with. Not before long, it could be observed that someone was in there.

After digging in for a few seconds, with the soles of one’s shoes, the inevitable would happen. A man hiding in there with an ugly face; whose deterioration has been made even more noticeable by the very fact that he hasn’t eaten for days, or bathed; being assimilated, but violently by the means of his wrist having become his fist now. Must’ve come from somewhere beneath him, relative to his spine. Where, whatever entered him not only made its way through, a lump that must’ve been it, a dark lump that was spiked, a fleshy shell that swam through him; dragging him down, but done in a systematic manner, a surgical precision as well as a push-through, in such corners that would be impermissible for one to reach into; was made into, or turned, to shrubbery. From inside-out, Aloe Vera leaves. In terms of a contortionist, but at the very least he didn’t bother anyone, he was only stuck down there, incapable of moving.

Dark cove, underneath a great surface that’s slightly obscure; or a semi-lateral plane that’s but alike but put forth, under much worse and harder-to-look at; prayingly holding each side, like holding hands wretched by time alone that could not get worsened by time. And they held him, trying to achieve, something-akin to the destiny of a lost field that were to get burnt. While ashes and specks of partially swollen grass blades started to refrain their flights. Instead they traveled forth towards a girth, in the middle brought, where, as to face it, towards which, all of them contorted. Many of them wallowing as they shook, and turned, towards it, growing as well. Rubbery-ruddy in appearance and almost broken apart. Such was the cove-the great organ, slowly bottled up as if the top of its case had been, in actuality, open like a lid, drawing it out. Much of the air trapped in. An idyllic sustenance; that disregarded all, drawing from anywhere and everywhere around, all too perfect, this creation. Oozing every corner, adorned with ringed-like shapes of harder belts, each wrist but drawing towards the incantation; yet there was none to be heard, only the thing in the middle that moved from one side, each girth adding up. Releasing it from where it stood, admonished, and brought. Back to where it stood, in place, and littered with lesser demonical heads, seemed to be the lower-thing. Much to their long-tongues, open on a whim. An inverted, almost funnel-like absorbed cone, a hive that was worn; but no limbs, only the grass things and the ashen-leeches, and the pseudo-arms that were connected to it, at the top, from which the heads were released, at that. Though it would be hypocritical to ignore the praying things, as they were armed as such, the semblance was superficial, nothing more at that. Larger, smaller, darker holds; from the mouths beaded girths, pushing out, much wider than the heads themselves, once allowed enough time outside. Each direction, from here on out, they released. Many such beauteous tips, like lances, a few at a time; they didn't come out of the caterpillars themselves, or not from exactly the front.

Although, rather, the entire structure was more of a benign- deformed with an malignantly incessant tumor-head at the top, great cone held by black-coiled ledges, making sing in the main-shape. Faces along the cone, out of them, the great haired-caterpillar forms, growing and releasing the –shoot in all directions kind of spears, tickling the dark things that either appeared or disappeared; a nasty thing it had produced. Echoes of dark that were barely understood; yet this hidden under-cove in which was stood, there, in front of it, from its point of view as well, no longer and no less than one of the shortest spreads – a tunnel that could barely be seen as follows. As if it were dug in by the battering ram made out put together hands praying for this beast to be gone. Like two clams caught in a battle, attempting to hold one another, outdone, a slight reverse denivelation – as for an un-winded non-straight placed protrusion –upward. If the ceiling and the entire short tunnel was straight, or an insides-of-a-worm cylinder of a few meters, or hundreds of miles, one of the clams would be flaccid it not both, being curved on top the other, or forced bent, dented to the right. Short clams at that, perhaps not a dent and not a rinse in the middle, it would be hard to tell. Otherwise, the left side of this tunnel, as seen from inside of it while also seeing it in the head, would be a clam fully extended – the left one, resting on top of the right one, who's but shaped like a bean kissing in, swallowing the left one's rounded belly or the end of the tip instead, a long cut-drawing along the tunnel's trail. As, from the chamber of the ice-cream like, or more conical turnip-girth, the hollow-emptiness of the room was that of a onion, an onion shaped door, passing through.

Leading to a much father, as to go in, farther and much further, forming a hallway, with many such chambers, where they were kept it, these formations, living formations; and every single one of them was fed. By whom, one might ask? A strange thing, a pair of bandit-men; carrying a trough-targe but like a wagon-desk tri-dimensional rectangle, in which they stored everything they harvested from outside, or, more, rather, the Bandit-Triangle, made of bandits, slaves and the bosses in charge of them.

Diamond-heads forged in yellow tubes, but only two for two and overlapping, not entirely molded. Pseudo-teeth being formed as well; Melankthy Fyor, he was, unattached. Diamonds but partly cracked in shards, with longer rain-fallen girthed trails of many formations added to each one, drawing from around them, invisible forms feeding them instead of what the bandit-men brought. Many of them avoided contact for some reason. Bloated-dark blood-diamond packs of girth eely meat that oozes. Like two bananas, stacked, whereas their darted tips became even harder and much greater than before at that. Sprawls or hardened lies sprouting from both of them, in every possible direction, towards the walls, towards wherever they could grow and in whichever direction, as they only bounced back and in-between. Like black lightning banana-tip sprouting channeled bolts spreading along wherever they could aim at, or neurons drawing and releasing air from inside of them, no longer capable of stopping. They fed only through the arches, growing even deeper as they began to feed, whereas the anaconda-swallowing-humanoids motions only followed after as well. Lung-like inflated motions followed after for both growths. The teeth-like cartilage being eerily familiar to each slit. From the distance they seemed sutured together. No one entered their room.

It was clear by now that the Dark cove was the body of a giant whose fallen in the bowels of the earth, as from an avalanche, quickly after buried alive without the least of hope, as there would be after.

And there stood, before them, on a great swing of many barely put together branchlike forms, all set in place. A great net-nest, out of a boat-like, with jagged edged harpoon tips, and every side of this net-like formation, bubbly one-segmented finger-blobs coming out of the syringed tops of the tips, that kept the branchy formation as for the lower growths to occur-tree like as in piles of bushes lain beneath them. It floated around, leaving or projecting a circular shadow on the ground, wherever it went, at time, one could see, depending on the angle of the sub, Indian-tents coming out of oblong, whereas the smoke coming out of them would fill small balloons. Although hard to make, the growths beneath the small area around which they're stacked around would encompass most of the shapes, or at least the ones' – bubbly-tents that at on the side, if it was close to a, the time when the sun it up, facing it from an incline? If it were drawn on a paper, it'd look like a small cut-off pocket, which had cotton trapped beneath it, sticking cotton that won't fall off. Chess pieces on top, but bearing iron shark-fins behind them, attached; these flying platforms coming or heading up from just about everywhere one could stare in the direction of. Endless flocks being forced to draw, alike, together, in clusters. Trying desperately to eat off the flying giant locust-hares, with interlocked joints carried by vulture-carrions, attached and with their wings but formed into leaved puffy clouds. Bearing the top of their beaks, as they're become wings as well as spread and inflated-puffed. Interconnected as well; of one piece. Gliding instead of being set to flight; a clay thing of a single shape with an eerily-strange movement of its lower legs that jerk around. A giant meaty seed connected to a thin at the base elongated mushroom, with jerky-sharp jagged legs. An outlandishly sharp- self harm towards the top leg-projection; although no ears – as for the rabbit-sack. They would float and fall onto the netted-platforms where they'd rest. Since, incapable of flying, this gliding making them, sink-through-the-air spores-or fall, like them.

If they had fallen, or touched the land, they'd die at any time. Various amalgamations stood there, resting in place, hardly moving from one point to another, as they were, the tops, surrounded by upwardly heaved as for Champagne-bottles-aimed at your toes– corkscrews for them, with unnatural spear-shafted, although the corkscrew out of the outer-lower rims of the amalgamations were more like ziggurats – as for the structure, out of the middle rising point, which looked the form of a sand-hill pie, with a sharp eely-tip dangling about and out of it, moving around. The tip was raised beyond the region, in the air which was surrounded by the corkscrewziggurat. Although, and it was a tip because the body, which was much fatter was inside the meatypie amalgamation looked like a tube-filled-with-water; a test tube, but the innards of the eely-tipped creature resting in it. Organs being stored inside this organism; while seen from above, it looked like a big softly rounded beautifully shaped female breast, from the side of which stood a metal-two-dimensional maze. Or a circle with a maze drawn on it. With the middle dot being the eely thing; the base of the eely thing being a few meters stored inside this trapped maze, while, beyond it, a few meters as such, the sharp eely-thing would wriggle around in search as if for flies, but aiming for the slowly descending meaty hare-vulture spores, the fat-round heads, coming to feed them. Of course, the metal maze, whose properties were that of iron, would violently melt them as soon as they came into contact with them. Since the porous surface of meat would slowly digest, hence the sandpie, moving sandpie property would swallow everything as to feed itself.

Disgusting organisms, all of them; violently stealing food from one another, barely being capable of surviving, the highly tipped worms but being parasites inside the maze-screwed breasts.

It was hard to look at the other one, which was flying. For the greatly elongated-projected on the front, a few meters beyond, while two arms simply entered it from both sides, as if this rhinoceros of sticky clay was caught off guard and pulled from both sides until expanding to the sizes of a fully grown deer adult's antlers. Back of the fly-growth molded with the rest of it. Hands fully extended while doing it, as if mimicking 'magic' in front of a child, inverted or backward claw-motion, fingers fully extended out of shock while covering your face and your eyes, or various other stretches. It was left without sockets. Seen from the front as well, as if it had been rotated and the rhinoceros was staring, the same as the other thing, at the toes. Its horn having become a kite-like bloated string, or a smaller bloated tower; a pseudo uglily deformed axe bearing a great bulb-growth on top of it. With its teeth outwardly protruding, down, near the base of, the structure, surrounding the bloated stick; more of blunted axe, with its side having become hammer-like, war-hammer, oyster-clam on the left.

They've been following the cavalry over the hill for the last eighteen months; time announced its beckoning call for a rest. It could only propel itself no further than the hours they lacked, during their manic insomniac starvation, as open-crevices drew from beneath the earth; dragging them along. Some silent reed-compressed ankles, at the bottom; fat, pumped up and down – churned around. Deeper, first came one of the drops, sinking much deeper than that. Some bubbles could be made out in the dark, but they were all already fallen, and incapable of running back. Now stuck, every man stared at the motions.

Hlamathollks stared out of his deep-sand stroke-contrived visor; he had been aiming at it for the past fifteen minutes or so.

'See anything under my light?'

'Barely' But that was a sublime lie.

It had kept something of the hill they followed on. Many of those; being as widely spread as possible, until they froze-stuck a few feet off the ground, when all made less to no sense. Gaps of a few meters, from which you could see some unnatural substance dripping off them; splashes being there, contrived to what appeared to be an arm. Stuck in an attempt as it was trying to grab a hold of it, in need of much volatile strength as to pull the bathed in body attached to the rest of it; whatever it was down there, they were covered. Skeletal armors, much to the entire and beyond the width of the entire body they were in. Their overburdening weight dragging them down; but if one were to look at them as clearly watch them, what they truly looked like with all the clogged in pools removed. What they had become instead, since they were once men.

Legs were made of one piece ever since, as were their heads, in a dragged along pile. Most likely, it was their ankle-teeth growths which had become those pumping things that went back and forth. Through them they'd breathe. Still. It would seem like this exoskeleton of theirs was far too derangedly broken and bombarded by the pressure that was being fully absorbed by the incessant thumping caused by the swarthy pumps that went along.

The pumps being too soft and jelly-like to fully become thumpers, they're mostly livid cartilage wrapped around bone. Taken from the leg and arm joints while being implacably, in an equal manner, shared between them; while the arms well aren't truly arms, but forearms attached to what's left of the exoskeleton encased torso. Still, they try holding on the sun-down shaped floating hill.

'I finally found a way, I finally found a way to break through it.

Now that I've stumbled upon a fix, upon a resolve, I can't be stopped, no more being dragged through dirt. No more being mocked about my failure to understand why or what I've done wrong.

I finally found a way to fix every god damn thing!

It doesn't matter any longer, whether or not I or how many people I've yet to anger, no. I've already reached a point where I know what I must do in order to stand a chance. No one can ever take this away from me, you hear? No one!

'You're still arrogant, are thou not?

You've yet to produce anything that yielded such results, to make such a thing as plain as to be understandable, comprehensible, to make sense.'

'So what? I finally found a way to consolidate everything, I finally found a way to lay a strong foundation, and I could never have done it without all of this, despite your lies, as for something being incapable of laying on it. I've still managed to find a way, and I shall rub it in thine nose as much as I so desire until I will have fully and properly satisfied my desire!'

And somewhere lost in the depths, for such likes and such dark places that not even the weakest and most spoiled of heart would look into after that, rested a simple man, one plain of head, by such pillar of spine, a hulking body kept in.

'Victory under all circumstances; there's nothing else in life!

And I shall find a way to save every drawing and everything I've made, and I shall find a way to pick up from where I was left and pick up from behind as well!

I shall win under my conditions and mine alone! I won't allow either one to die, not while I, of all, am still young, not when there's still power, and a drive left in my veins!

Tribalistic drawings, all of them but inky-black; many of them seemingly malformed, many of them wreathed, twisted, and made to bind. Put together by whichever mean. Strange limbs from whichever point, erupting, many heads twisting erratic; one of them was their servant.

Bony-like, and walking on four legs, with red-spoiled ribbons, rottenly open insides, a skull upon which the legs drew on. It bore a blade of living eely red, which jerked around, a headed-horn instead and the face of a rotten by disease, and globes within sight. Chains being dragged between its feet, the wretch; living but near the sea-side instead. In a partly sunken world; it rested.

‘It’s my one good chance at beauty and at putrid, why have either when I can lay claim to both?’

I may lay claim upon all that I want, and I shall not easily be stopped, not any longer! Not now, not when I’m so close to catching up! I won’t waste away!’

A dying god from the looks of which, only a greater, smaller piece of it resisted through the truce that was being kept, maintained. Not to thread on him, or pass the blame, beyond such means, as the pastoral manner. The whole thing was falling over itself, incapable of fending off the killer-parasites whom, upon being fallen over one another, insolent cackle and perditionous suckle following through, only now had they began wailing and calling for help, yielding to naught else but time. But why?

Bug people said so:

Eighteen servants would follow the dying wretch, fifteen hundred meters tall, curved in the back, as if a black hole trailed them from close-afar, a few meters off their bodies, in which they would constantly be absorbed into, although there was no such thing a black hole, their bodies tainted, drawn inside, then release, in part. One could see as such, their intestines being ripped, beyond reset. Their faces appearing at their feet, then back in place; horrowsome, bothersome, trying to move aghast, incapable of getting away, such was their bothersome nature, of such thing, as lust.

Hardly were there any left.

Surrounding them, a darker belt.

Shleghuimar, whose rotten face stood dire upon the hour, asked upon the first one that drew along to open, such were their cast upon their brows plates, standing, farther, much closer than tinged by their wings, that erupted from both sides of its head, insect in appearance, chitinous shield exposed, but fallen beyond the jaw, grown on chest, and on the lower bodily melted frame, upon this strange armadillo stretch behind, in which six and six legs, both, hid inside. Was there a great set of false limbs, acted by electron-rings of metal that had been forged inside, open in the middle of the area within each other’s yet sublime spherical door, stooped out a fragment of poured forth stinger, twice as long than seen before. Though there was a space, whereas the chitinous embrace split in half, the upper-helmet and the armadillo bunch. Each ring could not have gone much farther, two at a time, whereas the nipples were set, on every side. Segmented as to break and place them. Still, the false limbs were nowhere near the areas from which the stings had long erected. They seemed to come from both, and side, instead of arms, and legs, they came, to ride, weakly though this skimpy flea. Had plenty more, it had stored in sea. Where it lived in near, moisture-home made of wrought along, unkind dirt, and oyster boil. He was visited one day by mighty angler, whose backpack, a reminder, that, what the giant crickets were after, was but a giant cranium of their own. Was he the one who asked for rings? For he had seen some sparkle, bestiary of wings and stings, he kept at home, traded with the mad angler fish and stone. A few quirky pebbles were traded, nasty well-welded, was there as such, in the middle of his house. A dark eye projected on the ceiling, weeping for every single well-forgotten frog that wanted to come in but never left, as well as thin. Was there a day when they would come? As such, would they knock?

Both were stood by such a chair, that would be nearer, had it gotten back beyond repair.

Each false-limb drew one of the stings out. Carefully clenching on it, with puckery delight, a rubbing such of moisture would rip away, whatever might there be in doubt. There was such stare, as they would have it wrought.

‘Pretty, isn’t it?’

He was moved, for he had fished it, himself.

‘Where was it brought from? I remember such time, when I used to be, such witch subdued, upon the, wails, of me, to be nearer. I have stumbled upon such thing as it would come one day to appear.’

‘Where?’ The angler asked Shleghuimar.

Who pointed, immediately without concern; he lived out there, in sun-a-moon was, two and four. All connected, of a great dark piece. Of twilight but of little heat; all but painted in red, orange, then, to feel it, would mean be up there. To live among the ones that, sullen are, smile and bear; being in the presence of slouches, of whose black glances were the darker days. In which they gathered and formed eyes and veins, that, were they moustache, upon the grater crater fields, mouths and a nose and brows, and teal. Such was his home decorated, but Shleghuimar would not return. His servants mourned his lost revival. Butchered was the kindness, home. He was home now.

‘I lay in dirt, I seek no travail.’

‘When will you go back?’

‘You seek to steal my house then?’

‘When have I given that impression, friend?’

‘You’ve come for me once and you shall come for me again.’

Then he pointed at one of the darker shores, where he could see that, he had been brought back during a time they missed, peace was not brought back.

A pearl was there, giantly glowing. Emerging from a beaten down palm, of such beauty it was, such greatness run.

‘Shall we play a game of crossing?’

‘Down the sea?’

‘I’m thinking.’

‘Still mad at me?’

‘I wish we would not talk of such, things, now, if you don’t mind.

I need not be reminded of my loss, you’re an angler after all, and how would you understand?’

‘I’ve cross path with many fish they called my feet home, underneath the deck, the bowels, in my boat-sinking, vowel as they’re quiet in the chirruping of seamless gulls and galleys, they want to eat them by the ears, more.’

‘Are you not a liar in which case? I’ve heard of fish with legs, but. Never had I heard such lie. Is there something your petty mouth would not defile, in your search for attention?’

‘That’s but a misdirection, their leapers. I’ve seen plenty of them that way. And many of them with ears, they had stolen along the sea. When, on their way towards a much bluer paradise; but you spoil me, as I think of you, whenever you come back.’

‘What do you want of me, and what have I given to be brought to such commodity; I hear little more than sought after, at that I needlessly ask for you, will you come back? If I shoved you back with your friends, beneath the sea?’

‘You’re kind, but I’m a pretty. I’m quite petty for an angler, is all I mean.’

‘I wish I could be you, sometimes, that I admit. I wish my memories gone, sometimes. Shoved as far away as to never return and never come back. All I am left here is with this evil eye that says naught to me.

He governs my life, but I’m also reminded that there’s nothing to see.

Such is it that I despair, prideful as to ask them out, who is out there?’

‘Are you talking to someone in particular? Can that eye hear us as it sees us, where we are?’

‘Not that I’ve ever known him as such.

He is my friend, I believe the lies he’s telling me now.’ For Shleghuimar is the only one that can hear the drearily miss caught by the torrents, as of air, felt by frail rejoinders that had stolen his heart away. Leaving it awry, in a place, beyond space, in the Conclovince of Mithrithnogg; where they still shatter bolden braziers and wronged upon, leper songs.

Behind the pearl hid a dark monster with four necks ripped apart and forming asterisks with stings pushing out in front of them, forming a circle, interconnected by mantis-like blades, each of them bearing various geometrical formations that pushed outwardly, fifteen meters away, then inwardly, crisscrossing one another. The circle was bizarre since it was formed out of the asterisks projections, as was the see-through cone. But behind them lay, in the middle a tubular-snail-fat hose formation of heads- like clay covering a filled-with-water condom, humanoid heads with an even longer satellite-thin black corded tail that pushed out of it, all aligned together, forming a strange thing that spoke only to blind people through telepathy.

The poor monster, this prideful creature had been forced into this contortion by unknown magics of malformation and circus-play. It kind of looked like a bloody fat-tipped spear, but in a kind of Burning

Man kind of effigy made style. And worst of all was the fact that it grew in love with this sublime pearl, but it could never kiss it, since such an act would require a perfect control over its own bodily motions, as to angle itself in a way that would facilitate it to finely move a few inches into an awkward angle, where the heads-along-the-pillar were. And it could only awkwardly turn despite its apparent flight, unless it ought to go for it and risk shattering this perfect globe, it'd better stay in place and out of sight.

'I don't think Israelis are smart, I think Israelis are fart.'

'Marvelous, the critics will love it.'

'But all the critics nowadays are faggots and I just insulted their faggotry.'

'Do you suppose they'll ever recover from it?'

'Only through conversion therapy, I think. But Christianity can fix anything, I think.

Even the control of the media and the Art houses.'

'What was that about faggots?'

'Man, I'd sure love to bash one of them with a fucking swollen rock, does stone work out ford?'

'What's them faggots in the media?'

'What's with the niggers and the kikes? Oh and there's women as well, we're basically going fully-allowance and inclusion for every mental invalid out there, faggot-mental invalids as such, being put in control.'

'You've become quite insightful.'

'Unlike faggotry.'

'Well, how else could we study pedophilia?'

'Perhaps, don't?'

'That's anti-Semitic. Because Jews molest children, they fuck children, they have their way with underage children. Jews are pedophiles, it's what I'm saying. They must be schizophrenic or something because they just like fucking kids. That holy country of theirs must be a 'Harem' of fucking kids. It's where they also send their American kike pedophiles as well. Bernie probably fucked kids as well, fucked? Fucks, still, yeah, most likely does; but you know what I hate?

I loathe niggers, these disgusting, destroying, smashing-all-around-them assaulting people, property-destroying monkey-niggers, these monkey-monkey chimp-chimp on nig-nig needs to be stopped!'

Luckily for us – pen name.

We're a bunch of authors, with different styles. And different things to say; all under one pen-name, living in the States, they'll never find us, at all. Don't even try 'home-boy'. We're untraceable. Ghosts; give up, don't even try.

‘Yeah, we are the Iron Guard! The legionnaires! Fuck the kikes! Fuck the niggers! Fuck women! P-E-A-K! Baby!’

‘Oh, yeah, baby you see me go free,

Running around this ugly, dead city,

I don’t want to hide, when there’s so many houses,

The bitches are free, and have so many blouses.’

I’d like to take off.

‘You’re an awful singer and an awful person.’

Whose head was a darkly-daft torpedoes with twenty runaround his own head, specks of shards that drew in and out of his head.

There lay the dark swollen beast, whose strange motionless body was that of a rotten fist, but whose cisterns on either side, started again, trying themselves.

Sign hand fat inside an open crab, that growth, as if it held a pencil in its mouth but become a police officer’s alcohol test tube, drawing out of the body, into a giant flaccid balloon but party cushion, that’s actually a lump-womb, it were. A giant growth with a single muscle cartilage pseudo-forearm with a small puffy meat cartilage cloud with elongated spikes, as for the ‘crab’ legs, but no pincers, more concave, like a big palm. But each of those rounded conical things at the top, whom appearance would borderline a street lamp, but ropy lowering tongues, all coiling and lynching the nearest blacks that came to view and round. Hidden beneath it, the back side of the great decimator, a twist of coils, upon which tracked, many rows, all attached. But like a giant tooth, framed like the lower side of a hot air roped balloon and the pseudo Vietnamese back carrier of a basket. A deformed drum, attached to a fat island. It was a growth.

It was a giant ugly cadaver-man that sang ‘Li-lu-di-di.’. That had metal arms, that held, onto one another from as far as one ledge to another.

Two, standing side by shoulders, drawn from the highest peaks of the Heaven’s first try to take back its once lost child emerging, from, below, the peaks of where he stood, and rested in her child’s heavenly nest, where ended, part of her journey’s come. During a time whence she had known, whence lie. Most beauteous of fallen ones that stood, the ones that Heaven itself misunderstood, not father of lies, but one not spoken of in the laughter’s cry, whence and long before time itself had a say whence trinity was lain, and they, of long forgotten songs remained, mourning the songs of heaven, fallen. They had stood, amongst each other, painting her in laughter’s end. Such a time, never to have kempt such face, as was her weeping at her child, when he had come, and lain aside, both resting. For the longest time, when lain in peace; as everyone gathered, father, and alike in kin, to mourn as well, now both of them joined.

Still, devoid of a soul.

Flinger like motion device made to be like an upwardly concavely curved land bridge with two piston power chuckers flinging the thin-line connected between the two sides of the bridge-formation metallic ring-like thing the lynching rope and the nigger that's being lynched is attached to. Two parallel devices.

It's a cable-car like device, an aerial ropeway but more of a cargo ropeway since the nigger serves as heavy weight rather than a human.

A simple mechanism, where the metal ring which also goes along interconnected, or has them wrapped around it, from one side of the stretch to the other, powerlines, that's supposed to be 'launched' from a bridge-like adorning the curvature of a round hill, steel rail, that's cut in half.

The two steel rails are separated, and adjustable at each end; as so 'overshoot', since they're separated by a few meters, lain between them. The ring, which has a wide enough diameter not to miss, although these 'powerlines' wrapped around it serve as a back-up mechanism, is supposed to land inside this 'area' where it may continue its trajectory as to go through a downward trail. Pistons may not be required to bump them; speed may be the deciding factor, as well as strength.

A rope's attached to this ring, and the sudden spike in height should serve, as well as the possibility of the rope getting in the way, as an extra-adding factor to the nigger's suffrage.

As a matter of fact, these special long-cylindrical thin pistons that may be attached to these rails while also giving them appearance of a pseudo-half harps might actually end up working.

This can't work, it's missing something.

A schism; a normal the cargo ropeway will have a ring device carrying the nigger along after he's being shot through it. While a power, cylindrical grip but more squared that's reattachable to either end replaces it. Like a leaping chainsaw motor that jumps from one mounted steel rail to another. Whereas the starting pull handle, choker coil could be framed on either side, by a support metal ladder formation hanging on top the steel rails, to which the 'powerlines' are attached.

It's mainly meant to leap and lend a kickback to the nigger while he's being choked to death.

Of course it's not an actual ladder, since the four support 'powerlines' still need to be attached to them, but at the very least they should be aligned as such. A ladder without the steps;

A lynching machine like a jumping roller coaster, but it's supposed to be safer.

A roller coaster car wagon with a lynching stand framed like a guillotine, eight or so stands framed in the car. Four Handcuff-shackles attached to every single one of the guillotine lynch-stand, as to grip and hold every single one the nigger's limb, causing him to jerk back and forth like an automatic paddle ball device as the car keeps threading along. Perhaps a more curved, lay-on-back style, as to offer a pseudo-streamlining kind of design. In this case, the rope would have to be much looser as to extend his suffering as much as possible, so as to prevent having his throat snapped instantly.

A cable car compact bodied creature with a Trachea bloated hose growth in the front, bearing a giant transparent eely-jerky, filled with orange fluid sack in which hundreds of niggers twitch and drown.

The great valley's stretch bore a large incline raise that lead into a high rise that bore a giant man-cartilage sack of one piece, with a sutured dark eyes and sutured dark teeth, a melted mushy face. Which had his friend, a floating bloated formation with the lower, underside of its body an oblong compact-fridge squared blimp, from which a towering meaty lighthouse stood lodged in it, bearing a long almost dark-bloated avian with puckery-dark eyes helmet with strange markings on in. That spat rape-corpses out of various edifices.

But lo, in the distance stood the two black-bloated conjoined giant twin flies, each bearing a single eye that was a long-interconnected between their ocular visors, tube shaped like many aligned fetuses. But they wore a single bloated head-of a bull body-framed pseudo torso but the horns were two giant dark botflies with dark pus inside of them, oozing out. Covering them rested a dark-silk like shield with many flat-toast heads ripped off from animals, thousands of them, transparent, yet their eyes were ever-open. Also on one side beneath the worming-squirming horned beady beating botfly like things, rested a pulsating hive-shaved organ.

Dark cut-in bloated bowels drawing each other apart from a point they cannot stand each other, stood a dark helmeted in run-of the mile.

It helmet, on top the giant armored chest-long mass, was a helmet formed as two shoved-in thumbs, whose united nails were a crystal bulb emerging there, a face cut in half, many teeth adorning, much to its surroundings, lest of all, a ring around. A Doberman-houndish thing, an elongated egg, overall, with jerky ropes holding it in place, jerking in the cog it was planet in side of. Its two 'humanoid' 'arms' being two giant stump tubes fused within its chest, downwardly producing black-air, but no gas and no smoke, instead. The great shard-like almost long boulder upon which it stood, at the lower ends, a black mouth of many piled grit-filled tooth-aligned smaller pieces, hardened as if magma-contorted. A giant parasite bloat, a stump evil radish growth to its left, feeding on it. Although it was more like a tomb-stone than anything else, except alive, and that thing wriggling by its side, fat-carrot, with large pincer-teeth, garroting it.

Happy-man kept it company in the room. He was a big chest-formed thing with a small bulb head coming off, a lump, lain back, off the rocky block he was a part of. A running booth-growth coming out of where an arm would be, pointing at the wall by his side; and opposite to it, the 'right arm', a small cylindrical socket. But the lump had a human face drawn by a child on it.

The child had been crushed by the leaping around the room Sholeklik, who was the stolid leaping fat-giant tomb creature.

If Happy-man stood on its one foot, it would look like the front side of a train, with one of its noise makers on top of it, with his hand on-lain down, on the floor, staring, horizontally, like a roll.

Otherwise, they all kept their distance, being very much, on their marks, weary of trying to annoy him, weird one.

Top of the head a small, normal Viking boat turned upside down, with the front of it being a giant ocular device, the other shields adorning it eyes as well, grown on top of a goblin-shark-form with the teeth being more of a bar-filled thing with many shot-through spears, grown on top of a body that, from the side would look like the handle of a gun, but longer on both sides. The head being right above the trigger, in the 'cockable' to reload region, extended by a pseudo-ugly looking fallen apart cartilage exposed, with many put together moving bones. Or an evil helmeted humanoid shark whose side of the body gave birth only part a shoulder, and a single arm without, or reach the forearm, but the forearm is inverted, as for the mass of meat to be thinner where it meets the arm. The gun being more of a rifle-thing, or some weird bone, while the back of its head as well as the welded in, merged side of the shoulder, drew back like a giant sepia-bone thing. It cannot stand on its one foot for long, always falling fat, as if cursed, always falling on its side, it goes.

A bulb-filled with tumor-growths standing pillar shaped like an elongated throat, or a vertebrae spine. It bears a giant growth at the top, where, two large cartilage scythes point at one another, and form an ugly square when united, primitive and savage, like Hominid tools. A compact face is laid there with a mouth-pea shooter with a mattress spring cartilage attached to it, with clickers and violin stick-like appendages. Its face is a humanoid cricket deformed, with two satyresque horns, coming out of a trail that's destroyed the right side of its face. One horn erupts from the back, that one is much thicker, while the other one completely ruined its other, smaller eye, grass blades seen from the distance but made out of some tar-substance. Also these two 'scythes' have long sharp, eight attached thin finger-talons completing them.

A hooded figure resting on a humanoid top of the armor flying construct, attached to a fat bloated skin sack, bearing an eye on it and a giant coin-shaped mouth, puking dark-rivers. Two normal armored arm prosthetics, with constantly melting yet regrowing, whip shaped things. Hiding inside the hood is the small one person car-shaped with arrow-protrusions coming out of a single trailed line, with two small-expandable eyes. Whose mouth is a big, beneath the jaw, attached eight rams put together, jar, with wires, filled with strange wild gizmos; a the 'wheel' level, fused together, and it looked like a strange camera. And the head is more of a whale, with eyes on the side of it. And it opens, it's a helmet. The real head is a strange, as in, a plate got welded then flattened, part of the table, mouthless shape, with a blob nose, queerly set eyes, on a dark cricket appendage. The arrow shapes are keys to open the helmet. Its strange almost larvae body is the sack, pissing dark rivers.

The rivers attract insects. These insects are shaped like, 'incel'-like pulled philtrums but molded into the body of a bulby wasp abdomen. Bearing only two small jerkily thin appendages, wingless but capable of flight. Flying in weird formations, hundreds of them at a time; but the philtrums are more concave, like the side of a traditionally, made in a pottery class, vase. But like a scarab, in terms of a chitinous appearance. Armored.

Three great FETUS gods; one on the left, squirming around its tail, more like a seahorse, attached, where its head, pointed down by an umbilical cord, to a lower side of an elongated throat, connected to a pseudo-humanoid stillborn whose mouth is a circled-opening barb-wire hot-ironed in, with no distinguishable features other than two pseudo-white globy eyes, more of a specter he is, from the top of whose head comes the last one, who is indistinguishable from anomalous wretched contortions. It almost looks like an actual umbilical cord, in comparison with the rest of them, but, alongside this beam, stalk, this weird contorted tree, one could see a few human teeth grown on the side of it, and directly opposite to the 'headed' still born, as if implanted in it, a refrigerator-like bulk of hardened things, kind of like an old Eastern European trademarked brick phone.

A big chunk of meat mass boulder, with a chiseled perfect stone mask chipped inside, looking out of the crack, hardened meat it is. Growing out of it, a plant-like tall, head-holder with an open-book filled with a mosquito-filled with blood spread holding a long-bar, of metal-bone cartilage like a support beam that, at its end is holding an upside-down hanging corpse, kidnapped victim- but held in a kindapbag, but part of the entire creature, which is but horned, as well at that. Kind of like a livid crane. With a face-split-open with a flat face on two-side 'pages'.

Flying humanoid man with a large pole instead of a head and a spinning saw in the middle that acts like a magnet for nigger necks.

Dark headed crowned, Scuba Diver' cast, with strangely peculiar electron makers out of his chest and connected to his arms. A black trail of unwont.

Bloated-candle bodied houndish upward-heaved, curved torso with a dome-like segmented mouth opening, worm-squirming thing with a forage-drill pit-hole maker spinning device at its back, connected to a sea-through frame of cartilage-bones, similar to the framing of a building, seven or eight bars attached, not entirely similar to a building but close enough to its breastbones. Swinging a branch-curved cleaver blade that's dropped out of its gut; capable of flight; yet it can produce. Large spherical-fat with stitched by the roundness of a malignant hide with a few worming things, producing, large-unnatural ends, producing large boomerang motion, cradle basket split-formations, drawing bum-shaped hooks – attached to its bowels, shooting for these heads.

Hard-emission producing leech-dark-push-through, puzzle box of dark-sinew.

Babble-wall, dark child, stretched on a long-patch. A boxing ring, that's slightly depressed down. But no cords, rather long growths, all three other sides. Whereas in the middle of the room stood a great pillar, made of put together bulbs, to which there's but a single long arm-cranelike attached, which, at the opposite end is depressed, with a cartilage-trail, cord, put, instead, inside a hot-iron giant growth with two giant long cleavers inter-connected forth, to its sides, forming a squirming a cutter, forth.

Butcher-like upper belt, framed device, putting twenty of them, connected by their throats, all of them blacks, niggers following as well, getting ripped apart as soon as it's possible for them to show a sign, twitch, or anything, even remotely close to them being alive; rope ring-devices that slowly add more pressure onto their throats until the niggers can't breathe anymore.

Flying, spinning darkcircled saw with long-spiked bar coming from the middle with thousands of sharp blades coming out of it, hunting for niggers at night. Nigger-throat pills growing inside their throats until they pop-out of them, splattering their throats and necks; melting their entrails after:

Reverse Walnut cracker device with two sides of the rope slowly extending until the nigger's throat is fully squeezed and squished to splatter.

A leprous creature drew ahead. It did not speak, but wretched in, here and there, under the impression that it was still being watched, all of the sudden it started slurring in, the most poutful reproachful sayings, many of whom around him praying. Large incisors canines, all around their many throats coming out of its great crowned rooted thing, meaty, pumping with head-tendons like things inserted inside its head. Around its temple, a great crow-like thing, the one on the right, while the one on the left, a great speaking with many brows attached from every possible side; many of whom were pump-laying, all around them. Many headed sprouting but kept in place, elongated throats sprung like springs, never growing and pushing out when called behind. Their mouths ringed with iron-things that had, on both sides, weird claspers that pulled and pushed out of them, their throats- then used to cast upon the ground a broiled like substance that swept like black-dust or a strange mutation like splatter made of dust. Which started registering every step; giving birth to soles of feet, plates moving around with squirming legs-pressed down:

‘ The downed people are to speak first.’

‘ Who’s the one keeping track of them in that case?’

‘ I don’t know, but we shall, as such and ever wont and wonder, register the strongest one’s bloody-peels and we shall remove them from the body-maker and pull them out, from time and seal.’

With which they had already decided.

A few flung around yet unpaved, of souls, deprave yet heaving here and there whenever someone came along, camping with their filthy sutured in heads, the spirit. It’s not there.’

‘ Hey there, Reppe.’

‘ Huh?’

‘ Reppe-rape-reppe, Reppe.’

‘ What?’

An elongated Cockroach Turk in his hand, a swimming board. It kept cricketing in place; he was trying himself, at this point. A swatch of spherical pills, all white-yolk, squirming- with little scales put-through agony pursing lips, all of them used like pads, adorning their roachlegs, drawn along, pointy.

‘ That’s not.’

Its chest fit like two puzzle pieces, creating an outline in the middle of its weird, shield-like, as in no organs on the other side, other than the main piece, form. Its throat was a weird chess-like pawn, drawing upward into a weird ball-tumor-thing growth like oozing filth-bubble, whereas one could see a spike behind, despite there not being any organs, arrow-like formation like a pseudo spine. Aiming at the ground; its two arms were a giant second spike, as its right one, whereas the opposite was a pulled by many tendons coming from this concave body strange growth formed in the shape of an elongated sausage mole crawling to a thinner at the end tunnel. The left ‘piece of its body looked like a beaked growth, connected to the tendons or munching on them, with a weird chewing on top of the lesser one pincer like many attached teeth-like formations, seen from the front, as the sides of a three, whose lower outline formed a horizontally rotated hill, pointing at the tendons, and a strange incline whereas the outline stopped, at the lower, hardened outer lower backward curving rim of the creature. Whereas the right side, or the left if seen from the front was more like a rotten weird, decayed desert skull awkwardly fit together, while being munched upon. The creature was all organic. It had a weird power-tattoo on it as well with a weird scrawl drawn on top from which, only a circle o-cut like the Greek letter but with another M-R hybridization lodged on top, butchered. Strange as it were, the creature was more of a, if it were grabbed by its actual left limb, as a gun-handle, a giant squared spade, with a dangling tip, grabbed with the right hand, a pointy tip to the right, weirdly contorted and inscribed.

Spinning lynch-ropes aligned with mattress springs-like coils, wrapped around launchable stakes. Hundreds of them being shot at a time, as from a multiple rocket launcher system, flinging themselves as westernesque cowboy lassoes but with homing sticky leather around niggerthroats, attaching to them, like niggerthroat magnets, before fully suffocating the niggers while dragging them off, into space, like rockets taking off during the moon-landing.

These sub-human niggers definitely deserve getting not only castrated for the filthily disgusting animals they are but also having their limbs completely ripped apart by force, their guts ripped open, their entrails spreads across the floor, their faces carved in and peeled off, their children raped and killed, slaughtered as well, like the disgusting, wretched animals they are. Niggers are under no circumstance human, at all.

There were a lot of coruscated panels forming the floor-board.

A few more nigger-children raping machine, going through their sphincters until their sub-human children are completely butchered, bleeding profusely out of their cum-pus filled disgusting holes. Slitters and large blades, little saw-like chinks being forcefully rotated as they enter their bloated-with cum-curbed fat-bellies, forced to grow until they pop- spreading their filthy entrails on the ground, progressing towards their throats slowly.

‘Nothing feels better. There’s no greater feeling in life than skinning a nigger child alive, slitting its pus-filled throat, making sure disease spreads along its face while forcing the other monkeys to watch this little monkey nigger skinned alive. Using half-scissors to open him up, carving as you’d trail along, closer to its eyes, then making sure a sprawl will butcher this cum-eating nigger monkey creature. This, ‘below-human’ creature that needs to have its cum-filled nigger head splattered and stomped. Its throat filled with hooks before it’s being torn apart, its tongue ripped after and pulled through, with a piece of its filthy nigger throat, splashed and beaten with a coated in burning hot oil hammer. Pushing it in even deeper, slowly removing every organ, before they’re being thrown on the ground. All nigger children have to fucking die. Lynching isn’t enough with these nigger sub-human creatures. Their genitals have to be cut. The nigger child, this cocksucking little faggot nigger-beast has to be forced to eat its own genitals, it has to be fed them before being violently raped like the little sub-human faggot nigger creature it is, this filthy sub-human cocksucking nigger child.’

‘You know what, John? I think I’m going to sell this niggerchild to some sex traffickers. Let them have some fun filling its nigger-bowels with trafficum.’

‘Sounds like a good plan to me, just make sure you cripple these filthy fucking nigger creature first, before you do it.’

‘I will.’

‘If they want to promote miscegenation, so be it. Perhaps it’s time that more and more people start raping these niggerchildren while they’re young and plump and rapeable. Before large spiked clubs are shoved up their asses, completely slaughtering them from inside out, pumping up and down until their bloody entrails are left hanging down the outlines of the great wooden shaft they’re ‘‘hanged’’ down from. Left hanging, bearing ‘‘children’’ of their own, more niggers have to go this way. More niggers have to have their skin turned into carpets, and little nigger-faced stretched plates, with nigger-child-heads ripped off, not to let them waste, of course, so many of these niggers have to get shot as well, but not until they’re made to suffer.

It’s only a matter of time until a sickle cell disease shows up, it’s only a matter of time until they’re ethnically cleansed, every single one of these fucking nigger animals slaughtered, dying and made to waste like the filthy animals they are. Filthy fucking monkeys!’

Lazy chimps accompanying its master, a large headed almost twin-conjoined dolphin head connected to a great appendage thrice as wide, instead, leprous, niggurous remains.

‘The entire world should be aware of it, as from the filth of a kike, the bringer of many raped fucking nigger children adorning his dark palace, where it resides. Ah, for there’s little more than any to hide, the wretch and the making that would not subside. That which only bequest destruction, a call of action, of need recedes, the kike does and should not care for the likes of many niggers getting lynched. For they all need to have their children fucked and filled with filth and pus, and as many scalped and skinned alive, and made to suffer. Their parents ethnically cleansed after, cut and chopped and much worse than the mere merciful pity the Belgians offered them in Congo. And more importantly; for every filthy kikess whore and for every treacherous kike as well not stepping forth as to stop this, they should have their children and I can promise this at least.

They will have their kike children taken away from them as well, fisted, killed, filled and raped with, and treated as such as the most wretchedly diseased nigger there is out there, in the worst possible manner. I shall have my way one day.

And I shall make sure, by whatever means I can that as many of them will and shall be slaughtered, there will be a lot of blood to pay after; the diseased beast shall not forget and it shall not leave one flee away. I shall make sure of that, at least, filthy sub-human creatures, skinned alive and burnt with their niggers, with their filthy pets as well.’

One day, one day, it comes, and draws near.

Its small skull could be observed, carved, like a baby-fleshling, reeling in and out, many dead-niggers carefully aligned, butchered like animals, put in a row, a dead heap of them, their throats ripped away, their children, only their lower-sides and whatever else, had been left to waste.

A triangularly elongated corpse cartilage, a cage of bone, flying in the sky, with a great pole-ledge attached to the side. A space to crawl inside of it, kept below the meaty walls, above rested but one pile of growths, but hardly attached, resin. A fallen apart basin, cords as many, and filthy look-a-likes did follow. Like a giant corpse standing on its back, restlessly shallow. Limbless, as well as its head bore-forth in fat, a tumor-platter of many shapes, brought, forth, and behind its back, an elongated hole-of spines, of many wretched things, aligned. Its’ lower side, but in the back, munching on its self with many reeled-in-teeth; a vacuous flier, he seemed nonetheless, like a great ship, thorny but allowed to move from one pile to another, yet ahead.

He was giant; a single torso-body bag. A singly throat, of four black pincer-stacks. A head-deformed with black eye-globes, and filthy crawler-spitters for its mouth, two black, dark antennas, termite-bloated, coming out its back, opposed to them, but stand-still-standing, two more resting on the front. Upon which it walked but cricket like, for two greater segments kept it so. But those in the back kept prodding after, for they are just done, impaling, two niggers walking so. Would they have done a thing uncanny, wretched? Would there be another, few miles stretched? Many gathering around, many lynching niggers as they'd make themselves but draw so after, and lynch but many more, yonder.

Wretchedly torn apart limb; wearing a body on top of its own, as it were only a fetus-attached as if by an umbilical cord, tuba-cartilage of ribs, and elongated stretches, many of which were inwardly curved, plenty if not hundreds of ivory cords, as well as thin sets of long-thin arms, ivory-thumbs, long pincer-tongues as well as foresty things all attached, but the bulk of the growth, witch-features filled in the back, the creature, the wench, its mother, the progenitor, whose given it life. Headless if allowed.

Before it rested a big bulby un-bloomed flower, a single spear shaft coming out its mouth; with plump-plump wrumps with wrum-wrum pew-pew to its pop-pop, attached: Twenty heads held on a pike, reptile build of bones; from the womb of which came a stronger, harder to glimpse out thing.

It bore itself forward on a kept, side by side hanging, like niggers.

It were lumped, for such. It had been. With many others of the hardly looking, through standing glasses – cast of men. Many of them fortuitously drained, trails resting behind and between them. As many as forty or so fallen-through, few inches of the grounds raised, many of them devoured as well, eaten and spared were the clouds. Many of them, again, wailed upon the lightning, as is truck, there on.

‘Gle-chee, Gherum, there’s another rainy night come through.’

‘Will it happen again if I see to it that I am lost, before, and come, as true?’

Both of them had, to the gate inquired something that might be said of done, or hurt as such, as might be done. They didn’t know how to react from that point on.

The gate was diagonally-stretched, impossible to open. On top of it, heaved inward, like a fruit-stand’s shadow maker. But that was only a roof. While the strange peculiar over-stretched looking figure was stretched like a pane on top the gate, or sutured in, in some way, the ceiling above it kept a larger, almost unnatural bottom side, that had belonged to some building, being eight or fifteen meters at the very least, connected to the greater part of the bulky mountain-wrought dark edifice in which hid the broken four, nimbler fingers had been cut but still found their way along. It moved, projected on the ceiling as well. A pair of sixteen faces, all belonging to him while he was still down there, in front of them, crawling along, but barely recognizable still; a giant tick, with the features of a man, all too deformed and made to be as if a ripple fell when bounced against a pond. Despite this pseudo blocky thing that stood in front and above the gate, it had no visible attachment to the bulk, making it all, if not beyond strange, how featherless it was, how it stood in place, while the creature inside, that amorphous thing kept beating against the walls, in desperate well-heard attempts to escape. But neither one came to such end.

During the wait, in the midst of a deadly night hour, a peculiar thing approached them. It heads was smallish, he looked like a Victorian man, swarthy pockish, pus with pox warts on top of it, resting on a throat that was a long L shaped bone whose tip entered and kept his head hanging like a lantern, dangling aside. Connected to the bloated body of a trumpet-boned big-bloated caterpillar-soft-blimp whose trumped funnel was but a fat organ pumping in and out, resting on top of a much wider, much more projected body formed out of two inner-bone-formed appendages, straight-forth projected, horizontally flipped, directed, to a strange elliptical band, forming a pseudo elongated camera like apparatus hidden inside the bloated body it rested inside of. Yet this thing rested on two normal legs, thought kneeling, it could only crawl, and at the end, of its back stood but a single razor-shaped cartilage that was nothing but its two conjoined welded feet, dragged from all the way back. A tiny man parasite, resting on top of two canons, both enclosed. Hopeless as well as morose; he introduced himself as Edinburgh Goughe, they called him Gouge:

‘Strange man, have you shown up here to provide us the keys we might use to go inside?’

‘Why, of course not, I’ve only come here to watch you die.’ He said, with an utmost indignant tone.

He was in clear sight and knew what he was doing, just how to mess with them, upon the drawing of the gates, not one would serve himself any better, not to fear whom might draw close. Spindly as well as watching, pus-in their eyes, was there no tumor goat around? And what of the cancer wolves? They had ceased their constant yelling, incapable of making it close.

Many woods had piled around as they were cut and brought to mightier it was, a hopeless end in which they stood and rested, with the dead and the quiet, and the ones that grew after, until a certain homogeneity was formed inside the land. For what was worth, there was no way in without breaking a few spines, but there were no corpses. There had never been, only a sea of shades that came and disappeared, when, every now and then, they came in, and out of sight, they drew, they couldn’t be seen, but whispered inside each ear:

‘Bold you are to approach the gate, say the wrong thing to it and the thing hiding in there will smash your head.’

He waited for one of them to intervene:

But before it drew on a great livid-thing; with a giant elongated seemingly, as it appeared at first, giant open jaw-mouthed, fully stretched formation like a stalagmite aligned mouth, with a few feet in front of it, a step-growth bearing a few more pike teeth-alike. Although it was more of a distorted open sarcophagus which bore, on top of it, a stove-fat boot –front of a canine bulb formation attached to the strange body it rode upon, whereas, in the back, the stretch – that being attached to the lower body, stalactite aligned, elongated bathtub deformation in which it carried a few freeloaders, all armed. Fat lump-head, whenever one of the pikes lowered down, a man came into sight, open mouthed-strange device bearing forth. With a strange drill-upon fat-beaded on a line cabbages strung inside of it, then lumped.

A disgusting aberration of many; they were all but barely sublime. And put together, sickened blind. Hardly raised from on top the thrones they rested on. Hardly breathing but many of them flying as they tagged along; all of a supreme hegemony that could not even be competed with at a level that could keep up to their flight, in the most insurmountable way, from one point to another, they were tried. Dark was the earthly weather, as dirt and soil and sand had become the waves that brushed by them, though they still managed, despite the ailment of the ills to keep to one another, as if struck by what had happened, past stoles, they rode on forth. A few men attempted chucking spears at them, only to find them landed forth in a grounded-land. Their round tongues were the most recognizable feature one could stare at long. Chucks of stones, bodied, but spears and crowns on top, but it would only appear so from the distance, in turn, they looked like buds, connected to strange pillared things with man-wings, as if cherub-angelic porters' feet, statues that would've belonged, adorning a treasury beyond, were attached to the lower side of it, that, in turn would also explain the heads as well as everything that looked pseudo-like them, the one that churned in their places and chucked the spears, to their disgraceful nature. A pseudo limb erupted from beneath them, as if some pheromones spores were lain around. They were long, but shaped like leaves-chitin, the ones you'd fold within, to hold a finger. Giving that they stood flaccidly staring in the back, they were, cartilage-deformed-contorted canoes, out of the tip of which trails of black smoke could be seen, aligning in rows, they formed dark circles out of which, that followed. Dark smokers that could not help themselves any longer, but breathe briskly, as they made the most unnaturally didactic, almost panes. Mad men could see words written on them, but could never find out what the runes spoke about or why, for what reason might there be as such. Broader, barely shaped and barely sculpted disgusting looking pawns, with tails emerging from beneath them, but with faces drawn along, with fat necks – formed of mass having already encompassed and drawn just about as much as they could from whatever source there was out there. Adding to themselves; hence why the men feared and why they added to their wild surroundings, weird and strange charms, trinkets and doings of their own, incapable of truly resisting what was happening there, in the sky, since the ground was also theirs, of old. Seen from, as near as one could get to it, one could see, that beneath the many that were attached on the top, although humanoid, that didn't matter, they would've worn, if they were seen as standing men, instead of the wild inanimate contortions they were, since they were, by now, since killed, decorative in nature, rested an adorned belt. With large formations, that were ingrained in the main body, but couldn't be seen unless someone got extremely close to them, which in turn would be, too dangerous, beyond belief and beyond any possible chance. Unless binocular devices were put to their employ; otherwise, large gems, they were but organic, deepened in, with various crack-like push-throughs that were added all together forming a darker, harder-to look out livid complex piece, that could extend and form a gradient of stuck together, rotating Saturn belts made out of words, worms and worn-out smeared with blood sheets, taken out various journal papers. Many of them carrying the biographies, taken from the men that got absorbed; whereas, they would break again, forming strange cyst-sacks, locking multiple lives together. The bags would float around, then, upon pumping enough, each of them bearing an atrocious amalgamation of multiple lives that were bruteforced together, they would fall onto the ground, while, upon their release, the splatter of strange ooze-like thing would slowly become the mold of a man, woman or whatever else got absorbed, that is to say, animals as well, the end result being a creature incapable of understanding anything going on around it. Being cursed to live the rest of its life that way, cursed, incapable of understanding what's going on, or capable of making sense of anything. Since this conflict of many personalities would render it, confused; beyond it, mentally nurtured. And hundreds of these men were released on the ground, many of them having come in droves, incapable of find out what happened or why were they made that way. Suffering eternally, incapable of thinking for themselves.

It was a guillotine tall beam-fat humanoid top mold, with a hunchback throat, pushing forth into a wax oozing end of a scorpion tail whose sting had become many interconnected pincer-protrusions, all connected, dripping with strange boils, all spread across its body. Or an inflated gigantic, upturned, hunting knife's handle but made to look like a blocky fat hill-top man's body, which had become a pudgy balloon-oozing mushy thing with many stingers coming out of it. Whereas its hug legs were elongatedly open shaving razor blades, opening like scythe-switchblades with two edges facing one another on each leg. Though they wore canoe-like shoe-placed talon-stretched feet upon which they walked, forwardly, then backwardly lopsided. And these almost saw-long first segments, on both sides, bore malignant looking faces on either side of the stretch. Vile faces with long teeth and horns, on either side and on their forehead and looked as if they were two elongated skull-chitin covers on top the blades as well. If its entire body was vertically flipped upside down, the base of the body would look like a thin-pillar cockpit helicopter cabin, whose first two bladed segments – the first two legs were the wings, at the end of which stood two thick scythes, but they could not be grabbed a hold of because of the blades. The feet being much closer to sledges; the way it walked was bizarre. Since the two segments drew back towards one another, or at least the second one on one side, they would interlock as a pair of nun-chucks with a curved blade being planted in the ground, - that being only one leg. But the legs appeared to be attached by weird sockets, lodged inside the body, capable of walking like perpetual moving machines, in pendulum swings, or wooden long-necked cranes planting their beaks on one side, compressed, while being fully extended on the other. Long stretched in the air, lifting, lowering, then lifting again. If the pincer-like canoe-foot scythe was planted in the ground, assuming the body got raised and held with the strength of only one planted in the ground foot, assuming the right one was, the left one would simply swing the interlocked nun-chuck formation over the adorning head of the first segment, ending up being fully extended, perhaps not fully straight this way, more of an incline, whereas both adorning heads, including the one attached to the socketed area would simply stay upside-down, whereas the main body of this ‘moving-appendage’ would be something akin to a silver spoon attached to a hair comb that only has one sharp clasper. It could walk on two legs, in a bipedal way, but its two feet were backward aiming, making the entire movement eerily jerky in nature. Although this ‘spoon’ thing would be close to a wooden snake with its deformed head would contort a bit to comfort the other segment. Connected to a miner’s pick; but one sided, that being the second and the third segment being connected. The horns being capable of retreating into their skull holes out of which they came out of.

An ugly skull-man, whose helmet bears two elongated pizza-shaped horns by the sides of his temples and head; its head it a root, connected to a pile of flying dirt, with grass, on it, with curtain-like cut to look like a two-dimensional sun-jester like, blades, adorning it. An umbilical cord shapes like two man legs, one kicking the pile of dirt in its ‘gut’, the other, connected o the giant liver-shaped chitin-armored pile that holsters many hidden limbs. IT dangles around from time to time, while the leg cartilages are getting their workout. Out of hidden gates, out come lever-shaped, with many rounded bolts, iron cricket leapers, appendages capable of the same motions, with rockets hid inside of them. Twenty or fifty feet on either side; whose explosions turn their victims into degrading skin-mutants with elongated back-organs in which idealized versions of their victims’ original ‘preserved’ inanimate bodies are hung on top of. Being incapable of releasing from that point they’re set in, the melting process is but set to begin. Forced eventually to turn, or as they’re turned into falling-apart mounds, their dislodged from out of their sockets eyes would see themselves, as if staring at a memory-formed mirror for one last time, before being shattered apart, slowly falling off, piece by piece.

A bold looking sad creature with no arms stood before them, crying out loud.

A dark terminal pumping a strange malformed thing through the help of various, barely put together suction cups, that draw some of the wide-spread corrugated many backed rodent-blocks of barren earth cartilage that's wide spread, yet harmonized with the rest of the mountainous formation upon which it dwelled upon. Dark-yet saddened by the looks of which, at least a few sharp nails the size of large men appeared out of nowhere, tickling the great machine that tried smashing everything beneath it. Various hollow empty-air gaps observable beneath the earth, spread across such a wide parapet that one could shoot in any if ever there was a time, for, direction, and he would end up hitting one. Thin walls barely separated them, but this was only at the 'surface', having progressed only a few million miles beneath the earth. Beyond it, even farther down one could see the most unnatural converged kingdoms that one could lay eyes upon, whose pointedly deformed roofs held everything from being caved in and falling over. The buildings were high-necked, high-standing tuba almost but closer to long flintlock shafts, with crack heads out of which extremely hardened 'shot' through nets were thrown across the ceiling. Four or five of these towering candle-tall growths came out of giant horse mane bulks of chiseled porous stone, yet wormy in some way, whereas they bore empty depressed throat sockets as if they had once bore dinosaur like primordial long necks themselves, that had been shattered. The body of stone was somewhat reminiscent of them. Each of the four towering structures bore superficially flapping square-diamond shields that was adorned with various incantations as such, their meanings lost.

The workers were still alive somehow, as bizarre as they were. Still attached to the bottom of the great embodied bulk, by lowering crane-like powerlines, spidery yet sombrous, as many as eighteen of them came out of many great insectoid limb-mandibles that would've resembled cricket legs instead, out of which sprouted the lines. The mandibles belonging to a transparent blocky dirt-soiled skull with a humanesque appearance; that bore, beneath it a giant air-shaft thick as to fit the body of a man inside, caterpillar body form tubularly wrought neck, leading to a giant humanoidesque kidney torso filled with peculiar superficially meaningless stretches and marks of fallen-over skins and what not. The torso had naught but a single right metallic arm, bolted shut to the body, peculiar in appearance, overly exaggerated but similar to the arm of a human. IT wore a 'shoulder' pad that was fused with what would've been the collar bone, but never fully welded as to look completely like it, as it had not made a belt. The two joints that made it as well were tawny bronze but darker, as they just so happened to be made of the same material as the one above, out of which every building was made of. In some way, despite being one creature, they appeared to be disgustingly incompatible to one another, at least with the addition of the arm, this being somewhat reminiscent of the fact that this 'torso' might've been a long 'lost' abdomen whose function got completely altered. The entire weight of this lower body would simply force it to get swung back and forth, with the arm grabbing onto the others that were in the same position, like the pincers of a crab, until they would muster enough strength to climb back on where they had to do the working, one piece chipped at a time. Until the lower side of the structure was cleaned, fully so, and aligned.

But they were only the lowest caste.

As opposed to the ones living in the towers, who were extremely wide creatures, like fattened bulky sharp sharps, hybridized with a square-board, or a giant crew boat set on its side, eely, but as the likens of a dwarf, one footed in the front, dragging itself on a pseudo tail that wasn't even a tail but the backside of its body, a pelvis-thin that was also fat. A twenty meters long, wide, and in height human head was its foot, whose teeth were long-stretching grapplers it spat, in order to pull itself from where it stood, even farther, more and beyond. His forehead could've been this whale fat cranium elongation, most likely. Although it was more depressed in the back, a giant bullet more so; connected to him, but solid, incredibly solid, a chitinous thing; or a small fish, whereas one of its top 'rumps' was the opening of a cunt, or gave the illusion of one, in reality being a long stretch made out of a few 'calluses' with a human angler fish conjoined head behind it. Whereas, squirming as they were, if standing on top themselves, or their 'thinner tips' they would look like bloated carrots, or chalk tips, with heads on their sides. They suffered, trying to get from one place to another.

A sad humanoid with only a head, neck, torso set connected to a long hammer-headed, closer to a Pterodactyl in shape - face whose mouth is sutured. His body looks like a filthy body-bag. Both of them are resting lazily saddened and depressed on the floor. Only one dark eye could be seen on this big anchored thing, and it's mostly spinning in place, in a most confused manner. Some longer sutures appear on the back of its head, attached to the side of the man's belly, or the side of it, beneath what would've been the ribs. Its head it also big but standing tall. Its mouth is a binocular device that can only shout, being incapable of whispering. It constantly shouts in the poor Prehistoric creature's hidden ear, causing it something beyond distress. The animal cannot flee away from the man.

Winged nigger-killer cherub figure with spinning elongations of arm-drills magically growing on top of one another, homing like nigger-tracking nigger torpedoes that only lynch niggers rockets, ethnically popping nigger cherries left and right while popping them open, sinking in them like nigger-munchers.

Disturbingly deformed creature with two heads, one popping out from the side, another one drawing ahead; from one piece of the ground, toppling another set of bodies that were hidden beneath every single one; already existing pieces being there for either one of them to lay on top of.

A peculiar chitinous being, enormous in size, shaped like a crane-arm bearing compact bodied fat blocky body. A giant turret-looking thing, whose lower side bore a small split in half head, a rat-like squared chiseled splice with giant eyes on each end, being lain below a two rigged by two barbwire rolled around, belts. Crawling with the help of banded elongated boulders upon which its very head and the rest of the body is fused with. Its crane-like neck bearing a strange crystal formation clustered skull with longnails for feeding teeth implanted in it, drawing out. Elongated wing-spikes drawing out its back; overall being closely akin to a torso without arms, whose belly bears a protruding belt with a strange head projected onward. But more of a suit wearing torso whose great helmet bears the mechanical, crane-lowered without the claw, bearing crystal like a scepter head located at its end, like a carrot at the end of a stick. Whereas the lower limbs beneath it are closer to giant scorpion inflated pincers, crawling along, as the beast desires to feed itself. Its capabilities unending; as the crystal skull would shoot out of the nail-hot peppers rays of power that would melt everything in sight or turn everything in contaminated pieces of defiled ground.

A bloated river with many defiled pieces of growths, like unicorn growths filled with puffs of smoke-pus as well as vestigial tails drawn from primate-like life-forms.

'One of these days I'm going to wrap my hands around some Yid and Nigg children, then, I'll start skinning them alive, poking their eyes out with hot irons. Then and only then will I be satisfied.'

Dark globular fragment, sitting between four origami metallic arms, all pointing and holding it as if it were a necromancer's scepter, drawing air from in and out, then there on out, from the distance, emerging, a dark-deranged protrusion merging with the slits inside the clouds, every single one opening, revealing puffy eyes, puffy blue, puffy glowing with seas-through.

‘What of me, then? Perfection, narcissism, pretention and the likes, am I to be abandoned as well? You won’t have anyone else left if you decide to leave us all, and even if you tried, there’s no certainty you could ever get rid of us all.

We’re just as lodged into you as your hatred and every emotion you tried barring on; we’re part of you, part of your past, part of who you are. There will never be anything left of you by the time you’re done cutting us off. Your arrogance, this, us, we’re the only things left that had been left unscathed, it’s who you are, it’s part of your ‘‘humanity’’ whether or not you’re human. Don’t try acting self-righteous or pious now, you can’t run away from us. We’ve made you, we turned you into who you are.

You won’t find a better world out there just by cutting us out, it’s a lie. It’s masking who you are.’

‘You may be right, but, I’ve come to the realization that I don’t care, why should I?

I’m going to leave all behind me one day. I don’t want to forget it, I don’t want to leave you behind, I just want some peace and quiet, somehow. I know you’ve been with me for a while now, I think, going as far as I’ve known myself and I don’t feel any shame for either one of you.

But I’ve come to realize that I have to. I have to let you sleep for a while, just so I could return there; it won’t be for long. And you don’t have to be afraid either, I’m not going to cut you off, I’m not. I don’t want you to die off either, just like everyone else.

I can’t function properly with all of you awake at once, you know? I can’t keep you chained or locked up, or force anything you don’t want to on you. I have to move on, somehow.

My past is yours now; I don’t know what kind of person I’ll be from this point on, but I’m sick of being a mentally diseased animal; you’re going to have to live here for a while as well. As wretched as a world as it is, as long as you are in here, you shall live. You shall never be cut off from who I am. You, my flaws, are my memories, what’s left of them, knowing that I tried. It brings me more comfort than knowing I’ve never being capable of doing anything.

You’re going to live with them, all of them, my children, my creations, the only link I’ve got left of my past. I wish I could trust people. I wish I was capable of change, but they just want to hurt me. Everyone does, it’s just what it feels like and I know I did my fair share of hurting, that I said the worst possible things, that I used people as well, but I don’t know anything else. I can’t seem capable to do anything properly.

I wish I hadn’t said or done those things to my friends. I wish I hadn’t split the group because of what I’ve done then. I don’t have any happier memories than the times I shared with them, but. They’re gone. So is my teacher now.

And you as well.

I have to forget them; they’re. I can’t move on as long as there are things attached to the past, so many barren threads and empty strings attached and dead. I can leave them all behind, and I don’t even have to worry about them dying out. Not as long as this place exists. It is my only, and the only conceivable conceit I am willing to take, a draw. I want to move on. I didn't even know why at first, but, I. All those years of anger and of hatred, they will not have been for nothing.

It's who I am, after all. And who I'll ever be, I can't give up my anger, without. I wish I had known sooner. I wish I hadn't been confused for so long, but I will make sure you'll all survive. I shall not let anyone get between us, no matter how petty, or scummy we are.

You'll live, even if we have to draw anger against us, even if we have to stir the tides a bit. I wish I could make sense out of things, I wish I could get my past back, but it is too late for that.'

A peculiar creature, thrice headed, on top of a saw cut in the form of a trident head, with its three bars being its throats.

'I can't even hold a grudge long enough for it to make a difference. I'm tired of it; it's keeping me back as well. I guess I, ended up being too weak to achieve something that matters.'

'Then stay here, with the rest of us; it's fine. You've done your fair share of trying, there's no one left out there to get back at, let's leave, no more pain for either one of us. We'll ravel in our own defeat if we have to; we tried and failed; it's time to leave.'

And they had.

It came out of a bush-like conch-shell, as if it were an elongated scythe-crab with its head, a carrion-skull mold of an animal jaw, a hybrid that was many teathed, whose throat looked as if it was giant human gums, ringed like a worm, a bump that drew out. A few centipede'legs but giant-hardened, like canoes, only four of them sticking out of the lump mass shell; a socketless head, it was more of a curved blade with a strange downward tilted bird beak drawing out of it.

A motorcycle would've fit for the fully body span, but that's about it. The legs are superficial, this being more of an ooze thing crawling forth.

'I think it's time, hey, don't look sad, we've been falling apart over a long time. It's been heading along the way now. And I'm not sorry it had to get to this point.

We departed a long time ago, but I'm glad you decided to contact me again, so we could do it formally.'

'Rod, I thought. I thought you would simply ignore it. After what's been happening, after dying, being killed, and being lost for so long. I thought this would be the last thing to cross your mind.'

'It has, it did, that's why, uh, I called you here, in this office. It's a strange thing, how we've come here, how we managed to land here, on the Isles.' Gourney's office, being somewhat unchanged from the looks of it, but they weren't.

There's been a fall from that rotten dark belly he's been in, but that's irrelevant now.

'Remember that boy? That stumbled in the tavern? The one during that night, some, considerable time ago, I'm. Glad, you decided to come here, that's all.'

‘Has something happened to him?’

‘No, it’s not that, it’s just that. I wanted to let you know, that’s all, of something. That’s why I wanted to get in touch with you again, I feel as if I had a need for closure.

It’s strange, how I don’t feel as angry as I was, anymore. It’s in the past, it’s all in the past but him. I think I had to make this journey, somehow.’

‘Both of us had to, Rod; he’s fine, isn’t he? Nothing.’

‘Of course not, no harm, nothing that, you know. He’s grown up a bit. He’s changed, though I don’t know whether or not it’s for the best or the worst.’

‘I’m glad to hear that, I really am.’

‘Hannah, it’s sure been a chaos, is. Out there, isn’t it?’

‘Yeah, yeah, I wish I could see him if that were possible, but.’

They knew, it was, better not said.

‘He’s not here, anyway, you know what young men are like nowadays, plus, look outside for a moment, with that thing lodged inside the ground and, it would’ve never been safe for him to live here.’

‘I wish I could go back then, I wish I had a chance to, no, I wish there was a chance to reach to him now. Of all times, there would’ve never been a better chance than this.’

‘It’s fine, plus, kid’s all grown up, there’s just no way through it any longer, but.’

A lost memory.

A few darker rods all stood together, latching on top of one another; holding on top of each other, like branches in a sea of gardens, all melted in. Where the giant deep sea creatures were the canopy and the trees, the cut-in houses and the bloated giant submarine fat bees and wasps:

An eye stood somewhere below, giant, like that of a human, whom looked upon the worst abominations there were; most of them seemed, peaceful, for a while. They’ve been that way for a while now.

Except for him:

Its body was two stacked battery-like cylinders with cables attached between one another, and a whip like thing that drew all the way up to a pseudo-appendage conjoined arm-like lump protrusion coming out of its upper ‘head’ stretch. The cylinders added up to a height of one hundred fifty meters and appeared to bear, like a ship-canon pointing at the ceiling instead, a deformed giant flat oblong head whose lower jaw was two appendages its giant one set of human teeth shaped chitinous mouths shields were ‘suture’-welded into. The first ‘appendage’ bore a tiny balloon-shape with a worm-spinning flat at the top black barb-wire tar drill-organ, whereas the second ‘appendage’ that was sutured to the first one bore a pseudo oyster to which, or at the end of which the whip-like cords drew into, being molded-sutured into it as well, which was constantly performing ‘chewing’-choking motions as if it was a long-throat being suffocated by the cords. The oblong muffing head was filled with boils, warts and lumps and bore two giant, overly expanded eyes, one that had only a circled iris with nothing in the middle but a yolk-depression, whereas the other one had a black-cord suture thread that connected with its 'teeth'. Its eyes were fully wide-open and lidless, a permanent shell-shock afflicted stare being fixated onto nothingness. The suture that was attached to the teeth was also tightly pushed through one of the lumps, while still being on top of it, the pressure of the wire gave the lump the appearance of a pseudo-snot, without the slips. Which only made it seem as if this lump had only grown recently so. Out of its 'head', upwardly, and the head was much taller than the cylinders, adding up to two hundred and fifty miles, this oblong region alone, which, if fully inflated would've been something a lot closer to four hundred or so, relatively speaking, but this wasn't a puffer fish, so that observation is rendered as being invalid. Two great 'horns' drew out of its head, but mainly from one side, the side of the wired eye. The first horn bore itself upwardly so, grown as to look like the back-hand of a finely crafted, leathered, rifle, or the grabbable region, but, it was a pseudo-cranium with an open maw out of which, a peculiar robust cylindrical tongue with a rounded tip, that, if it were straightened, it would've looked like a strange, tiny light-bulb, but, now it's left hanging flaccidly down like a wet sausage. Opposite to it, drew, in the other direction, a giant, as in the second horn which sprouted at the base of the first horn, in the area near the eye, submarine-fat-bloated club formation, with many lump-wombs at its end, at the end of which two strange figures appeared to be carved-emerged as if they had previously been two giant cocoons that sprouted out of two high-standing wombs. One of these figures was a tall, humanoid limbless bodied creature with an elongated giant dolphin-top-of-the-head sprouting out of it, an open lower jaw revealing long piston-stove, rounded speaking protrusions that looked like futuristic sewage open-gates with circle-cut-in depressions constantly puffing out air-bubbles with eggs being buried in them, who was also one winged, like a skin-butterfly, with strangely depicted tribalistic drawings put on them, whereas its eyes were two, long-protruding rose-bud shaped wax-candle elongated finger-shapes that kept growing and falling apart. And had faces in them, all of them screaming as they give birth to egg-filled air bubbles of a different kind than that of the main body. The other figure was its conjoined, more or less, 'lookalike', in frame, but slightly shorted and without a wing, whose head was caved in, or eaten in the same way a dolphin or a shark would take a bit out of a sunfish, revealing fleeting strange growths that followed the lower-sea waves they were driven by. The two figures directly stared and antagonized the brute almost trunk-like but curved at the top, who also bore its fat-rounded giant pill branch, growth. But both of these 'horns' appeared to be more like a giant tumor that drew out of its head, out of the head of this peculiar creature who was constantly suffering of some delusional psychosis that made it envision or give birth to them in the first place.

Globular-strangely shaped pseudo-pressure filled mouths floated around them, bearing long mosquito larvae-pillar-long-lumped roads that came out of them, like vertebrae.

But they were unimportant, as, all of the sudden, it blinked. A Rhener-Nrahcser fiend it was, but as it blinked, it shot an invisible beam through the sea, into one of flying two dimensional liver-mixed with circle, and a musical note but with a few bars between them, reflectively flying platform which directed the shot to a one-horned upward trunked devil-tail formed at the back, growth-lump, whose horn all of the sudden began glowing, like an over-charged-charred with heat red-dwarf, which started drizzling some of the clouds inside of it, until a great mega cloud emerged and kept trailing along a torn apart world that was left after; in order to scout it.

I am the Amalek, haha. The Holocaust didn't happen and I am going to ethnically cleanse the kikes and their nigger slaves!

'That skeletal iron frame is the only thing keeping you alive now.' A banded iron collar-bone, welded up his chest.

'A star-shard triangle is my heart; my lady's name is Forlorn.'

'Sad.'

'Indeed it is, and for that reason I must evolve.'

'To what?'

'A few of the distant specs of flies.'

It stood before them like an unnatural barely grown in place plant. It was something close to, at the very least, a good chunk of the garden-formations resting in front of them, having taken, at the very least eight quarters of in, in which it had not only swam into, having twisted everything beyond recognition but from the looks of that alone, a few of them still rested on top of one another, standing like some kinds of pylons. It was not a clean sight by any means. From the mere shakings, as if it was caused by a tremor that's been stored beneath them, many only came into light momentarily. A martial law-kind of alarm began echoing beneath it.

'Three of the houses have finally come into light. They're no longer submerged. What do you make of it?'

'Open the door, top clinging on one side or the other, there's only one way we can find out, isn't it?'

'Sure it ain't dangerous? Those nests are crawling with ruffians, and they got the plants on their side as well. I'm rather afraid of what else they got to put to their employ if you know where I'm trying to get.'

'I know, that's why you're going to be the first one stepping in.'

'That isn't part of the deal, though. You know what could happen to me the moment I step in near those bastards, right?'

'I'm aware of it and I'd gladly do something if I could ease your passing through into the other world, but allow me to interfere with that for a simple moment while I'm telling you this. You had a chance to turn around and leave before there was even a chance for someone to put a dent on your ugly little caricature of a face.

We're a knee too deep in mud to turn around, and as you'd know, it's me they're after. No offense, but I would rather loathe it if it came to blows especially since I've got no intention whatsoever of hurting you.

I trust you well enough to keep you tagging along, and to give you a choice, during a window of reasonability to take a leave, but you've unfortunately chose to keep tagging along now. Unfortunately that window and your only chance to actually get away seems as if it got thrown out of the window entirely. But not with you in it, do you understand what I'm trying to say?'

‘I’m going to get killed in there.’

Bisque cried, a diseased animal he had become now. It was an unfortunate turn of events, a mistake he had yet to rescind. Unfortunate enough indeed; a few steps only. He was never that much of a fighter, wasn’t even assertive enough to push through and actually fight his way out of it.

Perhaps things might’ve been different. It could’ve gone two-two ways about the place, if it had made sense.

A door got slammed a few moments ago. Although the hit was supposed to be somewhat well intended, it had landed on top of blinded folk. As disastrous a house as could’ve been, lodged in a pool of flowery garden gelatin. He could see the holes dug right through the roofs as well, allowing for the substance to fall through, before he could even tell what was going on, the man had his side-jacket pulled, with a few iron hooks attached to it, welded through. A contorted human, rounded legs, the body of a test-tube lab’s experiment with a top made out of a few mushy growths, many of whom were responsible for taking him to the side. Where many of them waited for anything, even if it meant the slightest word, said or muttered out loud.

Large filaments with rot-eggs inside their eyes.

Like many men in his place, he was afraid of opening its eyes. Its lids being more than tightly shut, underneath a great cover rested a tiny irrationally looking churning liquid that crawled beneath his chin and face; whereas he had become part of a rummaged in contortions that desires his embrace, that is to say, it moved at times when he was asleep. And like a chipped gargoyle with a pair of giant lymph node-like growths that spun around, they drew ahead. The door was locked, and a few glowing stars carried some information to him. Whenever that happened or if happened at all was not for him to look into or decide. Whether or not the person whispering to him from the other side of the door had his best intentions in his mind:

‘Release me, I demand that I will be released immediately!’

‘It won’t listen to you, that thing beyond the doors is worse than the two of us put together. And I’ve already had the last cleaner’s head implanted inside my cover-throat.’

‘Will you give me a hint as to what he wants of me?’

‘Of course I won’t, why would I ruin the fun?’

‘Being trapped in here made me devoid of any. Do you think this will last longer than I?’

‘Neither of us will outlive it. Shh, clear the sound, someone’s coming.’

The bleeping stopped, the shapes stop trying to penetrate through one of the invisible ‘power’-propellers that enters his eyes. Pear, my Name’s Pear.’

‘Nyhial, and I believe the head was an employee’s.’

‘That’s sad to hear.’

But what was sadder was the figure that entered soon after. Who came in motionless at first, as to make a point out of its flawlessly protected suit of armor; whose gaps were nonexistent, yet the side of it opened to revealed a few trays that were lowered on the floor, slowly, by crab-thin metal arms. There was no other side, or at the very least it was that concealed. Wormy-wood maggots and a gun, it's all that was being given, their gift, for the gift of it, still fidgeting in place.

'I'll take this, no offense, but I don't know whether or not I should trust you just yet.'

'Feeling's mutual, but I don't understand what you're intending to do with that. You know you won't be able to put me down with it, right?'

'I could always try.'

Twenty hours. Both of them were missing, a few good quarters of their heads, chomped right through. Both were kept on one side of it. The grubs that had amassed on the other side, wisely enough had two blowing red marks off the side of their shared body. Two shots still left smoking. Condescendingly enough:

'It was a wise choice saving it for that, but now you're disarmed, and there won't be a chance to take another shot against me.'

'We'll be dead within the hour unless saved.'

'I believe there is a fix for that, do you not?'

'That being?'

He faked getting a stroke. Within the hour, one of the thinner medics came in. Un-armored, with the face of an ugly basin, cracked, in part:

For a few minutes he spoke of some derangement as well as of some cult they were a part of.

'If you want to live, you must join the Faction, the faction needs you still, if you understand. If you can still comprehend what's good for you. Think, think, think, just think and consider for a moment, there are planet-dreaming men, whose hearts are shaped like moons because of it. We only seek to prevent the same treatment from happening to you as well, since, I would will it, if I could. I'd set you free from this agony since you're unfixable, by natural, traditional means.

There's an unorthodox kind of practice, or doing I would enjoy attempting on your bodies, but I suppose.'

'Do it, you've got my permission, anything but this. There's no blood drawing out of my head, or his. But chunks are missing and I can feel parts of my minds flashing away.'

'Very well then, I shall proceed within the hour.'

A painless treatment that almost started pushing from one side to another, kicking as it was hardened in place. It was a strange kind of way of calling it a success, since both of them stood one foot high-elongated but riddled with scale-shaped transparent parasites. Long thin wooden, burnt, and filled with moisture, gray were their clothes, and grey were the pseudo-branches that were their eyes and fingers and parts of their necks and backs, these look-a-likes came out of the missing chunks. But the leaves were cloudy fat, as they grew peculiar flat, chess-board shaped platforms upon which weird numbers constantly appeared then simply disappeared after that. Dark words that messed with the two dimensional eyed poles that were lodged inside the ceiling. Both the ones below, and the ones above spoke of the most bastardly of doings.

‘I don’t think that is a tree that’s been put inside our heads. There’s no way such a thing could’ve sprouted on its own.’

‘He’s shoved two carved idols inside of us, bastard, he’s not a medic, he’s a holy man, a liar of chunks. I didn’t take into account the possibility of being turned to faith, alas.’

They were freed. And allowed to join the covenant; although most of them were bearing wooden prosthetics carved to seem as if they were people of their own, there was only one thing worth of noting. Neither of them acted as if they had been spared to begin with.

‘Heneliner aurnen goulrunhnir, gheerour prendef glfenevele nanryne, vefro ale, apfnej le Bnurt fush yiel ulnf ven!’

‘Vesl yrenskef, vrelr Un’rergl ynl fazr?’

‘Glylo, elnrt ye oete lekryhnler opolnerrot!’

They kept at it for hours, the wretched beings.

‘Meheehynupr ranot, nhupevj hyiu henrests.’

Most of them wreathing in place, without a single head coming apart: They were broken and barely going at it, ten tinted beings, all falling apart. Dark flying thing with arms attached to its back.

Splattering Anne Frank’s moist pussy with twenty liters of cum followed by a few more shots.

A little tadpole screw coming out the top of it, a plate-down put depression as if drilled in with a screwdriver core-machine down-putter; with a little blob-thing beneath it, a pillar-thing with eighteen sides, chiseled in, with gun-like shooting protrusions coming out of its every angle. Tomb-people being wrapped around it, held in place by chains; but these great things, these sun-domed plates would be aligned every fifteen meters or so alongside a road-long depressed into the ground stairway that could be lowered or lifted depending on the action itself, not to mention the degrading thing that was the unsanitary growths of hair-things that spread alongside them. Various building-structures adorning a semi-circle that directly faced the man drawing along the steps; whereas the tap-pole filled screwed on tall braziers signaled the moving buildings that constantly switched between one another, having had their rotten bone-dry lower bases eaten by some hard to stare at locust headed-tall cricketed, -workers whose lower bodies were slug-like submarine missile wrought into shape, as they moved in motions nearing shot-bullet exchanges. A little conveyer-set standing by the side, cruelly chained figure was raised from beneath the earth at various intervals. He was a piece, a tube-cylinder left arm and a scorpion pincer shaped shooter with a thinner bulb coming out its end, unable to be split in half it only rested there, bothersomly jerking. A fat chest with a black-widow mark lead into an elongated bulk-contortion, close to a dolphin creature, twisted beneath its head, as a coil drew out of it, clenching what it could instead.

He was Assius and once he stopped dipping beneath the earth, he began taking everything apart as he's made his way towards him.

There was something extremely wrong about the buildings, since they had to curve around the scythe, the domed-roundedness that set them apart from normal ones. They were all tilted, yet most peculiarly shaped, standing eerily in place, spoiled fruits of some kind or wax candle wrap-around things that simply forced their way through one another.

Addiction-Obsession

‘The chambers are off the charts, from haughty yet allure that might be prophesized by such pretenders rowing through abyss unsung in search for one as ought to follow one’s path to own demise, partaking in prayer though never called for greatness pure, as to observe that the halls were made to serve only those who are obscure. For us the many.’

A voice was stopped.

‘Soothe it, try soothing it before hearing their side, they will wreath him open, popping like a dart, cradle it as if it was their child and when that’s stopped happening, they will come for us.’

‘For us? But we had no hand in it whatsoever, how could they come for us?’

‘It’s simply untrue.’

They recognized the sound, annoying blue-oystery grating with some, some:

Roots:

Each of them held down some dark unnatural thing, partially eaten as well as upside down hangingly, as it stretched, a single non-human entity alive, but thoroughly devoured as well, as everything else that soothe the air, in high appearance mourning. A mounting racket on the ceiling top brought the borough hardened as it were, to a simple stop.

A lab and a historian’s nest were connected to it, in which many of the experiments had been stored and had been finely, nifty placed.

‘The roots have started sprouting from one of those spots, one of the blue-cathedral walking cracks where they used to survey the area and store everything that didn’t fit their likings, do you remember that? Because, I don’t think I do.

I’ve been trying my hand on the lot for a while, but I can only feel some pressure coming from inside of there. There is a propagator’s nest I would not enjoy sitting in for long.

You know what kinds of scientists still live in those empty tall houses, right?’

Hawh shook his head then said:

‘No one?’

In a most naïve way.’

‘No one well to do in their heads, since they plastered the entire place, placated it with their insufferableness, you can still see it going on.’

Various cogs and machines drew the various tools they crafted in order to draw their minds out of their brains, out of their craniums, in order to propel them out into the world. But it had been a failure of great magnitudes and such proportions that no one could forget what fell from the darkened sky, from the clouded- yet benign and the stop of cognitive cries that followed after. There was such a sad allure as one would have it gone. If only there were, if only there was some way to get rid of it.

But poles, a lot of them and totems and various other encased devices had been brought by those appendages that came out of every house. Tall-dark blasphemous chimneys they could not get themselves rid of. Mantis blades but iron at the ends of those stoves, but no coughing smoke or blasphemous frolic that would earn them the least amount of hope. Many have secured incineration yet were damned as the Hellish callers of the Ball had curved their suffering's stall and brought them still, worshippers delivered, yet uncannily felt and shivered. Many tall headed-long, many with wavy curly hair and features that were pushed out far; jaws that far extended then went up and encased their entire bodies, limbless but with holes all around. Many phenotypical bastardities in-humansque, largely driven away from their homelands then made to rot as they changed. But they were still blocked from fully entering the lower- plains and disallowed, banned, as their bones crumbled, nothing would make any sense.

Mush-lords of roots, and many plushy-skin and foam within, all spread wherever one could see. A long faced figure, almost like a hounds, flat like a surfboard with a giant bud, sticking off its side, like the end of a hive or a wasp's abdomen at large, as largely as it were lethargically bothered by what was going on in there, a few bulbs in the back and a sea-crown that pointed like a cut-in coin, and a few livid chains as well, all popping out of it, spiraling around as it could no longer get a hold of itself or what was going on in there.

Many, many, many poles, beams now raised all around the ground, within each's grasp, dripping, but spread around, a micro-disease of unseen masks collected and left there, undirected at anything in particular, but livid-shrunken, like the faces of men.

'The scientists are still trying to collect what they can and they will do with it until there's nothing left for them to do with.'

And a pagan's worship, somewhere else, the library was being dissected in their den:

Fewer drones than what there could be seen. Historians whose eyes were taken out and replaced with blinded things that would make no sense out of anything.

'What would you make of him?

He used to be Adornius, one of the pumped-in to a bloody giant ruler of Argues, but now, he's naught but a shell of some hominid they've taken everything out of him, incapable to fully release the dreaded thing they've cast him in, to such measure endowed, to their likings, they have handicapped and crippled him, to the worst part and the most insoluble thing there is, I would say this at last, there will never be a man like him, never, never, none-within.

IT talks but can never reveal itself, come on out, come on out!"

But that rotten cadaver of a man, whose fashioned himself a cast of armor, almost dead, refused to approach, knowingly aware of the entrapment they had set for him. Lain about, in such a manner, that they would be dissected sooner than later, or therefore after. He's encased himself with a full party of similarly ghoulish figures, many of them being well-beyond the recognition of man. Armored with power devices and small heads, too rounded, in the back, too small up-front and depressed in, a few meters, more than enough.

Dreads and coils of iron connecting to their enormous packs, long-like trucks, but they carried them with the help of their many legs that rounded up, then became as flaccid as for carry all that weight by slipping on it forward, otherwise? It would not work, they would simply work themselves to death, and then, nothing else could have them up for straddle or come right after.

‘The silence and the glowing lights, it’s what disrobed me of thinking of him as a human, a long time ago.’

Said Gurney, who was just as surprised at himself as everyone else was; this was not a case he had prepared himself to deal with, not that he was alive, or there. They weren’t listening closely enough to this specter of his, although, much to himself, unaware of it, he continued.

‘I will stop myself just in time to feel some of the gas come to my nostrils and then, I shall travel back and continue where I was left to.’

But stopped, the rounded cylindrical prisons came again, rounding each other up, spinning as to bounce upon one another’s after tracks, it was something of an impossible task to deal with.

Laziness, barbarous laziness, a powerless finger that would not get up, the impossibility of trying to lay content with it now; it would do no one any good, but the sickness continued, the sickness that was beyond a plague, stronger than it, anyway.’

Last night, that’s when it happened. Last night, that is the correct assertion. Little by little, lilies spread upon the dark shower. IT would be somewhat irresponsible to pick up the mug from where it stood, black coffee doesn’t grow on trees after all.

A petite figure, the petite figure of a woman being delivered, while also contorted inside a tiny box that barely afforded for any movement to be had; a nasty whore, the nastiest whorish type, the type you’d violently rape inside then pull a few beads out of her, the ovaries taken back; by plumbers, operators, welders, violent rapists, workmen, construction workers, even politicians, and the worst kind, the popular types, the slackers, the rich, the ones whom had belonged to snobbery, rubbing it underneath your nose while raping her like everyone else whenever he wanted to. That dumb whore, the delivery guy gave her a kiss, then he fisted her in the chest and revealed sand and grit, all falling off her.

Monday:

Worked upon in one of the local ‘Colleges’.

‘We shall start the transfusion of ovaries!’

One of the student council members who was in charge of just about every tool-head in sight said. He was a man of tall stature, greenish around the crowd of his eyes, like a macron, with his spring-hair and suit of many spades put together in crossed eyes with large reins and depictions of animals that had their eyes replaced with that of men, with four cones for a hand and glasses that were two elongated mouth-visors that allowed him to see dancing men in the air, and whose mouth was a strange repair-man, of about fifteen centimeters or so, a humanoid with many legs, connected to the roots of his teeth that wriggled himself around but whose mouth was a funnel, which didn't distract from the four wings that were put on a strange rotating screwing-bolt cylinder that came out of the council-leader back, much adorned by the looks of it by many iron black stings of leather that were attached to his arms, four and five and threes and twos as many, but stacked inside the ooze-puddle coffins in which they went back into, his nest appendages that would sometimes get drawn like the beads of an abacus as to be drawn by the unscrewing zeal that lend him the impression of a land-owner, or some slum. He was the slum, this entire place was a slum. And he was salivating, everyone could see. A dirty ice-box by his side held a few eggs he wanted to use, putting them inside of her, trying to have his arm at what seemed to be, ah, nicely done. He shoved it in the whore. Who was tied –like a frog; open surgery was allowed, but then, what for?’

‘Stop wriggling! The more you resist the harder will it be for me to put it in, clam down already! I told you that I’m not intending on doing something much worse than this, this initial!’

Ah, it worked, she was, she had been, it worked. The implant of the egg was done, it was in her. She had been abused in a most delicious kind of manner, rape would only come much later. Only when needed, and with hammers, iron-box-held hammers that would ensure the proper doing of her neck being wrung and spun. And his hand had begun wriggling around itself as some other students were called in and the front side of the auditorium lifted itself a few meters in the air, with them having become part of the table she was on as well as she began floating on a few of the walls, or at least some look-a-likes that were deemed to be some off-shots of her.

But not a single one wore the tomb, the womb that being the crypt it had become. What a wretched image the students were staring at:

A few womblless women hanging on top every wall, and a few more on the ceiling, incapable of looking alive or adorning the other one; whereas in front of them, a seal-black, the entry into a buccaneer’s no way back, raised like a trapdoor from the bowels of the earth, a black ravine, the crypt on top of which the altar of sacrifice had been fed on top of. And a few meters off the ground, where the rest of the room had been dislodged and allowed a few meters as well of sight, there she stood, levitating like a specter, in what appeared now to be nothing more than a forest of forms, of students that were made part of her, the ceiling, the board. And behind it, still working was Scurg, scarfed still, trying not to mourn for what was lost. As the entry allowed for the sacrifice to be carried over, no hammers allowed.

Down there a few more sanctimonious figures whom walked upon hindered legs in appreciation of whatever they’ve been taken a fool of as to give instead. As the set of pliers and of candles were being used, there was no way to determine whether or not the alumni allowed for such a derogatory kind of behavior that would take place in otherwise, unseen circumstances of fear that, just as seen, came at a price, that would not be discussed, ideally for no bothersome reason, other than the yellow windows that were their stars of North and south, blue sapphire with jolted ugly long-heads cajoling in the distance, praying on each totter. They brought the promise of death, but right before the students could be devoured, and drawn, farther away, and deep under.

First, a week earlier:

‘The test, this one will be administered by one who shall be referred to as the Doctor Decorum-Ark.’

Various colored sheets of illegal paper with guns were finely placed on everyone’s desk. Already a victim, head shot right off.

‘Yathzee!’

There was a score off the chip of the block that fell a bit too far off, and there was no possible way to deal with the sound of the bucket and the Buccaneer, and the Gravedigger that were both present, here. Next to where died. Here they drilled and pulled out a giant gelatin cast that floated right through the ceiling and off it weld unseen. Whereas the body left behind became, akin to a giant bird’s, stricken within the area where wings emerged, but unlike a bird, this mole dug its way down there. First sight of what was happening down there. A polluted area where some factors of molded skin would make no difference if they were deterred from being taken care of.

But still.

A train-ride even earlier allowed for one of the student’s houses to come, upon itself, although a rustic country-side little podgy-hedge, this shelter, this cabin, that had no body kept inside no more, bore still the signs of the Laplanders who had stolen sight from the freezing top of the basin-floor. Irrefutable proof that whoever inhabited this cabin was nothing more than a thief, a villain and a scoundrel whom had turned it into a most disturbingly-disgusting wagon he intended on using for his own vile purposes, as such, as to house fifteen hundred women killed and some outlaws he had dressed and armored into the headed-cowls, that had fallen from atop the sky.

‘A Bedouin prize, I swear this charm shall bear me the luck needed, whose criticism heeded no less than needed, as I’ve come to know.

I’ve skinned him alive myself and as I dealt the deadly blow, I could think of no one else but you! Friend Josephine, for you have told me prior of what happened to you, during sin. You slept with him, you whore!’

‘We were not even together, nor are we!’

‘But you owed me to abstained for I have peered upon you first. And now I won you by fair trial as I have killed this man, beaten him, destroyed what’s left of him, then threw him off a wall, like a fly, and what you see here is only the rest of him, that I managed to control myself and stop right in time that I may preserve it as a trinket of my conquest, that I may celebrate and rub it in, that I may have a laugh after, for I have slain thine lover and I will do it ever since, unless you accept my proposal and you serve me as you’re meant to do, sub-human dumb-bitch, whose eeriness conjured itself since, muddying your mind, contorting, whatever pure thought of you I may’ve had, pure virgin, now it’s all dispelled, and I only wanted you all for myself. Yet, seeing how all of that is too and beyond impossible, I suppose I could at the very least settle with whipping, flailing and doing onto you as I would do to any woman I have and ever will uncover!’

‘And what is that, Bedouin-hunter?’

They have weird colors, these strange creatures. Dark, extremely dark and tawny, and their clothes are much bizarre. Long hair, and hollow cheeks, weird structures, and in-betweens; strange-strange-strange desert nomads and ugly, puffy Camel Jockeys, weird hair. Clothes that don't appeal to anyone but a desert would leave one thirsty with despair!

A window was open. That nasty-whore-trapped-in-a-box, why do people do that? He wondered for a second, and then he realized, the hunt was on.

Everyone was taking the test, a difficult thing, especially since it was taken without any grading, or, much less. Sodium-consumption and joining the draft; a first line would, in theory sound something like this:

'I hate Kikes and I am going to kill them with switchblades; they ruin everything and the Holocaust did not happen, at all.' – Part of a much greater Manifesto. Somehow, they even ruined acceptable fine-sports, such as Bedouin Hunting, by monetizing it, turning it into one of their glamour shows they would much later blame it all on white cruelty. Before leaving for another, more profitable racket; shhhhh, shhh, shh, shh:

Seeds, a few of them planted everywhere, the size of nails; harder to see, much harder off the notepad, beneath everyone's bench. Iron-clubbed beneath the ground, with a few centimeters back and forth, then around; they had been taken out of some mortuary of dreams. It took some time off avoiding them, avoiding the feeling of wanting to scrape them off.

Lo' fifteen meters off to the right, the storm approached, beckoning the release as the gas-pumps deeply emerged again.

One of the adjacent to the exam-hall - rooms went through a lobotomy of disabled thought whose shortcoming still echoes through every bodily distraught wretched fury-left over canine-lodged not only inside every man but every corpse that hid around, running out of the way while in wait for the chaos to erupt.

'A new race of crime has just emerged not far from where we are sir, what are we to do about it?'

'I don't know just yet officer, but I've yet to inform you of the alternative to it, unfortunately. There's a certain, unmovable element that spans from their doing. We cannot contain them. Not without damaging the front.'

'What of it then?'

'It's not going to get any better from this point on, not that you'd care to know but.'

'Show me.'

Legless dead-horse bodies whose heads were two segments holding giant conical one eyed scarred-chiseled heads. They were in the hundreds, all of them in pairs of eight, rummaging through some of the least accessible things that surrounded them, hedges of little, spec-tiles almost deformed bear-footed platforms, many of whom were inaccessible by normal means, by foot or by hiking. A few more men appeared to rummage through some supplies, around this raised groove they could not remove themselves from around of. At large there were echoes that did not belong to the secluded area this desert had brought in. Some incompetent fools thought themselves capable enough of taking what was theirs and for that many good men suffered.

‘Lower them you cunts, I said lower them!’

A few more jointed cradles, by the looks of which there was no other way to remove themselves from the area where their children died. A few more questionable choices and decisions followed. There was no telling as to whom called the shots. A man approached. Either way, both the men and those creatures appeared to be moving like slugs around each other’s general areas, where one could see a clear enough difference between the two pairs, a clear enough renewal of interests, bone-like fragments coming out of them, men’s legs and arms leaving, dragging one another as if they had been forced to some helpful extent to keep going and rummaging in each other’s portions of interest. It would make no difference whatsoever whether or not the ones that called the shots were called into question.

There was no possible, distinguishable way of knowing whether or not. Whether or not it made a difference, the bona fide would not allow for such a thing to happen, at the very least not without doing something extreme, resorting to killing everyone in sight without giving the slightest shimmer of a reason for what would have to be a cut and dry choice, as to avoid, to an almost paranoid level, the butcherment, be it through spirit or through some disillusion of what entered them, painless contrivance.

‘Every man on sight seems to already be devoid of any situational awareness, a thing that might overcomplicate this circuit of men we’ve come to amass. Not to restrict whatever chance there might be to do something, but we can’t get away with it. Not without drawing some attention from the higher ups.

I think it’s safe to say that we’re beyond the zone of self-control, we’re beyond any reprimand we may go with, as to pat ourselves on the back knowing that we failed. These men were carelessly entrusted onto us, their lives resting in our hands, offered to the military through the wings of drafts and allowed to, only by the most satisfactorily of eminences their families could adhere to, the higher powers to which they prayed, in turn, with hopes that their children could somehow be returned safely onto them as if they were meant to survive. As if they were meant to return home safely, prosper and proliferate thereafter, but no, we’ve lied to them, spat in their faces, and sat on hollow graves of glass, thinking that somehow the ground beneath us would not shatter.

How wrong we were to think such a thing, how ignorant and mad, to consider there ever being a chance for us to achieve what our enemies did, what they’ve pained themselves through, what they destroyed and toppled in order to reach the point where they might yet to feel as strong as we thought we were. I think there’s little to be said or given in terms of compassion either the people of our country, or those that they have shared in life and contemplation. I think there’s little to nothing to be said about the people for whose Government we’ve come to betray, the Constitution we’ve yet to keep in our hearts as something that they could ever hope to embrace in a land that was theirs by right, by right fought for by their ancestors, by right their descendants worked hard to maintain, carrying their flags of battle as we’ve once promised to maintain and hold, as we held it, and as the same ancestors whose blood still flows through our veins as well have promised to, the honor we withheld for such a long while no longer being something of a virtue but instead, some bastardization, a lie we keep holding dearly onto so they could sleep upon empty graves, empty graves we have dug from beneath them thinking they would be unmoved by the ignorance we’ve promised to uphold, not to them, but for the new masters we’ve sold our souls to.

It's come to a point where for them and only for them do we commit the acts and atrocities we shall keep enforcing as a way to eradicate whichever opposition might hope to usurp our and ours only, the right to exist, the right to survive and to fight, as we hold the façade of, while the true victor, the bastard behind it all know what's true, what we're sent after, and what we lost along the way back home. For, this master had no care and never had for our people, nor did he pretend otherwise, from the ill-received start, and to have considered him us was a mistake out of which we have yet to see a chance as to recover, as he had sold us time and time again, for he had us fight not for the honor we've sworn to maintain, but all in the name of it, this wretched company of green of whose existence not even the sharpest baronette might weed, no chisel shatter, no hope to stay alive, as the cavalry is sent along side us, on the road, to say goodbye.'

'Are we doomed then sir?'

'I'm afraid we are so, lieutenant, I'm afraid we are. There's too many enemies on too many fronts, and ours is some parasite we cannot get rid of. Unfortunately, I'm afraid there might be no chance, whatsoever and no reason to fight it, not while knowing what it's become.'

The few of us that remain might have to look for another place, secluded and start our own forts, our own militia and do what we can in order to survive for as long as possible against the millions of hordes that threaten to trample us on their way toward what we could only hope to achieve undisturbed. It's a mere fact that they will stop at nothing to exterminate us, within reason of self-reflection, I could only hope to stay their hands for as long as I can, but look around and seeing how this world changed, I'm afraid there might be nothing we can do, nothing that we could possibly hope to deal or battle against.'

And it was pitiful how they chattered, gathered, crawled even, the strongest of men, hardly-branded, keeping a hold of their bones and everything that left their bodies, again and again, throned by nothing, not even the slightest reflection of trying to endure. Nothing too pure left in the world to obscure the chance of pain fading away; they had to get them, or else they would be cripples for the rest of their pitiful, refrain from saying; a swamp, crawling about them, to the point where they came out of their hidings. The embodied horse-shaped trunks started wriggling in place, not longer trying to hide away their strength, or the, beyond unreasonable power they harnessed, even when standing, proudly shown and fluttered in every single one's face, these filthy, unnatural-yet-nurtured wriggling tips they hid, the size of normal-common dynamite rods they held by crawling, almost teeth. They came out in the hundreds; but still maintained, somehow, despite those bodily stretches, not to puncture through their 'body-bags'. Fat, fat, fat, limbless and fat, but of two skins, a pile covering them as if suited with only an oblong for a cutout, out of which the real 'head came out of, a curved-inwardly almond shaped 'shield', yellowish, uglily-so, with a long syringe-shaped mouth, 'shattered' into smaller bits that moved around, used for crawling and to drag them closer, as they revealed giant bags in the back, the size of torsos. Not hairy, but mushy, almost niggerish-ugly, disgustingly deformed by the looks of which, they had crawled on top the limb-ripped men, whereas others had simply gotten on top the others, joining them. A happily-related conjunction, finally seeing them together in a way that would appease the most; having them leap around like dolphins or killer whales once it was deemed to be safe for them to show the worst that came out of their sub-human, inhumane species. A squadron of suicidal; armless niggers and kikes were being sent to prod the area. It had been no less than marvelous a thing to see them fight or be at each others' throats along the way, as they would only be assailed by the most disgusting, the most deprave of senses, disparities, since they had only been released out of some cage that was put here and there, forced into fighting like cock-pit dogs, niggers being lynched soon after, as soon as they were done chewing on a kike's throat. They put as many as five or so Yids in a cage, then sickled the niggers in like hounds until the monkeys got their way. Not many Semites lived soon after but a few of them got their way around the waste. Some were poisoned by blood, hence the death that followed after since the nigger didn't know any better, not to bite, not to bite, another nigger killed itself, but that could wait, as for now, everything was set. For some reason or another, in any other case, things were going on just as planned. No reason to stop now, since the tanks had arrived.

A greater crater, the inside of which this bubbling thing was, this depressingly deformed, unnatural home of emptiness, and fallen-over great canals revealed itself, no pity being gone, release. Another insignificant wretch, a king:

It came from the unawares, some indistinguishable plane not a single soul could point itself to, and then, giant bloated-long. Upon a truck with many feet lower body stood a long head with black cockroach burns, across its tawny coal-body tract. Many insect-like depressions, all resting as deep-hollows-in, whereas a swarm had just entered in; a dark horned crest of trails, coming out of it, where only a few livid things could survive near it- getting too close was impossible. Distance had to be maintained. A giant transparent see-through ooze, encompassing the right, rounded skull-like front, although featureless as the creature was, this gas-box, this cylindrical thing that even took a hold of its half-truck appeared to be frozen in place, yet moved with the creature as the various baubles were revealed, all in possession of the most decrepit in nature veal, many squirming beings as if planted-in botflies had been abandoned then left to die but their spirits never left. And whoever or whatever came out of this long-blasphemous fallen yet rotten being, could never yet allow for its spirit to fully leave this black tomb that was its body's first strive upon freight.

'I see it, lieutenant. And I thought we'd only have to deal with the parasites.'

But the more it stepped, the harder and more angled had its top horns become erect. As did every falling flake, out of which black cockroaches started spreading around as the death-like figure was yet to be referred to, directed to the chambers longed-for yet exposed.

'They are infested themselves, but they cannot now and for that we were trained to deal with at a level nearing the coming of the sooth, ah, the sound, the sound of waves that enters us now. It's come from another space, isn't it? It's come from a darker hole we may not be able to fathom nearing, since, they're already there.'

'As much as I'd like to tell you otherwise, I agree, their dominion is set and well-beyond our, to a level we could not endear trying to discern from the slither of domes that were put in each other's crops.'

First the gates; they had to have gotten there by chance. In their truck, a man kept together by strings, on top a bed of air, the rape acid, acreage being one.

'One more minute, I think there's a turn that's ought to be turned around, the first drift and we're off the coif, and we could risk falling off the cliff if they recognize and know who are we.'

‘I’m astonished, good man, but what is that gate? And what is that architecture I’m being met by? My eyes are still yet to be adapted for such a grant sight.’

The cut of the dice, two and two together, held by strapping pillar-like obelisks out of the insides of these fleshy things, they came out of: Like meaty armless men body-bags wearing caterpillar giant bodied-appendages they crawled out of their vertically held coffins. Off their sides; one out of the left pillar, one out of the right, connected with one another as their heads wrapped around each other’s collar-bone graves, the bastardly shot that came out of them, wriggling, churning, with many smaller actual bumps that elongated and came together for one last time in order to keep everything from falling apart. Like ritualistic masks, or boards, or shields, or flatter pears with smaller heads, or humanoid microcephalic heads, but a few compounded eyes aligned around a worm-band crown that wrapped them still. A doggish face on both sides, that opened to reveal a cluster of tiny almost stalactite or a downward facing forest of ice picks that were flesh and kept pumping into each other’s bodies, some left over unnatural body-mass that clearly didn’t belong to them. The system they were attached to was a state-kept secret.

‘If it doesn’t include rape, I’m heading back home glided in a buttress.’

‘Then we shall enter by all accounts and endear for as long as we can until we’re wretched to no account of lest despair!’

He started sneezing. Gazing at what remained of the sky, of the battlefield and of the men who now were raised off the ground, standing on top of each other’s shoulders, incapable of shedding tears for what appeared to be the first time in a long time, since they stopped. Echoes ran dry in the sea of sand, soil and the storm of boils that had them wrapped around, the bunches of men that strode from where they stood being incapable of stooping any lower than where they toppled some of the most obscure of beasts, many of them still clinging on them as if they were their fathers.

‘A feather.’

A pair of feathers, all coming down rolling down a hill of spools; a flock and headdress cabins’ chained wrap-arounds, with empty skulls adorned with war-paint, adorning the roundness of the car that came in, not on wheels, but harlequin-mannequins whose appendages – organic, scorpion tail-like, red and hairy, which at their ends formed a cylinder that gave the appearance, as there was a pseudo organic floor the lower side of a mirrored pair of appendages in which they kept pumping inside of, ‘cages’, which, or beneath which, held, wriggling eye-beads of some eerily strange liquid that kept forming and growling, flinging itself forward as to coat them further. Bird-cages saucer, near-like, the heads being connected to the flatter-oblong sides; not to mention that these structures were highly organic and those harlequin-things and torso-humanoid body suits were merely masking everything. The saucer in itself was more of a bulb all together, with the main bulk likening itself to a hunch-back mass, connected to the skulls by tendons that drew back on sight.

‘It ate one of the bird-feather men! Has it not?’

‘It most certainly did, but we’ve got no say into their ordeals, nor in it.’

Bottle-green

Filled with some peculiar greenish fluid, kept in a tell cylinder-watched, the men of the same origin as it, the giant potato-like machine skull, baggy-looking, in some leather-covered, hardier body come adrift, hugging the container by the looks of it, with the help of most lurid-looking claws contorted, and what darted back and forth was nothing but a sickening Isle, that came to him, bothersome but wonted. It looked like a rotten carcass, but no one else dared come any closer, since their risked their own organic filled and kept inside, their backpacks as Brain-scanning large machines, filled with gelatin-made-into men that refused to leave.

‘Eventually it will shatter and come apart. You know that, better so than anyone else. What do you think might happen when it reaches critical conditions and the mass starts rising up like a shaken bottle?’

‘It will shoot the head clean off into the sky. And we’ll leave after the show’s over; all because it’s too stubborn of a beast, too stubborn of a fiendish-dark-green-machine to release.’

But the color was only grated into them by the unsolicited nature of a fallen-sky, the colors it converged were anything but close to nothing, as to be laughed at. Since they moved, since that curtain proved; that there was little to no life sustainable by that point in the sky, no moon, no other planet left, nothing but the most unfathomably damp, darkened and sickeningly erect, to have called it so. A bothersome woe, with as little left to draw breath out. Some liquid-see through bubbles that they would call out for; one of them lowered as soon as they could. There was something of a noisome bothersome delight and an urge to shook it, largely put:

A crew-of eight were lowered out of their invisible ship. They were hardened in the head and covered in some chitinous membrane but lest of all, they felt little to no end to this chaotic venture.

The guards drew in, a companion formation of eighteen in the back, four in the front and a single strange gully of shapes, armless but filled with some few other corpses made of fat-bulby things that kept it a few feet above the ground, the legs of a Silo but many more. Too abhorrent to stare in any other direction than was necessary to draw away from; to cut, slither and recede, back into the unfathomable pit they’ve been raised out of.

‘Slithering-thing, ugly and tall!’

One of the men observed.

An ugly compact thing, like a box, with an insect’s abdomen behind’ in which no doubt, countless men had been mixed inside, a liquefied pool, that only distracted from this refrigerator-tool it was. With the hair-like long legs, it was a wonder they weren’t immediately bent on the assault.

Since the others had humanoid heads- or machine-things that looked like that, perfect imitations without the sockets.

The diplomat approached:

‘Where’d you come from? You couldn’t have come from somewhere out there, in the outer regions of the sky, since there’s but little and much worse.’

‘We’ve spoken to one of yours, the one that’s cradled, with a hive for a tail, with three holes bloating black smoke and the giant skull with floating green floating boxes for eyes. He whom had deformed the land to his liking and turned everything in a sea of whitish sand and blue, who has crawled like the deformed baguette, this curved caterpillar whom ate from one of his own and destroyed the glowing pink machine that made its unfathomable gulf’s dark ended end.

We’ve crossed the sea, ultramarine, we’ve contemplated rising trails of fire, large-held, wide-spread, unending disasters as to rinse this world of all these primitive-minded eaters, these voracious metallic cannibals and you know what we stumbled upon?’

‘There’s nothing but a great intention I might be endowed of asking; hence I ask you, carry on. I seek but such disturbance met, I seek most of all some laborious reason not to see it yet again, erected to its full strength.’

Though there was doubt as to whether or not that one, he knew about, had been fully destroyed. Since there were things out there, in the realms of valleys, the crags and stones, the ones wide-spread and the deep-cast galls many of their likes entrenched themselves, most treacherously sunken. Many of them were aware of what was happening out there, as well as the ordeals and the exchanges between one, another, then a second or a fourth, what they ate, the smaller, shorter, younger, even the youthful-as-to-yet-deceive, the ones that came from deep-retrieve, and what they’ve curbed, what they cracked, what they ruined in order to eat out of each other’s carcass; all the machines ruined by each other’s desire to put an end to life. Yet the organic life, the living had but thrust themselves into their hidden caves, the bothersome maze, or the hidden citadels that even at this point were not believed to be thrust into space. Since travel to that point was impossible, which was true for them and most especially, false as to lie, as to claim the humanoids reached the sky.

‘Where’d you come from?’

The diplomat’s sudden urge for change almost ruined the mood as he entered a single bothersome gull of wonderment, as to ask again. Stone had collapsed in the crags and there were many up-thrust ledges cast around, pushed, levied down, lowered and up-raised, even carried miles away from large distances no one should’ve accounted for, no one should’ve bothered one-self to do those things or carry in, from the portion of the sky that watched them still, and the glow of green that did not reach the yellowish-orange twas produced from some unknown source; there was definitely some recognizable force that didn’t wish to do those things, but continued masking as much as it could. An UV special light, beyond his awareness, that induced this cannibalization drivel of rage and of madness into these beings that were forced to grow into something in-between, not entirely mechanical, but not flesh either. Made into that jittery orange thing, as for one to derive what was happening to them. Hollow on the inside, where one would find a carcass still alive. Flying or chucking each other in the distance or to the side. Or a giant starved humanoid man, who looked like a skeleton and flashed with a bright blue light that had grabbed one of the caterpillar-shaped machines, the ones with the heads similar to men, then crushed them into deep resin, eating them slowly before growing a second head. But this giant second one had but came off the side and they shared, a single dark tooth-black as the night, made out of some coal-powder that kept puffing away, as it produced, this stalagmite of soot and coal, a bothersome growth of the ooze it produced every time it was fed something, while it ran around, whereas their ‘finger-toes’ fat with meat-like men but chiseled-hardened as stone, all chipped around the nail area in which they held some strange infantile-creatures inside- see through and filled with fluid as to allow for the resonance of survival to carry on over a little while longer than it would be needed, out of which, as if parasitically-made, rooted with tendons that were lodged part-way through the protecting see-through lay of the nail, but which never reached the ground, like mantis-scythes but fatter, much fatter, the diameter of huge rockets, segmented in two, with conical pointy tips at their ends, sticking out as if spear-sharpened pawns. Yet, the four great eyes of the skeletons, of course; they had become afflicted as well by this disgustingly insolent orange that had infested their spirits and made them assault, attack and fling themselves up-thrust against any other single being that would hence appear against them.

‘That one is on you, need I remind you of that? He is a Descendant of Man. There is still flesh on his bones as well, even though it may be a mere sheet, and something only a few meters off, pale as if a corpse, yet should not be easily denied when met by force, and crudely come in front of you, I.

I ask of you to tell us, where have you been hiding?’

‘I’m sorry sport, but we cannot betray our people just yet, not while there’s something we can still hope to get away with, not while there’s still a chance not to, you know. Give ourselves away. It would be a god damn shame, wouldn’t it? I suppose it would.

Doing something that could easily have been avoided.

It’s a cone of desperation we cannot get by without. We grow our own crops now.’

‘But the world is too barren for such a thing to happen, certainly there’s something foul at play, is there not?’

‘I couldn’t tell you, even if I wanted to, but I suppose, a little hint wouldn’t do anyone no harm. It’s got something to do with what you think it does!’

‘You insolent little insignificant biped, there’s been no man that’s even traversed the sea-like layers blocking the outer-paths. There’s been no man to ever have crossed, and if he ever did indeed cross the barriers preventing us from fully being engrossed, then fully absorbed by this being known as space, the chances of survival, trying to enter it by false-reason, desperation and wrong-think as to consider one capable of making-it-through, let alone find any space-like body out there, add up to an infinitesimal thing of little to nothing. Madness, it’s mad to think you’d survive being eaten by it; so, you’re either a liar, or.’

He had not considered this just yet. Even the other guards that now drew much closer to the bottle appeared to be somewhat, largely afraid.

The diplomat’s head which all of the sudden had been ripped apart by a display of tumorous-yet supreme amount of strength that went well and beyond the entire pulmonary strength, as to be well beyond it, off the charts, jumping off the hill with a somber quality of rose-tinted, almost stunted like the glass shard of towers through which it had been shot through the first elliptical embrace of the uncannily first pastor’s speech during the near-nigh ended come onto the last chapter in their short-lived lives – villagers of

Yorkinshiresin-since, thrice in peace and long past since the chance of any possible retreat to have been gone through upon the charge of the first to last chapter through which a gun hat shot just now, disrupting the sermon while the smoky-gas of a lifetime spent trying to inhale nothing more and nothing else other than some sea-worth of tobacco's vineyard of scum-foil tardy, oblique, of many put ever since, the blasted remains of their lord's maze, that giant cleaver shaped like a foot with wincing faces, all attached to the most pragmatic of the wretched cadaverous pale blasphemers without eyes and whose dyed hairs were long attached to the destruction of the world's come onto them from the other side, spidery-like spirits, amassed, being the servants of the man who had taken his lost shot off the bottle, but not because he died, since he was not ill but basked in sin and the most deprecatory destruction's maze come onto his filaments of rain and cherished rusty black-maze-like dog-tags he had collected ever since he had been a child and far beyond it, the lor'd -s idol, whom was present in the same very spokesman's chapel, destroyed partially by the rotten apparel he had postulated as to castrate with the help of the man-dog fiends that had filled the sky, elongated into every cloud, singing of praises, arms having become themselves mazes, which stole the only remaining heart and liver, every being shivered at the very thought of that, since they never bothered to look back at their caramel clothes as well as their ugly robes with red signs forming strange curtain-like figures laughing while cackling at them back with a commuting nurse's ruse upon them sponge sticking out as to signal that the machines that had been implanted into them some time ago in order to maintain their existence still worked as intended and not a single one of them, these poor souls that could not understand what was going on in here, nor would they realize what happened if they were, let's say, all of the sudden dragged from beneath the chapel's come to an end, shade of pits, all of which added to one another's girth, moving along the ground as if discs of clay had taken shape of them, wretchedly-benign, with pus things sticking out of it, globular tubes as well as eyes of hellishly cranial shaped gelatin shapes of stars that entered their arms, crawling inside, while crying and also laughing and bouncing in every single one of the men who were not present inside the chapel during the sermon's in between, with their eyes descended from their sockets towards the barrel, being a nicely, gun-powdery fashioned barrel of no other fine stretch than what would be expected of it, since I am but the victim here, officer, I am the victim, officer, I didn't do anything wrong, I'm a fine man, I never leave my house at all, please, sir, don't send me to the jail, sir, please, oh, sir, please, oh, don't do it, sir, I swear I will behave, I swear, sir that I won't do it again, don't send me to jail, sir, I learned my lesson, I swear, I'm a good person at heart; a boat shaped region in which the town and all the buildings appeared to be aligned in, not to mention that there was a certain dissimilitude to the contained, the ones that were inside that barrel long before it happened for either one to start again, quieting each other off while trying their arms and their hands in things they didn't even think before doing, since they showed signs of never even having tried before, the Ganja, the Ganja was the god of the lot and the lots were struck with the straw's gone onto the first day's large respite challenge of the willy-nilly therefore struck, the lightning stopped with the rain and before they knew what happened, the many bulb started growing once again, with all of their destruction's come onto the gone-for end during the time, as it was best to yet bequest of what it meant to be alive in the first place, while the tenebrous horror happened, as the bottle, which had previously been seen, in that other spot, where the barrel had been as well, alongside it, but not the beer which was in turn on top of the barrel, near the side of one of the buildings, the building that was still there, closer to the hinder deck, or the side of the deck to be more precise, as one would only close himself as well as his heart to these kind of things in fear of what might approach after, fearing, as, guilt showed along, as the wretched began singing and reminding one of what he lost, in that age, and in that towering world that's taken something from him, on his way out when he realized what they've done to him, what they've cut, as decrepit as he still was, that was his last shot, it's been the last shot, the last shot he's ever committed to, with a dead-cattle's prodder of a wife with a stump coming out of her eye on which she waltzes since she has no legs but a strange peculiar torsion shaped like'n backwardly thrusting pyramidal creation which opens at intervals of something between a few minutes and a few hours as well as the most decrepit thing of all, being the day when it will all end, when he will be incapable of recalling the events that had stolen whatever piece of day he may've had since it all happened so fast that eventually he forgot he took another shot.

A few of them appeared during the night in a most obtuse like manner of strolling with all of their feet interlocked in strange elephantine-like motions and bothersome quarrel-like stratagems of put-go getters maps they appeared to be staring at, tied to their bodies, in order to make do with the strange world they appeared to find themselves in. One peculiar night, as it's been, hardly recognized as something that's mattered past the drenched forth and called up-front abhorrent a trail of many termite-like creatures, all of which only dreaded to come forward whenever and therefore pleased by the insolence of the evil eyes that crawled out of the holes of demise their ancestors had been thrown inside of, leaving as little wonder to be upheld from the pits that'd been drenched with spoils, therefore theirs.

'It's struck noon already. But what does that mean, good sir?'

'I think there's something hardly felt by the brow of each mare that died in order to make that clock right over there!'

'And you would know what's been felt quite likely?'

'I haven't seen that clock over there in a lifetime, yet I'm ever so nearing the point of being intrigued by the intricacies that are communicated telepathically to me by it.'

What a marvelous crook indeed; tricking everyone into believing he is a clock.

It was a cradled in an upward steeping curve of a body, kind of like a caterpillar the size of a giant wagon-shape with a pseudo humanoid projected form of a head rising on a steep- with a pseudo nose and a jawless mouth bearing a few bulbic pills drooping out of the gaping hole that lay proportional to the empty space which was aligned where the eye sockets would end up being, but since the area was only raised at a shallow level from the back, that is to say the throne-like form being slightly rotated and molded into the 'creature's brain, this sticking bulb of a towering knot held a backward 'tunnel' like growth parallel to its 'body', that held a shark-like bomb headed one eyed rump at its end, whereas the other side of this tunnel, being split in two halves, appeared to hold a small humanoid body with two stumps for legs, armless yet with an elongated tongue-protrusion holding a botfly altar-like growth sticking out of a hole-like area that drew out of this body's right side. A wormy humanoid pin-head with a back-horn holding a meaty boomerang holding a tongue sword lodged into it. The tongue appeared to be curved upwardly at well, facing the ceiling, fleshy-rosy looking, a thing that held its 'hard' bits at its end, where a hilt of rounded crab-shelled hardened lumps clustered together only to hold two perfectly chiseled elongated triangles, each facing opposite directions, whereas the illusion of an altar had been given by a skull-like growth, an actual one, belonging to a humanoid, which was perfectly wrought in shape as if coated in marble, bearing a few chain-like pumping little pair of iron-black like whips that connected the lower growths beneath the 'crabbed-plates' to the rest of the fleshy tendons that appeared to maintain its circulation, being a sheet of flesh rather than a tongue, connected to the end of this wretched sickle. From its side, a few 'teeth' can be seen protruding, masticating evenly from the direction of that bulbic, horizontally but on a slightly raise and a slightly rotated off the horizon wedge, as if a mini-ramp or a puffy pillow was placed underneath it left little to nothing else to be discerned, as to understand what the reason was behind it being that way. That eye arched back, deeper inside, and was a strange liquefied eely mass that appeared to be in the habit of receding back and forth as if into a swirl-like pocket dug inside of this mammalian flesh of powdery brownish-blue, yellowish-purple, a dead-skin that was patchy here and there. Prognathism rather nicely observable in terms of its pin-head-like appearance on the other side of the head, the clearly fast-pushing, nastily deformed, not aerodynamic but something else; bearded by those three pills it used as 'walking-sticks', firmly planting them into the ground only to drag the rest of its body with the rest of it. Now resting like some ancient clock for no apparent reason. Many of these wretches appeared to hide, not only away from sight, lest one would count such a thing as probing one of the somber ones, the ones hiding with the rest of the unappeasable, most seething as to endear the presence of, every single one being touched and fleshy, torn apart, and grated with a single added in component that kept them all under control. Stony 'crag' of gelatin made out of bones that had been crushed a long time ago; four of them caught and impaled, isolated from the rest of the world, incapable of wriggling away, yet caught trying to escape.

Many men lay trapped as well, eyes-open wide, staring out like glowing lanterns, as they'd try growing in their legs outside. By the time of which, many of these appendages had become unrecognizable by all accounts, far beyond changed, pushed away, outwardly, then but grown-like mazes of hose-tendons, spread across a proliferated grown sea of plates on which they rested.

A chitinous guard was put in charge. A helmet that encompassed both his head and his outstretched in the front arms, chained by it; almost flat and plane with a raised fort-like both, rounded at the edges sticking out, from which no eye could be discerned other than some single visor kept in the middle out of which long black ringed 'legs' that pumped in and out delivered the much-required information that he needed to know about what happened around him. A tower, cotton-plant-like filled with bubbles of the worst kinds, capsules of the morning eve. Glory was sung, and the voices reeled, back and forth, uncannily descending, back and forth, uncannily ascending. But they were all cursed and trapped inside.

By the fourth hour of the unknown, a single man drew forth, from an insolent blocky road of rotund-spikes.

It was an island floating in nothingness, with cord of light sprouting every now and then, filling everything with power, energy nesting everywhere around. Various denivelated areas could be seen, of hills and other strange formations, but only a single mountain-like formation reigned in the middle, lest approach dictate. Various unfathomably hard to observe and rather clumsily forlorn graves, but nothing more than what he'd see:

'A ghoulish figure, I see in you, what I sees in me, I wager!'

'What is that?' Astonished, the man walked towards the figure.'

Gray-areas bottle-red

‘Most insoluble dark approaches, there’s but one that walks towards us so.’

‘What’s that man made out of then?’

‘Only the most insufferable collections or rags be known.’

Be tokened to Servile; a single vintage lopper wine. A tray he carried from the Rhine and therefore singing wonder-wife. He brought her in with him, jointed by the dark machine, a barrel rounded but fatter as it closed on to the top.

‘A man’s waiting in the foyer. Ain’t you going to greet him or something?’

‘Is there’s snuff involved, perhaps some cigar?’

One of bulbic-such emergence.

‘Would anyone just tell me what happened while I was gone?’

‘We would if we understood it ourselves, but unfortunately, there’s just no way to tell how or why, what they did!’

‘What and who, who did it?’

‘I don’t know.’

There’s nothing more to see around, no man, they vanished. An empty fluke, a giant bomb, a flatness made by a black-sun circle, leaving no town alive, no fauna, no life; no explanation; had the war already progressed as such a rate that no man would be left by a mere chance? Yet, there were, clearly buildings in the distance, most town and civilization had been spared. Why them? Why us?

‘Hello, are you alive?’

With a turn, the creature that had once stood before him fell apart; turned to death for life ahead was null. No radiation or contamination, it couldn’t have been a nuclear point; no crater either, but some flattened metal frames that were not lodged, like platforms but of colored dirt. Many frames like them around, to have leaped and danced on one would’ve meant death for certain, since there were other corpses that marked the perilous approach now.

‘There’s another assault coming along the way, sir. They’re preparing another launch!’

A swollen skeleton arm’s telecommunicator; chained by it; picked up by the rear end, seen to have entered in his arm, lodged like some kind of vein that became part of him, part of his chest, as it made it way, cleanly cutting through his clothes as if he remonstrance meant nothing, nothing at all. He had been of no mind to answer back, but they, whoever they were, wouldn’t strike in the same spot twice. He was wrong. It came again, like a black sun itself, carried with wriggles of puff, a black dandelion carried by a rocket, that flew in the same spot and spread the light of darkness soon after. After merely winking, willingly closing his eyes for another second, he had almost lost his consciousness for what appeared to be a fanciful fifteen minutes; whereas, upon finally opening his eyes, he was made by what could only be referred to as a second bath of soothe that was completely lacquered him in what appeared to be. Ah, a shake. His arm fell off, of course, but he had tried walking and nothing more, nothing more fell for now. Only his right arm. Luckily for the man, the skeleton arm that was implanted in his chest still worked. Whatever that communicator was made out of, it was definitely something close to being indestructible; since it had not bore a single scratch from the implosion. Whereas most of the corpses and the men around the area who had once been around him, all were dead; it was an incontestable fact that no man could even vaguely seek to appease or counterfeit the wonder, or recognize what happened after. The explosion had not only completely vanquished what would only seem to be a good portion of the bio-mass that was present in the area, but it had also managed to bring in with him, a single patron of war; whose patronage had only appeared to be presented with much distinction by the very fact that his uniform was literally filled with hundreds of trinkets, medals, some struck down hard-animals whose carcasses were only there for some reason or another, or would've at the very least yearned an eye craned here and there, back and forth, and either way; trenched-emerald with two faces on either sides of his front pockets, trapped inside squarish wooden-plaque chained around him, -panels; a belt made out of a few chains that had spikes wrapped around like the rose-leashes, forcing them to bleed on a constant, which only fed the two faces on either side that openly extended their mouths in order to lick some of the blood coming out of this never-ending blood-fountain they stood beneath of; a crown of spines that painted his trousers with a shade of most benign; whereas he wore a shirt of linen-cotton mix, of white and wiry-black laced and crisscrosses like railroad tracks with many in-between 'plank' shaped tendons that clearly pumped and wore rotating grinding wheel-like pudgy growths that were constantly being produced and shoved deeper in his chest and body, whereas the medals were iron-or bronze, some of them titanium, oversized things that were pinned with iron stakes the size of an average man's wrist; in possession, as they were, of shoulder pads shaped like two brain-lobes, with metal cases on top of them, spindly outlandish incisor-bearing as if they had been worn as helmets, that it to say, they somewhat resembled fire-less braziers, worn by these constantly melting baths of neurons, 'wax'-like in terms of the production, alas, therefore drained of all the power they might've bore; the man wore bore a single hood and had several eye-patches wrapped around his neck like dog collars, all in possession of eyes, he had earned by rightful combat, earn by trial, earn by death, earn by strength, for all that he wore was only a part of what he once had been a part of. The only survivor of a siege, having killed a few hundred men or so, smashing a glorious rack of eighteen hundred thousand tanks with his bare hands before jumping in the middle of the black sun in order to kill the only survivor there was from this complete obliteration; eighteen suns had been dispatched and still, this was not enough.

'You're hard-to-kill, aren't you? Man of soothe.'

'How did you survive that?'

'I'm here to answer the same question, but in your case, it would seem that the arm had already cut ahead of me.'

'What does mean?'

'It means that you're not human, as there's no way humans would survive so many hits while still standing. You took them one by one while suffering little to not pain; little to no sign of giving away.'

‘But what about my?’

It grew back, even the arm he had lost; it grew right back where it had once been.’

Deceitful sun!

‘It will fall again, you know? Taking both of us together if I can have it still sent after us; but, I see that you’ve got a communicator on you.’

‘I have. I suppose it’s yours?’

‘Of course it is, everything you see around you, this wide pile of nothing, it’s mine! All mine and I intend on taking you with me as long as you keep talking!’

‘Then I should stop!’

‘Not until I understand why, and how did you get that thing lodged in your chest, you won’t!’

There are men here, stirring in their graves. Their heirs never to be seen.

‘The bottle’s been wrong before.’

It only spoke with them when necessary, not to appease a likeness of no defeat, nor to deter from what might only be called a tiny passing, as of Yght. For Yght knew what lesser and what plenty meant; being aware of them while having infested the bottle before either one man could proceed having cut the plenty dead and plenty while; plenty cattle had been formed of men and entered the prattle. Only to fill another bottle and mourn the breaking of the others since the bottles had been ruined before.

A hierarchy, a monarchy, filled with only the most soluble of disgust. Wretched and filled with lust, contemplating only what would bring the ruin that’s been cast, away and a-glance, and therefore entered through one of the broken stances, of maligned wreathed in part and on side, and wretchedly benigned. There was no telling of whom would cast away such chance!’

A good chance at life, it promised.

A pose of room ebbed to be postulated upon no sight’s endurance come onto the prow of a closer, yet farther end. To have been cast away would mean mercy, for all that mattered and all that would’ve come to stumble onto the deterrent that was the leprous benigned solace of no bothersome appeal ever-bore!

It changed, or would change, the first of the surroundings, the heart of peril’s cast and yet morose!

‘You wouldn’t find a reason to behold the sight.’

Said one of the Eyaggs, as they formed a row, a cranial lobe upon which they stood, mourning the fleshy peel of the floor they had carved themselves unwittingly, without even bearing to stride away from what was fancied, upon the brow of a single reasonless abode and the retreat of which they were a part of no more!

A dais would do no prouder less; for such was burning in the veins a stroll, that the livid beings could barely bleakly withhold any if not all. Every moment but a stride and toll, towards the stray! A contrived little towel covered in drapes, curtains, stitched old patterns taken from swollen wool, and other cruel tools that were entered into him by tug of war, by chains forlorn and beaten to a pulp, then bleeding. Without a feasible way to tell whether or not he was still alive, a few lurches of the wretch approached. Many of them bastardly tainted, old and ancient, quiet in countenance but never-too close had they appeared before forming a gauntlet out of fear, a bulwark of torn apart walls and whatever piece of clay they could get alongside them, they had gotten, and then prayed. Prayed they did that something might chance upon their luck as to seek and find the moisture of a weakness they might exploit and snarl. They have, they did, begotten – trodden after, and miss-ports of lamentations, heard and rotten.

‘We shall march at noon and see to it, to such monsoon that we shall sweep onto him in a single day, and trench the rotten, therefore lay him into the early grave he’s been begging to be cast inside of!’

A befuddlement such, unlike no other followed.

A boat of corpses started running in circles, without leaving much to the aware men at the time a moment’s respite come again onto the brow of a second dock flown through, to stay their heated heads, satiated by the burning’s sun’s ember shed of warmth-like cozy bolts that had been thrown upon their brows while sweating.

‘There’s a man there, in that cabin, waiting for someone to come in! I can hear, hearer therer, titter tetter, going in-between, jumping around like some bullfrog lunatic but I can’t pinpoint what it is exactly, not that you’d understand what’s happening here, but I believe the man living in that solace, if one could call it so, to be under some influence of some incendiary globule entered and stopped-halfway through his throat by means of a single full gulp taken of eighteen shots that were supposed to be consecutive or at the very least be taken by such accounts as which, one would, suffice to say seek to no more have one or twice the many takers of his belly-bloat as his organs had obeyed the mutation off, having become him, or faced like him, inside his gut where they reside, ill-worn by means of growing tree-trunk-like kegs of bodies through which they had summoned a dead morsel with eighteen eyes living inside of him now, whispering to me at night words of terror I may not dare speak, unless endear me the burden of belief, for I fear as much may cruelly distort everything that’s been even remotefully formed in terms of verdure’s overdoing, not that I may think myself a saint as to despair when time and time’s companion, disease has taken cuts off me and sold them off to dreamers in the night, whom, now awakened threaten to kill me thus, for none the reason, none the matter, ever after, come onto me, brothers and I shall such discern the plan we shall endear the salt-riddles assault we’re to carry against his hold! For we are to kill the man by sunrise, unless blasphemy shall so foretell of our defeat and ever-creep into a pit of dark, where we’re to lay for longer than expected after that. I’m sunken of little hope as there is; yet the pre-makers are dead; entombed, for I’ve slain one of their putrid hearts, I carry on me, postulate before your every sight!’

For there it lay, the heart of putrid disease he had ripped apart from the torn-apart Pre-maker, a thing that was as thickly filled with fat as the headed-trunk of some elephant he had yet to see a reason to spare, or to do without now and again. He was of a mind not to spare another second, since time was forced to such an essence as none would have it otherwise. To him, such a disease would not endear another upheaval, nor would do. Puckery like some octopus, moving shakily in his hand, trying to escape, with a tomb-like key-hole inside of it, from which, or inside of, that is to say, it attempted crawling out but failed, a frail thing, as if in a cocoon or trapped in an egg, his prison, prior to such release, to such tease as one could not have run his hands through, chains of Eyre, of puckery remains, still fed with the bodies of men or their remains from time and time again, had sold its soul to some ghastly apparition, but there it stood, a child-like figure starved, with four great heads, no arms but three leg-formed appendages that were connected by a pseudo-web cartilage that allowed for smaller compartments with eerily elongated forms, like insectoid hairs to come out of it. Therefore lost for the time being, never-asking for a second's respite; again, the man, Heritage-Hunger threw a few human bones in for it to feed on its marrow. Despite the extra-headed growths in the back, it only bore a mind and a voice that whispered in return. The heart, this putrid thing was attached to both its and the man's body, by some transparent sheets, a few millimeters thick that entered his gut and fed his organs with organic mass it drew out of the infant. In so far, they were perched since they had accompanied him without saying a word. It was an irresponsible thing, to see and endear; out of fear, to slacken as they continued during their co-morbidity endeared, lest endured; by likeness that were anything but pure from a pint of swollen uncured meat, disease followed as soon as it could be retrieved!

'A funeral, at this late an hour, but how could it be?'

It was the cruelest day of the sun; a wretched Sun called Eagt; happiness and joy; a realm that barely felt any ill for the longest time and held warmth to such contempt that there was not a single dreadful thing, not a single misplaced thing to have dropped upon no broken heart, nothing that would bring any harm, to either of the citizens, whose glory was but sung. And sung they had for many days, and never to have known to pains, as they were known for, river tried, and tiresome benighted never existed, such was life. Whereas the vigil's end was wrung, and therefore, when, whenever sung. Such countenance disproved no less, such endless shining on the land, as to impress:

'That, which is swung therefore, I seek to understand which one!'

'I, brother, I am the last one whose arrival was barely recalled, I am the only one you shall ever feel such countenance as there shall ever be hard-felt and thrall. I shall be not, never to have wrought a single thought in the matter, knowing I have called you so, once, to likened, never blow. And never shall I cast each quail, or ever shall I make; or force another to feel such pain, I shall not live with such contempt for self! For I have known myself, thyself!'

With which they had approached, still-parted, almost darted from one direction, and therefore started. A crowd had formed, but little was there spoken of the foul, or the spoke-true, or the ever-due, to be delivered, past on cue.

'It's a parched little thing, ain't it? Aren't you supposed to feed her a tad more than a little wretch's porridge portion of mildew?'

'I shall make the little one vanish upon your sight then, if you're so inclined in not appraising it with the rest of the crowd!'

With which the mad one stepped back, flickering a podgy little wretchedly rotten thumb, out of whom the puffs of purple rot and mush, started coming out his body now, encompassing the little dog, which benumbed by the man started rotting away into a flattering little pudgy block of mass, crawling and barely recognizable at all. Shocked the crowd immediately started drawing in on him, without doing as little as, forlorn as it'd be, lose a whim; pulling out sticks and coal poker; beating the man to an inch of his life, leaving him with the stooping doog-blob; barely alive. A deserted area left on top of their slithering minds. Staring as if through two visors; one seeing the puffs of the macabre and the other one what was to come; they brought this place to ruin and made morbid little growths puff, out of themselves, out of whoever stood out there now; but the vision ended as soon as they both got up, darting away, barely capable of doing so, until dragged by a remorseful man to one of the nearest hospitals their good health could provide a spend for.

‘Good martyr of our sins, but, why have you taken the pity on us?’

‘We’ve taken you to the morgue, and the morgue is settled to be carried away to the pits of fire where your bodies shall be incinerated!’

Quickly reposed the strange man, while the others laughed languidly so, locking up the door; stooping extremely low before they could do it all again. Upon the echo’s first distraught command, which entered the minds belonging to the corpses brought and buried inside each little box, they rose as if from dead. Some despaired, tottering as if on mares, incapable of seeing titter or yonder, wherever else?’

‘Woe; woe, and woe onto the likes! They have settled to get rid of us in the worst possible manner, therefore strung! I am but to cast away!’

But a second more and the mad man Oiffel Cone pulled out a puffy toe out of his mighty bag, the one hid inside his chest, where his heart might’ve had a heart attack stored in and with a puff out of a pipe he hid besides of it, lighted by him by squeezing a fire-brim liquid out of his iris like some peculiar puffy lizard that was in need of a smoke and began reciting his wild incantations. So much so for his creations, one appeared as if from jest, one that only took the mind away from some typhoon of many limbs that cragged in his way. Dire and in dire need to breed it appeared only of a mind and of a whim; tall and impish, hairy but bald like some short dwarf-sized man; with his chest blue-dark and his limbs of different colors and a wing-harm shaped tongue-like-spread tail, eerily barred as if a prison-cell, but almost like a fish-tail; whereas every bar was a cylindrical worm-like figure like himself with their faces and limbs elongated and twisted around like some barber-shop sign of fleshiness. He bore one big eye and teeth that were elongated like incisors and made a tiny forest which spread out like some cash-register or some pump, or piston, forward, every time he spoke as well. And his arms-shoulder formations were two American-hand-egg shaped bulbs that were also pushed out like pistons by bone-like covered, completely in muck cartilage beams with strange holes bore inside of them, submachine like, out of which human soul-faced puffs of smoke came out of.

‘What is thine name, vile wretch? What is thine calling?’

‘My name is Nigger!’

Ah, another gulp of the spirits, as one ought to take during such moments of wild slithering diffusions! But something about him did not make sense at all, for what wretch could do without the servitor itself, the master being mastered as that thing split itself in half and allowed for so much so another thing to take its place. A wretched human made of pure-light appeared whereas the split-half mildew grounded the spot; drooping slightly was the ground made to bear the heaviness of the sightened thing, but not too sharp was the light that pushed out of him as to blind every corpse than ran around, nor too shabby as the wretched leer that followed after came with such despair as the filament of the two splits allowed for it to wallow in of and there:

‘You’ve gotten yourself a troubled countenance to deal with, if such’s the case. And I see no way that might allow you to escape from this sightened blessing, countless waiting hours therefore gone, in the land of never-come. But this departure’s wretch of the hour, and therefore sour, for they might only incite the corpses as to pin, the burning such within and taken to the grave on a whim as they cherish such an escapade. Remain here and I shall see whether or not there’s a chance for me to find a clasp, a lever struck or something that might such allow you to run out!’

Oiffel merely nodded in agreement with this glowing bulb of man. While only waiting during his countenance’s apparent quail; merely endearing the wait in the company of the two Niggers with which he chose to spend the time with. Whereas the bulbic-light parsed through, as if a gust of air swollen by withdrew:

Upon walking out, the shade of man switched his color to a purplish swimming fish inside of it; with almost human-like faces, lending upon one another’s scaly cheeks, kisses of rot. Blood colored him in clot in an instant. And beheaded fish-heads started falling out of him as well as murky water. The hall was twisted, for it was inside a helicopter’s holding area in the back; as peculiar as it had been, the colossal size of the flying machine was nothing to ogle towards, yet. The men started at him with no flashiness of flung despair; but prattle of such abode. Countenance of an over-boat!

‘You, stranger, you’re to be held in place. And kilt upon sightened blight and spare us not a wonder and wince away, nor seethe!’

Farther down the earth:

While and during the first and second, between the fourth and the eleventh step which is being taken now, before it will be taken again; walks, walking still, first hour of the evening’s second of May after midnight, when the clock hits fifteen, another eight follows; the man wearing a petticoat calico-treasured ribbon-sweater with buttons adorning his large-smallish, eight inch thick-thin liquorish-of-chemical-colouring cotton collar of four pieces with cleaver-encrusted with human faces at their ends gems of flesh; that whispered to him nasty, rage-inducing, fastidious yet eloquent sonnets, improperly sung, that only aggravated his dislike; during this melancholy day; his pants of empty dark gray, no shoes, but shoelaces wrapped around like bandages; extending to his head, as they formed a nice shoelace outline of his body that never got ripped apart; this man found himself confiscated, while carried away beneath a giant mould filled with puffy appendages creature as big as a small Silo; for the crime he committed two nights ago, when drunk, he violently raped a woman; and her eyes were pure yellow; it lured him into the building; the wretched flying head who was in control of this usury shark; lo’ two boxes; eight fridges, a king-sized bed, eighteen coffins, twenty stooges, some rotten beef, a few dark stained metal cages, filled with diamond men with human eyes of skin instead, two radiators whose active heat warmed the room immediately; prison bars, a niche coloured by purple and by white stripes with claw marks but only superficial, after dark, rotten regalia, clothes thrown in piles, medium-sized mildly-attractive, yet in possession of elongated heads which stood in contrast with their dwarf-like figures, shrunken top-browed and top-of-the-head formations at their ends, watchers of one eye each; yet the room was a four by four; although it had many other rooms that were yet to be explored; and that alone, granted, was Heckorottus's most loathed of crudities he adorned his palace with; a wont for wonder stemming from the acceptance of others he had yet to received, since neither man nor beast managed to survive through the fist of lays upon which they flung themselves, in solace and despair. No one to sing him praise in contemplation of his grandest, most well-thought and worked upon creations; no one to praise his designs, the many rooms he had worked upon during the time he had been blind. Although a deformed wretch, now, rotting from old age, still breathing, lurching, craning, sitting still and mighty ill. I should ask him first:

‘May I enter?’

‘You may not!’

The house; it's burning. Someone killed all of my children. Someone ruined my house and my carpets, all of the things I collected throughout the years. Heckorottus, poor, poor Heckorottus; his house turned to tumbling ashes. Disastrous an end, therefore sent onto the afterlife, in dream would he prevail. As long as he maintained this tainted illusion, all would fare well for him in worlds of dreams and some that could not be lesser anymore.

Acts of vengeance

A deadly utmost vile engagement was about to happen, for what seemed to be, the duration of twenty or so days in which they were standing there, trying to piece everything together, many of the square-hill blocks being already moved from one side of the great-domed roomed roofed, as to house, in its one hundred meters or so raise, a hundreds of secret chambers that were all wired with globular down-prodding sharp-filled with drill tipped forests that pointed at their elongated-dark helmets, as they started only communicating with the most erogenous staring, yet pleasantly worn out crawl-from-below them bodies of green and murk-thing that covered their incessant dream like filaments of dark-prodding tubular plain-hard hemispheres-open trunks coming out of the driven in dark machines they had mounted themselves into. These dark sparrow-like beaked, eight wheeled on both sides with four great tubes coming out the front, bearing man-faces in front of them, coming out of tongue-prodders as to signal the second mouthed-maws that were rotating behind them: Thistl-yeehe-thistl-yeehe-thistl-yeehe-home-need-go-home' Voices being constantly played as if they were lascivious records that were incapable of stopping themselves from what was going inside of them, groping what they could as the many absent walls were stuck in mad waltz' like primordial stances that only seemed to prod into their bodies when least expecting what to happen or what could come into contact with them. All of the sudden, the middle-point area in the second stratum-zone, placed, placated in a obtusely raised angles that could be denivelated by the very staircases attached to them if they were actually molded, in a hybridizing manner, if so, the weight was circular and delivered through smallish tunnels of wildly, roughly eighteen meters in diameter or so. Bi-di-bid-dib-bid-bi-di – an activator appeared to signal the raising of a small elevator like tube-formation carried along by the men whose back had been replaced by strong-machines capable of fully expanding everything they were equipped with, for unnecessary reasons, there being no human appendages left, but many electron-filled filament arms that were connected to every spot in the room, as well as the strange, yet hard to glance at great floating-pair of eight mask that were marked with large word-signals made of animal-people that had been nailed into them, in shape, but never bled, instead they appeared to bloom, in that moment, as their incessant nature allowed just as much to be touched, their open-mouths revealing many tube-like trumpets that started, seemingly out of nowhere, producing sound-lanterns generating smoke-puffs of eyes that carried along cockroach bowls, with their elongated cockroach stings being outwardly protruding, and not only so but they also inserted themselves into the bowls, deepening as to fish out some of the cockroach-fists-fish, their knuckles being their side-slits that could only draw breath from the most innocuous of dark-crystals that were waiting for them to finish, yet, most peculiar as it were, there was only the sad-onion scent of puckery cadavers that were followed just as soon as they could get out of these unnatural things that made the moon they were on. Since this secret-building, with its rotating walls, that was placed upon eight great labyrinths, which, had been converted into peculiarly hard to look at levels that could not be touched by the likes of men since they had been completely rotten, structure by structure, until bolt-like scythes, that had been present there all along, like serpents that had fed on the most unnaturally hard to look at of times, during which they proved themselves incapable of living for too long unattended, they had shown the fear. That came just as soon, oozing, as much as they could, most bothersomely, as it happened. Beneath them, all of these labyrinths being close enough, roughly put, strange newspaper dusty grains of specks of many creatures of whose veins kept them all together, as they were incapable of truly getting along, hence they had been punished as if this was their version of hell, yet instead, in the back, somewhere, close to one hundred fifty miles in the distance, there was a factory they had been attached to, actually attached to, as if by this tunnel. An elongated military tunnel through which the corps went along, with their pails and their unnaturally, hard to look at elongated head-people that floated and didn't need bodies, but they were armored with devices that reanimated them not only like skeletons but hard to look at mad people who've been beheaded by terrorists put to their employ by niggerjews in order to drive their political opponents to death, therefore, only going as far as bringing their corpses there, in a small eighteen by eighteen, as for the room that was initially dug in and cemented into place, was to be an only son, a grave-cemetery whose implications lead it thus to create a second tower-like raised thing through which they crawled out of, on top of which the strange building ended up being placed on top of. As strange as it was, flying stairways with dark wings and electron stingers coming off their sides as if they had been spikes gathered dark-stormed cylindrically aligned as beaded lightning rod-hit bolts that started emanating strung-power structures that started shooting and bouncing against them, only to animate nothing else but the strain they needed to put their bodies through in order to connect to one of the houses that were the domed roof. Since the apartments were filled with strange people dressed in fancily sutured in blossomy red and other flying termite-head needle rack-destroyed but filled with many people as well that lived inside of them, these men being giants, the ones inside of which the tinier ones lived inside of, but could not be touched by all means since everything around them was oozing in wild directions, being so-far-so removed from them that they were far-removed from reality itself, slowly being driven not only apart but, they were also put into place, as the many inner-makings of the stuffing that was revealed soon after had anchor-rifts of many levels their elongating cysts hands had to constantly flip in order to survive, as, there, in the sky, although all was emptily grayish, there was a flying, open Lord inside a crawler, who was incapable of flipping the level by himself, as such, as he had done it, then he had put the many men to his employ to do it for him.

The military men realized their mistake far too late for anything even remotely, yet necessarily helpful to be done, as to save themselves from this conundrum they've forced themselves into.

Some incessant, dark looking, insignificant thing bore a knife along-side it. And it was dangerous, not to make a scene now.

'A bloody knife made out of insolence itself is just as useless as its user is unless he'd doing something with it. You're not to be taken any seriously now if you continue on this path; not yet, not just yet, I would find myself asking this of you, if you were inclined to say it. Where is, though? Where'd you hide it?'

'I, do not, Know. What you're talken about, retard.'

'That was rude, how dare you insult me, when I have granted you solace in the confines of my broken home, after spending so much time as to bring you where you are. I've put you up and I can put you back down, shove you back in place where you belong, do you hear me, you little shit? I could have you, I could have your entire family if I wanted to, strung like fucking dumb-dirty niggers, you hear?'

My heart bleeds candidly for people like you who show no fucking gratitude for their benefactors, and you know just what? I could have you, just.'

Damn him, he can see right through me, he can god damn see through me as if I were made of ice; regardless of it. I could play it cool, this palate of putrid allure could end just well for me.'

'Miuas the Lon; the deformed, creature of alacrity and might, calls upon you to return back home.'

'But who is he truly and when and where had he come from?'

'Betrayal, one akin to most deprave of little spins that come, and draw slither.'

'Stinted blood still runs freely off his forearm. I think there's nine of us left; at the very least, we should ensure there's, clearly something said.'

Evidently not since most would rather have themselves brought to the cutter; a little spot of dirt and of bloated little heads following around them.

A most disgusting face lay there, dropping low since it was only hung by one of its horns that served as a throat. It was hanging, droopingly down, facing upwardly still, the other, left horn being twisted like a mantis' scythe, or a little twisted thing, like the limbs of a deformed cartilage spider's bleating incisor turned to the side. Its face was warted, without a jaw, and the things that came out its lower moist-bag, were but shaped as tubes, drawing air from the ground. A nose had encompassed more than half of its face, the two eyes being fat-disgusting buttons, filled with oozing things that pushed in and out, then refrained from pumping, stopping so. Soaked and dripping on the ground. It oozed with head as it came about. The body to which the horn, connected, a hill-cartilage of bone, with a longer limp-lamia coil upon which it drooped along; whereas the front side of the body was loaded with the most unnatural things, of gun-cannons filled with spiked people, long but limbless, with faces filed with racial war, painted like niggers; black-face.

It came in the room, all of the sudden, readying itself to talk.

‘Lon, is that one of your servants?’

‘He’s mostly someone I looked forward to meeting.’

‘And are you pleased by the sight you’re met by?’

‘I am indeed, much so, as I would have it here, said but done, cadaverously heaping as it leaped out of its darkened, most mysterious of growths that came, morbidly inclined from every side, seen from above, taken as I shall have it, I shall cast it away, then tow whatever piece of rottenly spoiled meat, whichever that way.’

Lay where he may, he stood forth and crawled out of place, a most faceless thing approaching so. It brought an envelope with it, thus read:

‘War’s been declared with a most peculiar country there is, the Hyeany, they’ve announced their intention.’

‘For a nigger’s always in need of free stuff, a slave then, a slave now, incapable of fighting for himself.

But in need of others to take his round, to do onto him what they wouldn’t do on others.’

‘Where’d they come from and what do they do now?’

‘Destruction, that’s their blood’s misgiven hole of darkness that’s filled with lobes, they hide in it for some reason, haven’t you noticed still?’

‘What have you done to my nigger-son?’

Asked a most bastardly of men that showed up out of nowhere.

‘It speaks of ill, renown and less of wont, brought forth still from where it may come from. ‘

‘Where is it lain?’

‘In a single puckered kiss-faced melture, of drooping lids and many eyes, of teeth-like seals, wretched contortion with a spiraled body, a muddy pool of scum-basin, acidic tar.

That’s where I chucked your nigger-child in and that’s where it’s lain!’

A trench lay there, barely standing; a few people rested in it, wondering whether or not something will come into their view. Eerily so:

‘There it is, I’ve been toying with it for some time now, but I think I’m almost done with it. Come to like it, now did you? Have you? Thought you could stole it from me when I closed my eyes and turned my back, haven’t you?’

‘I didn’t think you’d notice, but I’m quaintly impressed, I’ll wager. That you’ve. You know, thought of this before, you’ve conditioned yourself in the same way a dog can be taught by his master, although you are the master and the dog, brainwashing yourself with vicious tapping on top your head, a good boy, a very good boy, you are. I think you are, most certainly you've outdone yourself.

Only to ensure I won't take that bone out of your mouth. That is a nice bone, a ship.'

'I am eating alone, and I shall cut my gums into it until they become, rust, for the next generation of barnacles to trample over me and my kin' of vileness and of hopelessness after; what is become I shall not be known to I but to those after, the descendants, that are made of steel.'

'Machines will eventually betray you, friend. And you are but destroy; for the time being. I shall make sure you are cast so into the pits of darkness, never-ending, for your agony-induced selfishness will never come to pass as long as there are people such as I to stand against you!'

'Want me to share?

'No, I don't want it anymore, fuck you!'

'I can give you my ship.'

'I can't carry it back home, I'll be gone by noon, sailed by the Moon and come into the plow of Mars where I shall be greeted by the evils of the sky, and the shapes that shall embrace me, days of cries being forgotten as soon as they reveal themselves as being after, my trails being left behind. A most sublime eeriness calling me home once I am done.'

There was nothing greater either, than disease.

Regdor's torso was become right side, trunk screeching a sphere that shot spikes in his face. But he was undeterred nonetheless. His friend that is.

'There's been an outbreak fifteen years ago, stranger. Don't go thinking about strolling through the city knocking on doors thinking no one's gonna start yapping their mouths all wily nilly because that's a great way to get two bucks by way of indentation off the other side of the street, with a buckle full of led, carried by the sheriff who's the boxer.'

'I got it, don't ask too much and nothing will happen. But don't you think that's asking a little bit too much out of me? Since, with all due respect, I've been here for twenty months already and there's been nothing but going back and forth's flying on the trail-rack, working on the dead-men's talk, in which we've swam through, a-taw.'

'It's not that cold out there son and the only corpses you'll have to worry on about is the carrions, whom, by now have already, all left for better homes, they're searching for some, I wager. They don't tell you this, when asking, but there's a big fat man out there, with the belly of a dome. He's hid something in there, I'm thinking it's rather unclean, going home that is, after taking a look for what he's done to himself.'

'Just what have you in mind, old man?'

'He's frail enough to fall off the ladder, and he's a bit of a cunt, I suppose. So go ahead, knock his head down, when he's not looking 'round, after, we'll talk.'

‘I don’t like what that sounds like; I’d rather not risk drawing too much attention onto myself, for obvious reasons.’

‘He’s watching isn’t he?’

The window-framed blinds, all barred like barracuda heaters, with sprawl-teeth aligned but locked in place, with a few body frames trapped inside a tiny sea, a forest’s maze; all with vicious looking armed men, connected to it, by tubes and then, a blimped-fat switchblade’s handle –growth, with a back wing-spread plank bone cartilage coming out of its head, with a deformed tooth in the front as well, coming out of it, and a most peculiar face whose noseless watch, and mouth-full of heaved-in mechanisms pushing out that were only eaten machines, only took away from its slit, the up-contorted V, whose eyes, although aligned as if to be two, were filled with many tiny growths that they themselves were ocular, organs, but both were akin, or closer within, two bud-filled roses, a deformed rectangular head that could barely stand as well, drooping downwardly but with a green heart that stopped and swelled. Beaded as in stance:

Out a way in, a rhythmic dance:

‘I’ll see to it that he don’t live no more, old man, and when I’m done with him, I’m heading back for your head.’

With a sudden change of heart, he leaves. The house on fire, as is the sky; himself engulfed, his eyes two eels, with sea-gulls bearing nuclear gardens in their mouths:

‘Going somewhere, young lady? Young ma’am, you’re looking mighty fine in this strange day of November Six, ninety.’

‘Ninety what, now?’

‘I got you to talk to me, that’s the farthest I’ve got on to, doing it. With a woman.

I’m making a fine progress ma’am, you’ve got to give it to me straight so. Do I stand a chance or do I not?’

‘You’re a nasty pig, I would never be with someone like you, plus. I’ve a got a real man, unlike you, pig!’

‘Not a fine, intelligent specimen I see, woman.’

Then he slapped her between her fine-breasted cheeks.

A few men were fighting down the road.

‘They spiked their oil with bourbon, you know? There’s no way back once’s in your system, you bite?’

‘I’d rather not, but why are they doing the? You know, why are they bleeding him?’

‘That’s the way it goes around here, and there’s definitely no way to get through it, not when you know what they put inside themselves nowadays. There’s a disparity in terms of the chemicals they inhale alone especially when you take into account that many of them are actually criminally insane by the likes of their very nature, since the bubble-spheres with diameters expressed into liquid the size of eighteen hundred thousand liters that are commonly found in the Ughyoxorh Valley of the diamond cut-squeeze of cancer-strike filth tendon army-made steam-peoples with empty legs, where we found your bastardly insane crazy-companion whose face was stitched to one of the elongated legless cacti sprung upon a broken shed fallen on top of him bloody-anchor trap – Heggy, has shown us that perhaps there are various disturbingly hard to swallow and ingest proton-bubbles that had burdened us ever since we’ve come into contact with these criminals, since we show signs of being contaminated to such degree that we began showing similar symptoms that match theirs with the margin of error night-close enough to a five pointer, in God’s name, friend, I hope you readied yourself for the dark times that await us, because just as they are to us, we are to them, carefully but-biologically bred soldieresque descendants, whom I have divined in a most precise manner using the greatest tools ever created yet put in humanity’s hands, the nuclear-bolted time-sight wish-capable-of-disintegrating spell-breaker of genies’ sedentary power- tool stuck in a moot-point loop out of which no one may be capable of escaping once entered but are replaced by look-alikes taking their place, outside lights drafting some of the dark-talls whose colossal race is but wearied and taken down by its own height, their chains bearing skulls of plight and despair as they are only covered in outlandish torpedoes aimed at the sky, this world belonging to them in some way or another, that I know of, that happened eleven hundred miles ago, in the place where I took out the last pucker-growth heart that almost escaped me, since I had to destroy it in order to fully replace the humanoid I’ve taken the memory of, but lo’, I find myself in such discontent as a knight whose armor had become the cast of his very intrepid soul, a darkening soulless cloud betokening his signal as to respond to the morose ritual of despair as he had stumbled onto the realization that he’s been kept inside an evil hold out of which he had escaped just now, in our time, being just as lost as we are, in this chaotic but infested by psychedelic diseases – plane of existence that he is forced to share with now, although one might think him at an advantage since trained in the art of combat, this combatant would have himself met only by worthy challengers he would cast himself against, as to rule in terms of bothersome infality, the curse that is the world we are responsible of brining to the state in which it is.’

Up there:

‘We have to bring the Vermillion people down, off the plug before they take us down a few altitudes!’

‘What’s that you have in mind then, Hiv? You’re packing enough bedraggled explosive that you could take the entire ship down and a city’s scraper’ just by walking into down the street, down the road, man, are you insane? Well are you? Answer me before I knock down both of your teeth and fill them with lead.’

‘All right, calm down before the storm’s brewing and takes us both down, you hear? There’s at least a few people watching down the other planes, they won’t be as happy as you are if we do the, you know.’

‘The what, do the what? Plant explosives in the main generator room, or how about the lower-boilers where they keep the men locked in? Or what about the others inside the trash compactors a floor below, where they keep the marble floors and the spine-trap doors near them?’

‘I got it, you know you don’t need to rub it in.’

A lower bug-bolt, it rolled down itself, crawling along on top a girthy tail.

They put buttons and a few skulls on it, the wooden-moist kept-still by eight hundred and seven hinges door, that was being cradled from one side of the other of the room by the bleary wind.

‘A gun, just what I needed.’

It had a bottled man wrapped around it. Who was wrapped around in cords with worms and evil looking bugs that had human-faces and elongated spiked necks that drew out and formed large spherical antennae like figures upon which tinier men were being sacrificed in the worst possible manner, possibly imaginable by any means whatsoever:

The man Vis-door locked himself in, all alone, driven in like a starved animal that could not have taken himself out of the stupor any sooner after taking another pair of eight-dead on shots.

A tunnel, half-way in with a pounded upon dust-maker seemingly dislodged out of its socket kept drumming in his ear as they tried getting in. It was a dead man’s land with no one around to prod the cattle or load in another slug in his Tommy-gun companion elongated head-shaped missile with tubes sticking out of it, and power-plugs drawing out nail-like growths like more compact needles that entered his arms, coming floatingly so out of the top-region of the ceiling where the parasites seemed to be lodged in.

Wielder of knife, wielder of knife, a single voice arose from the dark.

It was a sudden onset that followed after, in a waltz of echoes that would not stop, for a single pail of lighted candles, all delivered in a smallish bucket, carried by a single man:

‘Have you witnessed them driven in, by all means, and all rose out of sea?’

‘I haven’t heard of anyone, as a matter of fact, I’ve been hanging here alone, by the side of a sole shore, thinking to myself, keeping company to no one.’

‘Would you mind if I kept you company instead?’

Canned didn’t know whether or not the fellow was to be trusted, but he had little more in terms of alternative than he could think of. It was a merciless ocean, out from which his eyes could not have become wearier of looking at. But they both stared in the same direction, towards the same stones that adorned and admonished its rifts, the strong vortexes within and all that followed through and after. One in particular took over their eyes, both crescent-curved towards it, as if stuck in a lucid dream with it. A green-oozing eye being homed, as a stone pearled oyster, moving along by a downward pushing waxesque stream on top the tail of which it drew along, safely at a distance from the other creatures that ran alongside it; towards one of the most bastardy flowering gardens, the alarming lights flashing at a distance’s ole’.

A short breakage near the strange shore, a shortness of rafts was made do with the help of a much romboscou yet vicious eerie set of lumped growthed boils that only came to view in the fairness of light that came from the voracious eaten out of, pouting faced by spindly things-like armed but lumped together mischievously doggedly-felicitous as to signal the rampant cradle of dark-glow-y crystal-jeweled, dark-enamored by the magic-capable of casting necromantic skeletal, of whose grasps were coiled, underneath the veiled thundered upon, cast out of Heaven’s voice that was still unheard in timeless woe, and better was he to know, the man of the Mooned upon hybrid-Marses, eight of blooded red clot-oons, beaded marchingly obtuse, as to be eaten by Sea-god Venus Octave- voiceless in his maze, sickening to hear-listen-voice his thought, better no, as he had come and drawn upon, the priceless sky, taken from us, whom had been stranded upon a parched but swollen part and cradled piece of land, mistaken for a giant man who had been kneeled and bowed, to be entered from the brow, where his outer-reaches, handed tipped hands by nails of coffin-wailed but stilled in placed, as if chained but leathery, from the seepage of soil, the cemeteries being coiled now by tunnels, his flail, whom cast upon, been wrapped as well to every single one he pulled, back to his house, one of the Moons, as many of the reds, whom clothed his bodiless gaze were but destroyed during the time. A deep-resurfaced pantomime of mimicry being displayed by every man in sight, whom reasonless were they to ask for gratitude of something lost on them, when never to be pure but mourn-akin to such, endure, for as long as the echo's wail to have been bought some time as well until but run from side-side then disappeared, forcefully made to, now is run, through walls and pits, and mighty feet, that under, theirs, and longer seethe, were there reasons to listen to someone again, of whom, to listen to him now, and how to tell it. There was no one left alive to carry on the message any longer, for, mighty as he were, distraught and candor of every Moon, that joined soon enough, but true to one self and lesser many, parched could they, and run-through along each day, as to repeat what happened, in hopes of reap as such reward, and none. None could have defined it, gone.

In the morning, during one of the communions of the sunless things that had come and brought with them only the most unfathomably hard to stare at, darker fiends, upon the frail back of which there stood, unnaturally so, darker still and darkened still the day that came after, as if it's brought with it, still, there lay, before them, all, of darkest of the corpses rung, upon the patchy hills whose sutures were asked of whom were wrought if all were done, and buried but known, as there was no one alive, the beast brought forth, a castle with horns, and many, but corn, and shaped like that, worn. Towers and statuesque, figures that spanned to no end, and even farther than could be seen, the land was inhabited still, lesser than expected, to marry, the courtesans and the chamber maidens plenty, as for those that followed soon after could not forget and be but dead, and bathed into chamberlains, of wines but highest vintage beds were put in their chambers, where they stood for long.

'Brothers, where've you been and how come thou has cast along, when called upon the chamber pot, of whose fullness brought to stillness canny, and brought to you but corpsed lavish?'

'Illustrious most first of scholars that come after, the falling after and that which comes before us yonder, though toll has been cast upon our knees, it would but no suffice to clasp the casket, in which the bees and wasps and the ones that roast their witches- bats are jointed onto our legs today.'

And would it happen, if one were to believe it for a second as he, of all, would have to say?'

'A wretched torment, I see before my eyes, I'm met with countenance distraught and I can already see that, but tell me, dear brother, servant of the ceiling spikes, though you see eyes in it, there are things that I could not, and would bring myself not to act of them, if you were to understand.'

'Of what and whom had happened to repair, the one that is floating, the corpsed mummy filled with air?'

There was a lost train of thoughts, but it would've been ignored either way, for those that were fallacious enough as to ignore what happened, bastardly they should be and rounded roof, upon it, forget.

'Wretched is thine cast, my lord, for your house has brought me to a dead-end point where I can only look at the rotating floors as I'm delivered upon a stairway-throne that I cannot fix.'

'You need to fix it, or we'll bleed to death.'

One of them said and he didn't actually come to understand why or for what reason that might happen as well, since there were many things that flew across their eyes, like veils and curtains, smoke and mirrors that were made of shards and broken, lust was cast out, and they knew that they had knives, then they charged, stabbing and stagnating with cretin power magik bolts that had eyes and spikes and were cast into the world of darkness and of spinning thrones that entered the room and all was colored into alabaster and ultramarine and years within their grasp had so much so happened to be gone, all of the sudden before they could primordially understand, their eyes being not adapted, since they couldn't tell what was going on but it floated into view, the uncanny thing that was sinew, with eyes and with a floating spine, bubbling with air-things in which crime lived on forever.

A dark figure standing on a cattle prod, with a long shaft protruding out of its back, fifty meters in the back, where, upon being met by one of the converging points, it would, only naturally drawn towards one of the first gist-filled with bloody entrained upon its basket giant-colossal, but primed for entering two percent of the vaguely defined in terms of staring at it over a long enough period of time before the crippling but defunct, inflammatorily-killing but through cancerous destruction of lung-formations entered through the funnel of tunnels, whom, upon being revealed as to be put together by force and by a condensed amount of tension whose induced-through literally honed-skills put to use by repeatedly slamming the hard-side, luck-luster side of their covered-in-rust with point-struck, borderline microscopic precision-landed sledge hammer strikes, clearly misaligned with the welded-in spots where, upon carefully inspecting one would find that a certain amount of pressure, under which it had almost succumbed to, nigger-nigger-nigger-fuck, there was a slightly, 'miss-shelved' pressure-plate, on the entire form that belonged in the Area C', not Area A-B- twenty seven oh', since, it was colored, or seemed to be a shade off ultramarine alabaster green blue mixed with snail-slug shotgun slugs, shut-inside the speedometer baboon-shaped cockpit they stood in, for forty to twenty hours, playing with the Grand Master Champion-Humanitarian-killed during the first War, second War going in, hard, there were eighteen illegible people that were planted in the war as well, carrying with them, alongside the romboscous most deformed of kings, upon the platters made of eely wings, that had been cut, many of them being brought to life as their endless songs only had begun again, painlessly in awe, as the bastard eruption of wild yellow-filled with access flames and acres of warted spinning Holocaustic platters filled with the remains, cadaverous colossal slugs, upon the lunges, meters brought, houses being torn apart during the malignant storm, a headless being there he be no more, as it followed soon enough in death, bringing the pus-filled malady to an end, when all of the sudden, by the figure joined the jointed but bejeweled horn, it wore, and many more, such trinkets that covered in golden-brass pores, under which they started chirping-slam and lost about, then breaking down, most of everything apart, as infantile mostly un-defiled and un-deprived of joyless thing, as to be exposed up-since and brought to world, kept naïve, breaking down their toys, but many, plenty of bodies, through which the sea of twenty, kept on their shoulders in a boiler-shaped on top of a smaller platform that was queerly filled, twenty rock-shaped wheels as well, many of whom were but interconnected at each end the wrong way, fused, as if with long explosives, C4's, wrought in the shapes of coffins where, although they were all filled, Jag-Bowels, the Unprotector of God, had stolen the vigor of the broken lords of unspoken felt upon evils, bastardly casting each other away, as they could see eight great spheres, in the distance, his wardens that is, through their vision, they were inside, they were, he said, the one that was looking, the strange, that was aware of being watched by one of the torpedo-cameras with eyed spikes, hanging by up-rooted figures cast in stone that were in reality not statuesque but mad devices incapable of self-sociopathic control, fighting with one another during the time they were put on, break, as it happened, the alignment was something akin to, more so, four great spheres, on top of a cradle shaped boxed crate on top, put that is, a cargo, whom endless charge had killed the giant squid-master, Bastion of lightless days, immediately, an explosion came, spreading dust-shrapnel shock-waves of sand-dust cancer, which affected the sailors, whom upon brow, sunken in finger pulled out a rod-rotten angler's cast that pulled out a piece of his lodged in-brain, crisply burnt, as he settled, a floor above, he, the master, his home that was, inside the platform, no longer disturbed by his warden whom allowed his momentary escape and refuge out of his stolen-in life-time spent sentence, as he would come out of the great machine, eventually, being very much so a given, what was said and seen, the dark Gothic shaped people whose appearance denoted them of wearing antagonistic-seemingly never-to be embarked upon the dark journey of mad-inducing vigor of branded upon, most irresolute, had his body become once the pain stopped and he was tortured no more. There, Jag stood, although checker boarded as the land, crude. Was he of a mind to get out of this deformed prison and escape through the bowels of the earth, or make his eon-desired, fantasy dive, through higher ventures forced, although his mind would die, ever-after soon enough, but sough-for-less abyss gazed upon, thereafter brought to a recess of cut-off nerves. As he would have his throat slit during his sleep, then, his head bashed in, whereas finally would his brain be forced to pop, and they would join him, in the seamless never-ending haze, his dream has brought him on towards, the highly-raised bastions, where he would meet no gaze.

A citadel of killed-niggers stitched together by knives, whom had floated in before it could even get one of the droned in people began talking again, mesmerizingly, to one of the other ones, whom were already banished from sight, by naught more spoken, a single arm appeared to hold the chains drawing them, redolently so.

A dome opened, although the flocks of black flying cockroach swimming board-shaped moths- whom flew away from sight blinkingly, were swooned away as soon as it happened.

'A multitude of them, followed through, our lines of command entered them like butcher's codes in a simpleton's endeavor.'

'Who's been keeping track then?'

'I don't know, but there's at the very least.'

They stopped, immediately aghast. Both Guard Alk and Ey-line, were drowned by one of the falling coats. It stopped on them, for a few minutes, when all of the sudden their flattened lungs being wrought out of shape.

‘A man has been cut in these halls and he is bleeding on the floor. And I shall find the culprit whether or not it’s the last thing I’m going to go through before my life is stopped.’

‘Who’re you supposed to be, stranger?’

‘I’m the one who’s brought you to your senses the last time you did the, you know what it is, the unreasonable thing that entered your mind before you did it again.’

Both of them looked around, the walls being putrefied in the worst possible manner, many of them being portcullis windows bumped upwards, pointedly at the ceilings, as well as various other things. They were accompanied by deformed floors that were joined, like baby-ribs but hardened, as coiled escalator steps that would either recede or heave themselves upwardly, in continuous motions. With a giant drone-head motor-shaped as if attached to a boat, was it. A bleating, drearily beating organ being attached, instead of a pump to the cadavers that made the rocket, out of a few holes a few more unnaturally dark things, specks in their eyes, crickets, hundreds of them, blurring out the sound. One even wore a hardened clasped upon by a few pincers –claw that held a coil ruggedly so, a carrot at the end for a donkey’s sun, it carried with it. Everything was swaying itself, or themselves. Tired, of just about being worn out.

‘Come on, we’ve to check the body downstairs, there’s no time to waste, since the alternative is.’

Hermes-Crackle, he remembered.

‘Knives speak’

‘Have you heard one along the way, come upon, stumble? And wrought inside the quay? Whereas all stone-lime is done but chiseled as to none to look after him, whose petulance was merely run into the ground, swaying?’

‘Aye, I’ve seen it green and reddened as would any haze that’s been bubbled in, millimeter as much as would be spread, alight.’

A lighter being placed on top the table, on top a head, on top a moon, on top a cat who was a munching cottage with eight eyes to its hide, it wore, with long limbs filled with spiked- eels coming out of Gattling guns, and elongated tubular tails, it walked upon like flails, as it was adorned, by tombs, eighteen seventy seven of them, all bearing the casket-statues of English Lordish figures, whose might was still to be taken away, swinging wildly as they would from Quay to Quay, within an hourly parlor, walked on top off, then slid upon ice-break picks thumping down, with weighted lids, that watched them run, through a giant carcass of a snail’s shell shaped rib-cage that belonged to a deathly rotten godless being whose putrid legs were eely coils wrought in the Mountains of Anshaksu-Igo, and Alshefj-Ye, down the roads that interconnect to the fantasies of mild elation, oratorily bastardily startlingly mesmerizingly deprecatorily comatosely, sincerely. A dead person, whose sockets recorded it all, inside the boiled pools that belonged to his socketed eye-lids that had been beaten-in pounded until they started pushing out small bug-pills shapes that entered a crowned land, rounded up where large spear-shafts drew out of the ground, impaling every living being there was, as they manifested in the air, one by one, pouting pieces that were but being shot, then wrapped around, niggardly in a nigger-gets-lynched kind of manner.

A man emerged spoiled by blood and clot, his trophies being anchor shaped skulls that had been brought to him by ways of destitution, dreams of never done.

‘My hands are not bloodied, and I’ve had no hand in their murder. There are no complications, keeper of the-rib, hence I ask for free passage and consideration that I may be allowed to pass for long and darkly green surroundings gone, that I may see no verdure then I’ll ask, for a second more a scowl run through one of the putridly rotten walls they’ve made my bloody folk out of.’

‘I see, I see, there’s torture in every way, for those who live amongst the Quay. But what have you done to earn my trust? I see no hare or tortoise lust that’s been brought handedly into my palms, embalmed into a liquid-strung with little spoils of swoon.’

Many would’ve seen him cast out, of Havenless abode, a heathen who’d but ask for naught. A darkened blade whose darkened maze, although but eerily surreal, flail of casted upon him runes it bore, back into a gourd, but prude was he to ask for less, of visions highly sunken was there was distress, for him the cantor cast into the rubbing ground of worming thin, and brim was thrust out of him thereafter. He was but asked for by the ghost that came after:

‘Will you take me alongside your walk? The one’s that rubbed to cast you out?’

‘Nay, for I’ve seen a vision’s hold of might dreaded bolden, asked for such there might be call for, for there might be none to see for, root-four, sore as my lice’s brain, of broidery and such as lain, I see no reason to take you home, to a place there is no more. To a place cast in the dark, where living must do as they do, fall. When they might join you soon before, and wait for a ride that’s taken by whore. As such I will not take you, but you must wait.

I see that there’s a way.’

‘Please, do tell, man of escape, as you know better than I could ever know, although there’s time for more, I ask for you to tell me more.’

‘I can only tell you thus.

There shall be a tiny stone cast, from above. It will fall flat on your face. Although your spirit is in daze for what’s been happened to you, spectral, thou you must understand, that it will become your incubation, yours will be strapped in and never leave the nation of the spirits cast in stone. And you shall make the road, but this road won’t be just beneath the rib, but out of it, as well as through the worlds cast underneath the feet of every passer.

And sometime from there you shall meet your relatives in such ways that they will not have forgotten you for what’s worth, and for what’s been cornered past the worthless scuffle, shackled after, we shall drag you to the ones that hides.’

‘Who is he?’

‘He’s the repairmen of the road, the gravedigger if you must speak of cones, for they know better than to ask when called for and to be done, and wreath in iron.’

‘Will I be forged into a statue if I may, to ask?’

‘You can but I cannot promise you thus.’

‘What of other silver, bolden, of the stairs of flights and miss-beholden?’

‘I will give you destitution, I shall cast but an illusion, I shall do as I must and cast as thus again, most perilous of curtain-blind, upon your reddened eyes, bethroval to thine kin alike. I shall make sure your wife will have been known to you by the time.’

‘Whom of my family will know of pains that cast away, my soul but mazed but dethroned? I see it now, but I can say, with utmost consciousness that they will cast me away, the peasants with their arms, their ropes but cast-but thrust, will they know no peace after if I make a scene. If I were to yell and cast away.’

‘Then sin away and be damned, for you’re still a spirit, but you may become a ghoul that’s cast, onto the hill, near the slug, where you must arrive to, there you must!’

And then they were parted. Not to speak again.

Hastings was met not by the figure at the gated rib, but by something else, of mighty filth, but deadened beast was it:

An elongated shrapnel-domed, almost fishy-eely squirming as it was a pushed through forth, curved fish-like dolphin with a lower cricket-body but only two limbed humanoid-jointed wrought so, mouthless but with a boomerang-straight then to the right curved, cartilage shaped, as thick as the rest of its legs, came out. It presented itself as Herman.

‘I can take you out much more easily with this.’

Out is back, what split in half, came but a strange elongated reedy beam, with a mighty mounted turret-gun, filled with rounded barrels that drew out, as if it were a giant wine-cellar. Many of the barrels even bore strangely shaped lids, with eyes pushing out of them, akin, to drops off the ceiling, stopped. Only for a moment did they puke blood and clots and little parasites shaped like champagne bottle shots of flowing water upward-in a well kind of manner that formed four frozen-by-blood-clot pillars, interconnected by tubes as if they formed a box-match ring, below them, banded by eighteen more of them, but vaguely distorted as to be mattress-spring-like, whereas below, a giant bubbly-boil came out, bearing hundreds upon hundreds upon thousands of sharp points that wriggled in and out, burying inside wherever they could get wrapped into. A shoulder of charging bodies came out of nowhere, tackling it down, and then the giants fought, as there were eighteen of them. All bearing putrid axes and warts with boils and with humanoid elongation-shaped guns, out of which they began shootingly riddling everything with drown.

Kotya-Smoke Cradle of Looming tools put inside of dark-baboon

The sky was turbulent rubble blue with vapor red filling a haze patterned by diamond see-through transparent chitinous diamonded fish-nets with shells in-between with strange pear-onion womb-cysts filled with globed-reeled by long-tails worming in, squirming at the sky. A line of power-rails trailing-like wagons, long slits of iron, carried about, all holding men that only had their heads on wrought into strange bug-big bile shaped in gelatin torsos, faceless but without the sockets. Trapped in, held by chitinous-reverse pincer claws-thin that crisscrossed one another, and held, upon these almost ambulance on top of them –carrying the victim into it, from the place where he was hurt, devices. Echoes still could be heard. A sky of dirt, one of red, orange-organs and most importantly, of darker things, mixed with smog and coaled smoke. Melting over, passing through. Barb-wire keeping everything together from falling over, through sinew; the land below, in contrast, swollen; made of many raised platformed-canyons, all filled, or craters raised, still segmented but roads had been made within each gap, of swollen dust thrown around, small pillared constructions had been raised, many of them being almost – cylindrically but inclined on every face, bearing hundreds of facets as if they had been taken out of someones' crude interpretation, allegorical of otherwise, abstract, to such demise that they were floating-in between. Like burning candles, effigies, too many to count, casting shadows between the ones already cast from above. Ever moving to compress the bodies into swollen structures from which they could not escape nor return to home. But, lo, the land was lifeless as were the skies. Only one great structure stood, levitating upon a swoon, a square top ceiling long block pentagon-like flat demonical cacical face, with a mouth extending by the side and below of it, connected, like a horizontally, seen from above, crane, but only to match the head. Only one downward-pointing hose-neck throat-tube drew below, longingly, dangling by its side, an arched funnel-cut in half, or what remained of it, deprave, out of the tubular tendril, many smaller ones, tunnels that squirmed like worms connected to a weirdly strange circular, but standing on a vertically raised plane, almost elliptical disc that rested at the edge of the half funnel, which was so-much-so akin to a shovel, through which a smaller but visibly river's end shower or see-through eely things, thousands upon thousands of them connected and drew out, into a swollen balloon' bubbly blimps, whose flatness could only distract from the fact that it was slowly decaying. The water kept inside of it, prevented from being drained by the vaporous languid swollen-creatures, eyeless as they were, there stood. In sight, many ziggurats, squared and placed like islands, many of them, as much as ten, bore giant hive-like pointy throaty incisors as thick as buffalo-horns, projected upwardly instead. Well enough as it were, the great flying device's head was most like an elongated stapler, whose clicker was more like a scythe in terms of curvature as to occupy both the side of its face as well as the lower side of it, as well as it was a simple blocky-thing, kind of like a fat rectangle, whose neck was actually aligned to be its arm, but was without a shoulder pad, and the half 'funnel' was closer in semblance to a large triangular platform, although slightly raised, whereas the lower half of it still maintained its pseudo-downward curvature as to be spherical in part, or downward protruding as well. The circle being close to a saw, but the weird bubbly thing was hardly a thing of chewing gum, instead, mostly so used for preserving those who were still whole.

'I can't believe my eyes, oft what I thought even remotely possible, of little there was a doubt to begin with, to start, am I not to think of anything else since you've come to steal but a simplest moths of thought that came to me.'

'Speak plainly, Hindsyah.'

‘You were called upon to attend on a meeting not farther more or lesser than one shall know or hear off. Today, they’re to decide the fate of our dear friend, the one stabbed in the back by one of the land-wretched that crawled inside our city.’

‘A fine but tender turn of events I’d settle looking after if I’d known him, but I’ve no clue who he is, or what’s he made out of.’

‘Well enough, that’s where you’re wrong, by part, oft what I’ve seen I can think most little of, since that day, I’ve seen him thus but walking on a darken alley, followed by two twins, or darkly matter- fiends whom lusted for conquest with as little consequence as one would think they’d have to suffer of. If that may be; I must tell you, where this humanoid had been.’

‘Where?’

‘Inside a dark place, a strange city that’s even now melting away, not that I would know of it, or ask, if thus, if I could even believe the, even stranger most peculiar convolutions that mere thought make come apart, by simple axioms, by.’

Don’t you find it strange, how everything’s falling apart again?

It seems too early, to wake up again, I can almost feel as if I slipped back. I can’t win out there, I can’t live out there. I don’t want to be around them, I hate being around people; too bothersome a thing.’

They were supposed to show up at the meeting place one hour ago. But not a single soul alerted them of their missed appointment. Everyone knew where they had to be, yet a cricket’s laughter, dance induced could’ve been heard by them, regardless of what would prove to be a truce, if live by got in the way. It would not forgive this insult by any means, since it knew better than to trust them. As filthy robust as they knew of what was brought onto them. Maliciousness drowned by a sea-filled rose-pack, whose grenades-artillery bearing pads, although of joyous condescension bickering with one another of lust’s remorse, days old passed between them, the cost of being left alone, carried a message as from branch to branch, lily to lily, pad to pad, until the sound was become the letter, in reverse, apparently carried by the echoes of a kid’s, the post-office mailman’s son, who rose early, as the birds of ever blooming fire, out what might’ve been seen as a stroke- received, blasphemy, the doctors thought, he’s too young for it, get him up on he’s feet, rub the area and he’ll be fine, sent afterwards back to work, because lazy boys get hit in the head with a hammer, stopped, only to deliver, finally, by accident since the ‘letter’ bore no return address nor any man’s name, to them, this was but the fallen over by chance, grace they’ve been blessed with and by, for their hearts were then apparently stricken as if by pumps, CPR being administered, by only by a father figure who told them, it was time to go, go now child, stop waiting, you’ve got a place to be at, right about this moment, if you were to run, perhaps stumble a bit, taking a few breaks along the way, thinking, whistling to some passing women along the world, plump and fairly bitten as if by Spanish-fly, but you’d think you wouldn’t have enough time to do it, if you were to pinch one of their cheeks, then stinger her where to cry, then leave through sighted flight and finally arrive on time, to a place where you’re waited for. A frightening thing as well he was. A giant liquid-crystal glass see-through filled with fluid and some ammoniac-poisoned venomous acidic, but bubbly, piss-colored but clearer, to a yolk-mid-way to whitish in color, partially filled like a cup, light-house, with a hand mirror-shaped top that of course had no mirror but the oblong ellipse, as if that would be the spot out of which the light would come out of, with giant metallic rigs adorning it, all around, which, a greater 'figure' appeared to be propelled around as if it had been a ferries wheel, with this being a pylon in the middle. This glowing crystal structure held, inside its liquid, a concave peculiar mask-like shaped sluggish in appearance humanoid almost but without a nose, cheeks or other things, face, with a tiny ellipse that was blocked, completely as if it had its mouth stuffed with a lemon, 'mouth'-region, that almost looked, the face that is, like a chip, with two shoe-laces connected to two round eyes that looked mechanical, and floated bouncingly around, in the liquid. Whose lower base, of the light-house, appeared to be sealed off and clearly served as a second base, like a lamp's, that had a front pocket, tool-box shape beating-pumping organ that fix exactly as if it were a key pushed through some invisible lock, that belonged, in a gap, to the second structure that was something close to a plushy-puffy-bloatedly-inflated or made of balloons 'bear' whose right side had been cut but not entirely, having only cut-clean off its 'arm' and leg' and part of its body, but, if it had a pair of pecks or a chest, only a fraction of the right peck would be cut off, although not entirely. It bore a strange, flattened almost but still raised, bump-button shaped, squared off as well and deformed, partially, half-pushed out bottom side to entry socket inside of light-bulb's end insertion, with the corkscrew appearance, that was organic, as the rest of the body as well, whose mouth was made of upward pointing stalagmite-flesh-teeth, and whom, bore, in the middle, a single humanoid eye. It was headless, but, instead of a head, it held something that, only a few meters sticking out, a fleshy substance such as wax that had been melted over but also bore a strange, out of it flung scythe-like protrusion, kind of like a low-hanging flaccid leave, that never touched the 'mirror' protrusion around and over which it rotated, on top of. It almost gave the impression that the 'bear's head had been blown off and that thing had been a quick upward shot, then receding jet of blood that immediately froze and became clot-like. Lastly, its left arm was a giant-half last segment of a scorpion's stinger as its end. But there was something else, in its back, as if a key had been fit inside of it, there lay a single elongated bloated almost grub-like tail, bloated, with L's shaped hairs that were eerily attached and oozed as well, out of him. And this tail came out its mid-rift, backward projected mid-point where, it bore a pseudo insectoid abdomen that served as the connecting bridge between the back and the wriggling bulby-worm that wriggled out its back. The beast was hairless but covered in strange towel-moist-twisted patches of skin that had peels coming off them. That also had tiny elongated hose-segments entering and lowering them, from one point to another, like chains pulling them back together when needed. A dark raised crag could be seen from the distance, connected to, a piece on top the sea-floor level that was untouched-parted from the rest of the water that hadn't even intruded in its area by a single drop of water. A large platform stretching hundreds of miles, that was not only devoid of life, but of anything, anything at all. A perfect straight square, untouched by any. No one is quick to forget what's happening around the Camp-US, or for what's been going on a stretch from its side, eradicated as they've become, legless, for every man had given it, gathered in a basket, then allowed flight into the distance during the day of harvest, when it flew, bodied by a buffalo's rode-upon but made of stone, whose head was elongated, shone, and thrust onward, downwardpointing, showering them, this hose, this bottom-feeder, whose 'beak' was froze in place, although humane in looks, pointing down. A man came in-between it, after setting himself in flight. Another one followed as soon as he could, missing half of his face, a-light of fire melting but a piece for the last one to come after. Hundreds of them as well, as set a-flight, there; many brothers made and come out of the same boiler and made to shout at the sourness given by apathy brought once their faces were revealed onto it, chest open, had it sought to kill them, were they dead? Not a single man, as well. Since the parasite came out of it, big-bulk queen ant- curved like a semi-cut partially speaking, C, that had, it was the abdomen but was connected to a beaked elongation of many growths put together and grown out of it that had, at their end, the growth coming out of the puckery elongation of the lance-stretch, a lumped cylinder-boned, pair of lumps that bore a single peculiarly shaped mouth, falling over itself.

‘We’ve come to ask for whom the man whose traveled plenty and found the cunt’s been.’

‘I understand that, friend, but what is your name, tell me, please, I need to, yes, I think so, yes, I need to know, having made up my mind already, so as to go through several processes in which I went through it again and again, I reconsidered it beyond the possible understanding of a normal man to the point where, my mind, it’s set on it, irreconcilable, you, yes, you’re to be my trust-worthy man, that I will put my entire trust into, I trust you entirely with my life on the line, I, I, a, ah, I think there’s also been a misunderstanding, don’t try to deny it, denting my, our shared, don’t snap your fingers at me, or I am going to slap you across the face, since I’m talking, and don’t try talking over me unless you want to anger me further, otherwise, I, uh, this isn’t what I expected since I haven’t, I think so, we, we weren’t going to, I mean we were going to get together and start something across the way, and we were going find a safe-place is his nerve-killing, contagious place I keep finding myself dragged into, since, we’re both, that can’t be denied, can it? – Fry a few chips while you’re at it, because we’re here, stuck together, post-mortem notes will be written as our last wills –left behind in this cavernoids Den, of Mort, I think we’re in the eight passage, but If I could have, even for a moment, a sheep’s clothing to a shilling past the wolves woodsman bow, I wager, I could give you, don’t try to deny it, since I can see it in your eyes, this epiphany, that I am going to write, I need to mention who I’m with, for my wife and children, they live in Farrsh-Kri, near one of the abandoned grovels I left them in to die, since I’m going to join them soon enough, it’s only considerate that I send them some notes, an obliquity to my soul’s repose as I will lay aghast being assaulted by them upon the hour they shall appear before me as a delusional mirage, then and only then, before setting myself on fire, I will know that you sent me that note, to my family, that I will have laughed at continuously and erratically, knowing I’ve defeated them, b-b-b-b-bbb-bb-ut furst, phurst, shh, shh, I need to know your name, my friend, you are my friend, my dear friend, companion of road, toad- day, TORTOISE, Moidmessele, Maid Measles, I swear I’ve seen you some before, wont to top that, I will see you no more, hellish thing that has stolen something from my life, my contagious affair, my disastrous out-shone barbarity, my fear of reality, as to not have faced them still, you are detestable! I hate you, I loathe, you, yet I must know your name again, for I fear, I am frightened that If I forget your name again, my mind shall be stricken again and I will remember things that shall only sink me deeper than I am, therefore abandoning me to rot, in the bowels of an Earth that will have me had, I need to know it. Please, give me your name, a card, a something, a false one, an unrecognizable one, therein being presented as if on a targe, thereafter being taken to a place where they won’t know, won’t recognize, do something with me, please, snap your fingers again at me, why, why, why-why, why can’t I emulate you again, human, why can’t I make you talk, again, why have you no name any longer? Why are you so suddenly, without a voice? What has happened to you, please respond! I need to understand, make me understand why I can’t hear you again. Why you’ve become so devoid of a soul, of anything that I so much cherished, that made it feel as if I knew you, even though you’re not real. Why can’t you speak with that same pleasant voice, that sonorous thing, that sonnet of skies, plump-pigeons and tries to clench open, curl your jaw a little so I may look inside, but there’s nothing more insidious than what I see there. A nothingness I never thought I would find myself staring at, but of the silence beware. It never responds, it never gets back at you, it doesn’t exist at all. I miss you, I miss you most, I cannot make it unless you talk to me anymore. I feel lonely yet again, why won’t you give me a name?’

Two jointed knives

No further than where they stood, a simple loathsome piece keep ringing in.

Fat, they had been fattened by force, to a point of overweighed piece that had dragged itself over. Whose mouthed cowl only drew to light, a simple simian creature with little more than a jaw came into light:

‘I’ve taken them, riot’s alloy, dark conjoined. Let it be known that I claim this knife and there shall be no other who shall intrude upon my claim, not by force, not by straddle, not to be thrown out of it, uncanny rabble of lesser thoughts. I claim this weapon of destruction at the cost, of none other and none the less, my life’s essence that I may give in return if that’s but lay of what there’s left of my duress!’

An echo stood aside, a wagon came in, sprouted out of some wall. It carried in the bootleg’s abode. All of his stash, finely placed for him to appease himself with during the short time he had to do with it as he might.

‘I will have a gulp first and I shall see it.’

Gone, yet he stopped, the knife being pointed at his throat, bladed-beaded up fencing with some tinier slits already present in his skin, deeply submerged, entered past his coated, deadened coal-engulfed in a slither, for some eerie thing that crept. Beneath his skin there lay an oval that crawled. Hofga being caught between the iron plates, that made the room; they were falling apart, the ship-region he was in, beneath the sails whose larger domed beams then shot through two side of the front-whale, whose bones came crushing in as well. A graveyard of empty barnacles picked clean, whose waves but shot through, barnacles of empty grins and barnacles of jewels-green, of blue-ultramarine, of the most lofty of things his shiny eyes could bounce upon, of the most uncannily deformed things, the mutated crewmen whose legs were sharpened, fat-bellied and regressed, in more infantile things, all bearing, upon their chests, large devices, steel-encased with punching motions, fighting as they were swept or buried beneath all that dead weight that would crush their ribs –flabbergasted at the thought, their whiplashed spines, whose twisted curls of bones would shoot out of their fencings tied up-session’s site, of action, reactionless in warmed-up fancy, expressionlessly blank and fair-washed off shore, blank-black-out staring as the devices of their vision faded, black-outs given on empty-flea-ridden beds with Spanish Flies filled drinks drooling morosely as their shine would start heading back in kicking, yet he was mesmerized by something else. He took a moment to allow the entirety of the inner-framework of the entire structure, before its collapse could fully come to view, not by its own or his, choice but by a giant peculiar fox-ish bud come out of the colossal empty-dark sea everything appeared to be kept in chains, volatile levitating against and above everything, whereas it, this Mutated-animalistic lump of many contortions had sprouted a great conical telephone-receiver bore out of the body of a chrysalis worm that began protruding out of its mouth, that shot tens of pudgy drooling puffy-filled blimped cords whose regurgitations of what was left of the sea was stored in the second cylindrically rounded box, this tinier one being set inside of it, though only one of the hoses that was devoid of water but filled with barnacles, oysters, shells as well as other quasi-organic but hardened objects were stored in, to have been known else of the desolation of the supreme drought that occurred once the realization followed, the dread that fancied once’s existence in a world without sea, or at least one that would slowly have it completely disintegrated in this black spot, placed, eerily somewhere in the Mediterranean, would make him shudder at the failure of reconsideration as to have intentionally put one self in harm's way when he had the chance in order to avoid living in such a world devoid of life, when, the suddenness of the stop, whose jerkiness in terms of how this wall shook as well, in terms of being frozen solidly in place, as if shattered murals but filled with rocks, lend onto him the impression of an inescapable claustrophobia he could yet be unabashed as to have a say in whether or not escape was still probable from this chaotic trap he was set in. Its inescapableness being cajoling.

A heart of scorn and of putrid sores, of a stumbling repel to profundity as to draw each thought and form it still in shades that, upon being seen were immediately gone had crept in sight.

A flickering pair of lamps

'Try flipping it off already, can't you see you're disturbing my sleep?'

'I'm trying my best, but they won't go off. It's as if they're actioned by something or someone beyond my control.'

Against the tide, the other room kept pushing against the currents. From one side there came a single dark sweep, as if variously put together clouds, various clock-tower being moved on rails as well as other formations that contained plenty of men and tottering dark creatures that could not infringe upon each other's position since they were willed to walk in that peculiar manner by nothing else than the strange shielded doors they were propelled against, wilt to be corpses-en dried, as the humanoid-figures inside recoiled deeper inside, no longer capable of fully controlling themselves since the man in charge, the other one, the one that was the tallest, whose torso was elongated and filled with a bottle filled worth of wriggling anchoring blister-pouched pincer stingers, tails as such that were all attached to every single side of theirs, their towers, their machines, every single prison that belonged to this self-proclaimed warden, who, in silence contemplated his next move, in a most jovial manner, as if there was something else to prove, confusedly-pronounced, confusedly-set-in-stance, a soldier of fortune's lost at unawares, in a sea he didn't belong to, where the furniture was not made by men, instead, it seemed all too quiet, for some reason beyond his control, withheld, by the smoke that replaced everything if not every particle of sullen gust, which instead turned them against himself and against his person, he quenched his thirst all of the sudden, attempting to consolidate the break-in portion of the matter of coil-through the others had managed to push, trough, or in as such were they, had carried, he, every single one beyond, as to've made a few more holes then a few flint-left-overs, carrying them to the other side where they willowed, bellowed and finally, their cages broke, finally were they allowed to continue by the corner of a room, next to a widow by the name of Calliope. Whose beauty was most profound, as to take away and dread any single man that would say otherwise or would try getting it in without her being aware of their intentions and deep-within they would sink their teeth and do it again, only to have a chance at her. Since they all piled, the once-trapped 'corpses' of the men whom had been trapped, piling each other on top of one another, not to mention that they did this intentionally, as to forget that they were once alive, and deeply inside, they felt their pulses end, as they cowered at a single whistle she maintained. Its frequencies were something beyond, far too beyond that of which the likes of men could deal with, of sonar range, like dolphins or bat's dark embrace, they were forced to cower-worship of deep allure, and much endure for the time being as they were, shamefully, mastered by a woman.

'What a disgrace!'

The lamp, the lamp, an echo rang through.

A sample of it appeared to bear a single mass commonly enough found in some vociferous areas. A herd of men grouped up from one point to the other, alongside the hall, walking in tandem with the reciprocated pan-handling of every single one of the least absolved of every sin bead the main-man appeared to be wearing. A tall fellow who wore one of the lamps' architect's-pencil by an ear-shaft that was about the same length, from the looks of which there being no telling as to how he managed to balance all that weight that no man's shoulder would've been able to carry the long-mile they went through. A nasty suit of glued pamphlets with red shoes that were covered in some sticky wool with threads of blue that diverged into screw formations that jumped all around, here and there, which entered the small mold in the back that had grown out of him, the size of an unnatural, yet an almost complacent ardor was discerned out of his expressionate facial contortion that was clearly played-with a little while he walked or the way he gutted every fish he camped on top of or rang about, then around of, until there was little to be said about the infection that had accumulated then spread across the entirety of his brain's surface; almost, completely.

Fallen apart, his brain was turned into a mush, as the lamp fell off, its glass shattered soon after. Many of them immediately gathered around him in order to hold a short vigil as he squirmed on the ground like some unnatural creature, incapable of understanding what intruded on its thoughts and why.

'For this reason, I've come up to a single conclusion that I choose to stick with, for the time being at the very least; since I'm a paramedic or disease.'

Said the man, while fashioning his face ever so closer to the bodily-odorous smelling cadaver; that nasty thing that could not be brought onto question any longer, nor was there any doubt now; that he would not take what was rightfully his, nor would he doubt the existence of another contender, if all was right. If the shines' bright, then don't match the shoes.

'Yes, I think he's been poisoned, a lot of it I would come to think. But you needn't worry about it, for I know the right cure, I simply know how to fix this man.'

'How? Tell us, tell us immediately!'

All-fallen, right into Sandrite's palms:

'Sand, I think I planted too much of it inside of him, what do you think, man?'

I need a second opinion!'

The second incision had already been made, all around the side of the 'almond', where the real body of Hen-tempo was being kept in. A dishelved, prunish-version of what he used to look like, almost life-like, but tenebrously eaten, as if by some incestuous yet expectable, highly expectable hunger he couldn't have gotten away from during his life.

A room: Filled with a few beacons of light, all shaped like police cones, flashing throughout the night.

'I've come to miss my chance to yet obey what's been taken from me. A-glare, I see.'

To and fro they moved alongside, seething as they drenched their cowls' true in serpentine.

'I'd show some respect if I were you, but knowing how you act when you're alone, unattended by your servants as well as the people who form your company, I think I'd rather show myself our rather than entertain another second within your lousily unbearable presence that I am forced to deal with as men of my calling are usually forced down the line when no longer able to meet the demands as well as the standards that were clearly established long before I showed up with my servitude perfected, as I bowed to little to no others that might've told me, otherwise, for finer circumstances, to avoid the people's perniciously inclined-altering yet worthy of no reprimand's house, of common interests, at large established as they would've had me stumble upon the tips of my toes until no longer would I feel accountable for what's been shone upon the blight's come upon the instability of the ground, and empty crooks as well as the disabled hooks of such uncertainty, calling, that any other man left aghast in my place then yet, sojourn, avast, would've found himself leaving soon after. If he were in my place; to the dormitory with you from this point on, as I await what little's left of my embrace.'

Plenty of reasons were laying around as to why it was a bad idea to do that. To open the door; a pile driver, a motorcycle pit and a den-tube appeared to be rounded up together in a circle-of-iron spinning around with most of them being willy-nilly flung around then about, then allowed a moment more of some respite as to not reach the same conclusion as the others; the process that took place, even remotely observed made it so the least relevant of growths would come to him unless it was explicitly said and worded properly:

'You'll be killed as soon as you step in on the other side of this flooring right here.'

Clearly high-lighted by him, as if by stage, as if by thorough-fare.

The fellow that drew forward was nothing other than some giant conical-backward pointing with the tip being a pseudo-right hooked, flaccidly resting on the ground 'scorpion-tail' filled with lumps of fat – hornet, with a fat-pseudo elephant single leg in the front, almost as fat and as deformed as a seal, with a giant humanoid-like growth sprouting from beneath the 'tail', together when seen by the side would almost give the impression of a beak, as well as a strange near humanoid up to mid-way through the jaw and only a few meters above it with a smaller 'lid' formation, rounded, as a dome or a solidified tongue after the lower side of a man's gulley had been blown off by pair of high caliber slug. He was out of breath and spoke in tongues. It was still noon and there was little to no reason to await or disturb the concentration before they rung about a single tumbling chair that's been thrown around, then gone.

'There's another man waiting behind that door!'

'Which one, I think there's someone else come before that.'

Elevated crooks, falling apart as they spoke, never one time shot-n'-wonder who's the first come onto the line:

A power- cord, power-like, standing in the middle of the open-cardboard-like roofless room; the sky a storm of blue, smoke-ultramarine. And a few puffy clouds of some resin entered within the whim of an open-mouthed, nigh fallen apart; a single spot of color that signaled a trail of arm-prints left behind.

'Someone squeezed them to death, I wager!'

'Were they ever alive? I seem to reek oft fathom less; whenever such there is, I'm highly yet basin-impressed onto the wager! Still-canary, come, the door is now open, and we're awaited in the Obituary, for, for little might there be of them, I seek but venture either way.'

'Who is?'

'The totem tall, the creatures whom might not be spared a wicked stall, henceforth you might have to join me on an immediate pass, Jane. Otherwise, I won't see the light that's been taken away from me, either by joint or they, they could do something to us if you, if you did it!'

Jane knew little to no foul!

She had lain, somewhat, dormant for a long enough period of time to realize that her entire certitude of what was real and what had become but a simple jest of many colors of congruent felicities expressed at her magnanimous similitude of a hope-for-something, mortis, like the lamp lodged into the right, ten centimeters between the arm-entry into the lower area beneath the, shoulder, four or so beneath the upper- clearly no longer attached to the arm-bone region that cast a shade on top the lamp like an entry inside some cove, or some cardboard box held up on an incline by a string-wrapped stick, turned into a trap, with the bait being the lamp, leaving as much as a simple hollow spot inside this thing, with little to no severity as for the yolk that's come in that came and drenched with swagger-moved up and down, like some raft, like some rip-raff, pumping in-and-out piston, giving her a hard time, since her two legs were united into one, below, where her feet would've been now lay a simple flat tile on top of which and with the help of whom she moved.

Lamp-fifteen

'The law states clearly that there's not a single soul to be seen dwelling beneath the curving light under the siege's largely abhorrent mass until the first of the heralds of the past returns!'

A giant blob off the ground-ish figure with eight appendages randomly thrown, bearing a wide-spread on it humanoid-rodent made out of molars and flat teeth-like plates that formed images of statues in approached. It crawled and when stopped, it formed three great perfectly chiseled faces at that. All too moist the rubbing; near-seat; one of the sermon-attendants was merely rubbing his feet off the carpet.

Two conversations near the Riverbanks

There was some reason to feel some animosity towards them; but the lamp withdrew back in its place.

‘You’re a crack-shot, aren’t you?’

‘I suppose I am, I suppose I am, but what’s it to you? Last time I checked, you’re nowhere the fanfare; in case you’re to be grazed, I could think of nothing more that could serve to rip of some of the swell off the side of your face!’

‘Ere, long, men don’t last, especially since their guts are inundated with parasites; too many of them listen for far too long, sickening their hosts; a sight that should accompany no soul, especially if pained by the weather; whereas the weather wreathed schools of fish in halves, animal species destitute for complacency, extinction driven at last, without a scent to mourn. And mournful was the hour before you came onto my bank.’

‘You’re the landlord of this road?’

‘There’s one trespasser and he doesn’t know what’s good for him, and wouldn’t get it unless it hit him dead in the eyes, with a spittle as long as my forearm accompanying it. Now, you wouldn’t want that, would you? I could take my time and tackle it in whichever way there is.’

‘You’d feint, old man.’

And he was a cheery fellow along the way, of a bunch of cotton trousers that were tall like Spanish Conquistadors, helmeted by a rounded sphere with three livid skulls implanted, with their ancient sockets cracked in, but holding pipes out of them that bore tenebrous tubes that entered him around a circled band. He was armless and belonged to an armless lot; only one leg that was segmented into eighteen’s, going all the way back, on which he crawled. And beneath his chest, many such crooks as rats and critters, pigeons, salamanders, squirrels and a vulture or two on top the one blind crow; that hid inside a safe-like depression-locker he had turned the lower side of his body in. Stored nowhere near his true-organs since they were but a simile of his true-being, a supper for no canister if he were to be drained:

‘The vehicle you came in!’

‘My car.’ Interrupted the youthful fellow, a bit too sharp for a pulp that’s been ripped away from him beneath the second day’s turned-ahead and neared-like; for the blasphemy of colored, killed by his kind, left a bloody trail utmost niggardish in appearance.

‘I think there’s a scent coming from its way.’

‘You should watch it old man, unless you want something to happen to you as well!’

A direct threat, at which a few witnesses were present to bring the account to one of the nearest courts in the country, ensuring not even the slightest detail would be ever-so cleverly swept beneath the bush, as to facilitate such an entrapment that their likens were to fade immediately after being received with the proper forms and what not. A Magister, two of them even were present during the first derailment of nods; no contribution of any sordid value to be jotted down.

Bathed in rum

Set to burn before a sun that didn't speak just yet to the subjects despite having been heard only at the first end's brought upon, sightless hum.'

'There certainly are a lot of bums on these streets, aren't there?'

'And it's your utmost holy duty to pick something as outlandish as possible and split open their god damn faces in as many halves as you possibly can, otherwise they might get a chance to rise up and kill us instead! It's a pitifully dark world to live in and I'm very much afraid that there's no other chance to cleanse it of all the evil that's been spread by the falser Martyrs that have made their way onto our wretchedly beaten to a pulp neighborhood. It's a saddening thing but I think there's a slim chance we might get to live through it as long as you promise to eat a piece of my face and use whatever might befall onto your hand to commit as much crime as possible, like a nigger would!'

'And there's a reason for that, no? '

'I'd think there was, unless someone administered something I could not expect the likens of to cure!'

'A fox would do, if I weren't to intrude upon it, were I be so rude as to decline!''

A dark stench emerged from beneath its pouches once an ounce of its vaporous gas got released from the many mammalian-like layers of overlapping skin, with the help of an utmost tremendous effort , needlessly said, let alone observe, had it managed to raise a few of its beacons from its barely holding body, while resting on its one thin frozen stream of a clotted blood-like leg, which held its elongated skullish baboon, holding a tree-like oak of many bulbic balloons it pumped in and out through the straw like leg that came out of its mouth, attached to the soil like some spoiled parasite, poisoning every wretch and everything that came into its hold; until the cackle subsided and therefore anchored by the likes of a seethe of skin and lumps of him, become humanoids that fell; wretchedly adorned every step and every barrow-den of stone and bile; dead-upon the fall, forming a forest of suicide as many more still-births released their clasps, their arms and their hold upon what could only be called something that allowed them to carry on and push on living. One of the lumps was but squarish-rounded mid-riff, like some toaster whose head was the top of a human head whose hair was grabbed by someone's hands in an attempt to make a tail, but then turned organic, coils entering as if they lay, turned into a funnel of skin and entered through the many bold remains as they joined the similar of ilk, distraught; the face bore an almost curved likens, connecting its mouth to this 'leg' as if it were but a public drinking fountain's jet; slurping on it with puckery fat lips, like that of an ugly sub-human nigger's beaked chewing upon prey's swollen masticated rubbery-mass; a human-toe incisor sticking out from its right side; a canoe-face; hung vertically whereas the eyes adorned the top-most opposite to its mouth end; the body beginning from the back of its occipital bun, behind the visors, as if gushing out a second fountain; hanging disproportionately on its left side; weighty even; almost a shell when aligned and no longer pumping but made of many individual organs that kept growing and receding in size.

A simply bathtub didn't suffice for all the conciliatory needs one had to bear the slither in the skin of, as to be fully crowned with little less than needed such was frowned upon by them, and likened, to the shallow, elongated rook that entered the bathing side; thermal attachments, allowing them to drown momentarily as they slackened, over' more.

'A drink that's spiked, and lesser minds, though you shall dare endear. I see, I see.'

'There's a wager to be held between the two of us, isn't there?'

'I'm listening, I'm listening.'

'I have a twice-a-headed cup'

But before he could drown himself with a single gulp, they had to answer the single door, the one that was being knocked against, bastardly a whore!'

As all would have them be, with glibber-see-through therefore be, of no regard, was there a second thrice, an emptiness of morning through which a few passengers allowed the walk in the dark. It was pitch black, the sombre dark reveal, upon the door opening and upon the upheaval, not to bother anyone, not to miss perchance something that could bring a nod, an empty gut, or so much closer, therefore brought. Was there a single nibble upon the bites, taken for light granted by empty lights whose sibs and empty nibs, crawling and wriggling, worms of pudgy mass, fat and bloated, entered through the ground, inviting themselves in and before long, they were formed as solid and tall as man, but ill-equipped with hundreds of limbs instead, appendages that were solely kept together by squirm. But the worms didn't talk at all, instead, they dashed half-way through the door, took a glance upon the table, from one end to another, although peculiarity alike had it told that it was something very much senseless since, they had no eyes to begin with, and upon grabbing a hold of the spirits, they simply gobbled it down the gulley, with the bottle and all. Leaving nothing behind as to get something of what was lost. Instead, of what could only be thought as some partition that was given a hold of in terms of notes they had written down, although the language they were preponderant to speak was of a gibberish that could barely be understood at all, the part of the man put in charge to decipher this strange code that, without a doubt was given birth no fewer than a few moments prior to their most peculiar meeting; where the worms, unlikely to realize that by normal means there would be, perchance a way for them to be properly understood, have settled on playing a fanciful jest upon the men, who, having elected Jonathan Hyrksum as the head of the Decipherment Department, were left with a bafflement of such undoubtedly magnanimously high proportions that they had overindulged themselves in reaffirming yet at the same time tinkering with their initial appraisal, as to discern the quality of the paper itself, that, having been handed onto them after a set of rushed sprawls, was already held under some considerate scrutiny in an at a first glance given educated opinion kind of attempt to brute-force its meaning out of the strange sheet that had been given onto their care. Yet, seeing how there was definitely no credible way of properly establishing whether or not there was any kind of coherence as well as some logical meaning to the note itself, the head of the Decipherment Department settled with nothing short of calling it a day as he entertained a most poignant rubble that ended up with his clear suggestion of them offering their guests only more drinks; as was the case in those days. During the supper; of a clock whose tongue struck close to midnight.

'Worming forks of silver gone!'

‘And ink of blotter, never-come upon the sight? Howdy come for them to meet, such greyed out sack of podgy milk? Of ink octopi brought before the numb and whose thumb was it belonged to, which wrote the note they’ve brought onto our deep retorted head of fortitude crabbed?’

‘I think they, I think they’ve got a hand, sir, look!’

‘By my sight, but what eerie drawn a sight we’re being met by, that is, but it could not be, is it?’

‘It is sir, the hand of a man, taken by one of them, held dearly by their chest, I say, they’ve stolen a few bodies down the fall, who stumped upon the pitch-black drunkenly and stepped upon the Notre Dame! I say, they ought to be punished by such imprudence. I mean, by those who’d tardy stumble, get a number, put them in the line right after, where to serve, good sir; for what they’ve done, they must be held accountable for!’

‘But wait a minute, dear company awaited, in forbearance misgiven, lest one could expect such trifles still. I sink but a cinder past the poker’s bill and you may note me down for saying. I think that we’ve judged these gentlemen far too quickly for such arrogant commodities of pointing fingers at those who cannot challenge our prosecution held, or else, I’d say, there’s something to it that might save them from spending time in the stooper’ jail!’

‘And you. You’re to be appointed then!’

‘Chief of Defence, I say, my clients, as you may notice, even now, especially now, are falling apart. And how could one hold them accountable for anything, but a kill, something that sends shivers down the spines of ill, when they, these fine gentlemen had not even had the time of the day or a say, in their defence, or something past the quail that might’ve helped their case soon after, saying. Of the lot which brought, of the pitched brought back, and the darkness of the blot, from which they’ve been dragged out of, by curse of blood, just as to be fed by us. There’s little reason to affirm, no less. From what little I’ve come to observe.’

‘Carry on then!’

‘That, they are highly, most solemnly, inoffensive to touch, and we’ve got nothing to fear out of them, since they’re but of kind that allows no fear to be drawn, as you may see from this extreme example, their fear far outnumbers ours, per chance, per chapter, if ever be another note brought to us and for the Head of the Decipherment Department to have another go at it, if that’s the quail of gone-after. Then, it shall be resolved!’

‘Properly!’

‘Indubitably!’

Less likely, soles repellent, something comes out of the dark. A giant head-peeped in, almost human-lamb with the snot of a pig and a single hearing trumpet sticking out of its right side of the jaw, the mid-riff between some artery, the ear and the eye, beneath the check bone, the tri-fecto; but the snot wasn’t empty, bore two pill-shaped connected teeth-welded together almost; holding in the back, a few extending appendages that were sharp enough to be metal beams. It spoke in smoke and shot hardened soil out of its eyes, which were four ellipses, two on each side, vertically aligned, unlike that of men; puffier was the substance inside of them that started crawling out, puffy smiles and dark green fleshy plants were spat out eventually, inside of which some crone drew herself among the many tattering insects that had gobbled pieces of her crowned. For she wore a crown of bones and feathers of coiled dead-crows that made her garb; a beggar or a hobo, most likely they all thought her. But her servant didn't allow them a chance in the flit for either one to say something that might offend, or get them on their feet, would it attempt, then spark a shatter, cracking of the skull!

'Take a seat, why won't you, ma'am?' Came quite quickly, without a sound!

A little house-hold near them:

'Lake's dry innit?'

'We've been at this for the past few hours you insignificant stone-sharper, I told you already, that's not how it's supposed to work.'

'I've taken a drink from it no sooner than yesterday at four ticks upon the sundial. The disc started oozing with complacency as it gave me a nasty bite.'

The pouch standing in front of him, upon the hour of bleed dry, appeared slightly morose and open-mouthed. Its many incisors crawling around the tips of his dwindling fingers; and because of it, that could not be mistaken. As this vile creature ate a shard off the tip of a diamond diver's long dropped needle rack. Most impressively as it were:

'I wouldn't have believed it unless I would've seen it with my two irradiated eyes.'

Arparn struck the his dull calloused finger up its mouth; preventing is from chewing the clothed facet bore by the square-rounded at each angle, pentagon-shaped table with spikes at every end coming out of it, and four great hair-covered faces that bore curved teeth-spears coming out their mouths.

A small rock-puddle lizard by the road came at once; side-long glanced, put through a small tube that wasn't crushed by the sped-off couch that passed, it carried with it, as such but a bottled message it had hid inside it. There wasn't any good way of understanding what came onto it, especially since it began floating towards the assassins during their time of concentration. A few knives flew around but neither of them hit any target, let alone would've made any ruckus as to disturb their tiny fleet-creation, as they settled in the room.

'We've got company it seems, do you think you could leave your game of ships and anchors for a moment as to see what it is?'

'You do it if you want to, but I'll stay, I need to know what's happening in here, until they drag along and find us off slacking here.'

'Unlikely so, we've left too many false-tracks to be found, I doubt either one of them will find us here, especially since we've already peaked one road along-side the boat-ruffle.'

‘Not sooner after, you will have told me it was just my fault that we got found.’

‘I wouldn’t dare to mess with your mind like that, friend, not after what we’ve been together through; in any case, my life would simply be a given and exchanged before we’d even do the thing.’

And as little as of theirs as had remained, they could, just as sublimely see. The lizard that arrived, who came by their side and entered through the painstakingly flat pane, whom, drawn upon, beneath and through as a carpet-parchment dragged and fished, was greeted thus, upon a simply yet concise remark taken back by Flaugh, whom pertained himself unfit to see, that the lizard had bloated itself, a blimp with four mean manly eaten humanoids inside of it, that so remained:

All four of them spoke as if they owned the assassins or had contracted them with blood-money clots, inside, hid, as they would see it fit and taken for fools, instead of lords, whom crawled upon the moving floating floats, that were the castle rods, that had been taken from the mighty bloats, whom had eighteen heads or more, where most of them were, just as such, deformed, cruelly so, upon the falling never-ending stretch of the eighteen monthed days of hope, where the mad-star that was eyes with cruel beaks and was hardened with many peculiar, hard-to-swallow, spiked contortions that were their graves, of the ancient beings that had awakened during lays of dark when one could not refuse to listen after that to the mourning of the ancient days that followed after, during which they sent messages to the darkened people of the fallen-through moons that fell out of their hearts, being very much incapable after that of fully expanding on them-selves, since humanity was under their control and they, like fetuses rose, out of the groundless abode of the butchered body-cozy home that floated in the sky, where billions of hearts were made to appear, belonging to otherworldly creatures that had no eyes but were in search of them in order to understand how the manifestation of cries appeared in peoples minds since they suffered for uncalled for and unworthy eternities that could not be dealt with. For that reason, of woe was little said as a cue, to be faked upon the sight of beggar’s rains that pushed through the munching-marches of bastardity that rose from the infantry of second disease that followed and trampled over everything until not even the slightest most uncannily recognizable hope could be told of.

And these messages were slightly reawakened in one of the men’s hearts since they didn’t, and did not only not know any better but they feared as any man would, even those with solely deformed wicked hearts, who could not help themselves but give themselves, to flay and to heartless remains that could not be forced out on command. For such pain was pure beyond the likings of a watcher, as it were, were it so, and were it just as such, hard to expand upon and to understand the likings of a mournful gaze, given onto you by a stranger whom, during his puerile acridity of many hues and shades that would suffice, if had been seen, would’ve refrained one by forced, to stop and ask him whenever, this trance being done, how and why had this to happen and for what reason after?’

‘I’ve been trying to reach you, dark lizard of four swallowed men.’

‘Soon to be five if you annoy me, you prick-haze!’

Damn this little insignificant mongrel-lizard creature, who ought to have been shamed into misscreation, be taken for the foolish thing there is to be aghast during a time of great deceitfulness that might be taken away from him, as if to cast him during longer days in which the rob of his humanity’s stolen vigorous imitation, this mimicry of what he thinks a man ought to be acting as if, even though this lizard doesn’t know anything, ought to have been shamed into complete laceration, until destruction will have occurred completely, during the mind of it, I would've thought just as such, I, the blade of evil, of supreme alteration and life's greatest-vile creation, will have taken it entirely for what's it been made, for what is it and cast it into evil days where the pockets will have emerged from the depths of the bowels and the ever-after that comes yonder, from whichever be the cast he's been most mockishly come out of, bastardization of saddened brown-dirt air, of such approach, I called onto him:

'Listen you dark creature of evil days who served as blameful preposition; I ask something of you that might be given in order for me to access the retribution of the most incessant, most lurid fruition as for my every dream to come back to life, I need to ask of you as such, give me back what's been stolen from my darkened soul, that trinket which had made me admit of my defeat.

When I was met, by stronger feet as they would've seen them so.'

'I've four knives on me.'

'Won't they cut through your belly?'

Henceforth, seeing how they could do nothing else than was needed, and having come to that conclusion that risking their lives as to approach it was dangerous, they pulled out their arm-long powder-players, harpies-having amassed around their arms, as they pointedly, although thinner still, as starved birds, though human still they tried not making much of a fuss, as for their bleeding, thoroughly made to be touched in order to curb the into them instilled suffering, with pin-bolted rusty nails being closed shut inside their raft-wings of dirty clay moist cardboard, munching with tadpole eels lodged inside their heads, having already crawled inside their veins as mother-leopards attempt to look after their young, in order to make sure that these strange-ladder things they made while placing themselves one on top the other, clearly misaligned, signaling that they were done, pumping blood from one side to the other, although, appearances being most deceitful, as it happened, they were not the leeches, instead, it was the two assassins that were pointing onward most decrepitly with drool hanging down the left side of their faces, having, their clearly-hit-by-age molars elongated into the upper roof of their mouths, where smaller demons were plainly trapped inside, rotting as they were become part of the disgustingly deformed great cysted crystal-dark clock-shaped peculiar chained hold that took them before the fully encompassing growth of the tooth-forest could drown them in place, thoroughly set, on what they were doing as well. They were undistracted as to give the lizard devourer a chance to strike back, most concurrently, no run was involved. No chance for flight, only the melting of the ceiling as they planted it even before it had come.

'You've poisoned the secret walls, haven't you?'

'We'd be looking at you through a hole if you were out, but I suppose neither one of us is perfect, is he?'

'Should we take it outside, in that case?'

'Think yourself fit enough to take the two of us head on out there? What makes you think you'll stand the slimmest chance when you can't even toy with us beneath the melting ceiling-drop of venom?'

To their slightest, even most irresolute thing that was, reason, they had put a basilisk man through one of the strung-pillar horns; and drew breath out of it, as they came along.

A coy little thing approached, it leaped froggedly with the intention to main. There would be no threat other than, trying to understand where it was coming from.

A passer-by the road:

‘You, yes, you little thing, where have you come from and why have you come, when I’ve seen you before the noon, during which you stood and waited, hid inside?’

‘Where have you seen me, little man? Answer me without remorse, for I shall bring only the worst in you, if such’s the play.’

Both of whom were stared, each other’s eyes being, dare one say, staring in four direction, by a cloud, back, by a tree, a duckling mad, and a single knifed ill-man. Who was fumigating with steel-converted gas as well. He was bothersome in awe and steel. An army by his side, and two giants with a baton-teal, feathered griffon-made alight.

He prepared one of his, beneath the pocket- gloves, moist and covered in some popping honey, as the peasant would know himself to be prepared for what was coming in case his hand slipped beneath his pocket.

It was only a matter of a few seconds, during a most sober playful throw of a short napkin that flew past his eyes, to which he stumbled backwardly, in the middle of the day, almost trampled over by the fly-through horse that came along, most-swaying, were there figures in, one came along and yelled:

‘Off with you immediately, or I shall have you fingers taken any day!’

He yelled as quickly as he could but after, stopped, and wooden wheels that had been brought around felt as little:

An elongatedly deformed head with eighteen giant bubbles of meat coming out of it and off its sides, drawing out, then adding to one another’s most terminal-hard-to look at smaller yet thinner cadaver-like plump hose-like pumps they kept into each and every single one’s clearly, outwardly exposed bellies.

As easily as he trashed around, he leaped off the road and began drawing ahead, with him, as if the slope were a ramp, as much speed as he could attain in a short amount of time, without leaving as much as a single breadth of a barrel to be lumped with him, neck-craned and long-footed as he were before, now, upon squeezing and clenching his entire body in a fetal position, by the time he had reached the river, the man, grazed to a degree where both his knees, whose clear alignment with his disturbingly hard to properly admonish un-chiseled but buckled joints merely began pushing around a fifth of his fingers, that, had been, to a fault, wrapped in such a way, the branches and the various other grassy roots, that wrapped themselves around him, while on his way, through the hill, the arc being angled at a sixty four degree, concave-push-in that all of the sudden turned into a slight raise-depression in kind of leap-bump caused by planted in the soil prissy acorns, left there, ever since the last summer had gone, being absorbed by the evil floating being Mythauobhyn, whose strange delight, upon the sight looked like a cut-in half palm with a single ‘arm’ shaped like a thumb, his ‘knuckles’ being his lungs, and head was but depressed in, as if he wore a soldier's helmet but in turn he was a parasite, with a man eye, his right, and a left socket, sutured, and a mouth open like puckered lips, but only shaped that way, with a worm-like finger toe wriggling tube sticking out and dripping on the ground as well, coated in gull-resin and a whitish pigmentation with red and a black slit torn in, whom wilt his children yet chimneishly painted in charcoal, and then entombed in acorn, then fed, the many dead whom were in his service only being a part of this, strange conjunction beneath them, this almost giant cryptish, cryptic, criptous sarcophagus chamber-like space that had been penetrated in, not only so, but to such a similitude of screams, and shouts, that one would only come to abandon his life and what it meant for him, if he stood too long, as to be drowned by the noiseless echoes of the ancient old like haggish figures, all together, glancing, dancingly, rancid in smell, morose and most-content to some degree not even they would've thought it possible, for what was worth, a sea, whose reaches, having lain beneath them only drew from one point to another, the waves that thrust, plenty of I and J shaped stalactites, whose cssk but bothered the men, up there, cssk nearing an end, the slashes ending, receedingly to the top, at a stop, when, all too suddenly, the ancient figures only considered putting an end to their lives, since they stood there in the dark, trembling as they saw fragments finally crack underneath the stress, caused by the acorns planting themselves deeper and much clearer than before, it's been, alike, paranoia being undermined by a sudden apparition of duck-head with knife-murder painted on them. One of them owned a temple. It was temple adorned with the heads and the bodies of millions of men without legs, in search for them, although not told of the strangeness that was kept inside and behind locked doors. Entombed by the darkness that was in the bearing heart, this temple was aligned, in the same way a decrepit ziggurat would, endlessly enamored, then lost after, to such degree of a destined fault that one could forget that there were still kind men trapped in this world, whose touched upon echoes still heap unknowing among their own.

'We're lost, mister, I. Wanted to ask you something, if you may.'

'What's that kid? I thought I told you to scram already. Just leave.'

He took a few steps in and was already stopped before he could do more harm than he's done. Two men stopped him, hanging lousily by his drooping head. He was intercepted right before he could slap the kid across his face.

'Why'd stop me? Think, think, for a moment, this does not concern you at all. It does not have to involve you at all.'

'You're going to have try harder than that, the kid's missing a leg.'

'I've seen the peg, but, man, I'm, the pig, the war-pig, the boar is on its way, it's there!'

Before he could yell the slash had come through already, cutting through the ground, fell-swoop like, with a buoyancy of growths that cut through the pillars, the towers, the shatterless street, until fully made and bastardly extended, the men but faltering unfended, on their knees but wrought, and shoulders streaming by their sides as their faces were torn apart, while the boar sang, in came into the view, but bearing his sinew, drooping merrily over-spread:

A bubbling body made-man like of ribs and four great legs, jointed by each jolt as they spread in four directions, a mounting turret, out of whose mass, not gelatin-like but still putrid and decayed, forlorn and torn apart, it drew, an X' two ellipses cranium whose upper 'horns' were one flaccid-droopingly stingsegmented dark formation, the other, wide-spread but grown, a bubble-chamber balloon with a single eye twisted and filled with scorn, casting a shadow on top a perfectly aligned stalagmite-stalactite twist, horizontally but on an incline aligned, whereas underneath the stinger rested a lower-crane-formation with a single punch-bag weight bearing blood it drew inside of it after feeding away, both sides but standing like pincer in the wait, the front of the face but bearing a thing like two moving incisors, beaks split each way, one moving front, dragging the other back, and forth like pistons, as well. As two shoulders barely aligned, one that was akin to, while attached to the first out of two segments, a hair-drier pointing out, but whose end was attached to a man's spine segment but wax-figuresque, with stalactite but fat-shaped incisors pointing down, towards a green but filled with pea-shooter holes, that threw steam at it, as they were done, with the endearing of its presence, at the end of the final segment that made its arm, there being a single scythe, but on both sides, as it bore two arms after all. A deformed weird-rabbit-like creature, almost, as if it was caved in by punch:

'I've come to ask you something, that I may be given solace in your homes. Invite me in or I will break in, breaking the law.'

'That's illegal, you nasty boar!'

'And you maiden, are nothing but a damned whore. Therefore, thou are to be treated in pain and suffering until you shall remain dead.'

'Twas there, said and in the distance!' There he pointed:

'Who were you tallying to, friend? Are you not of a reason not to ask when there are people whom fate would have come around to take of plain day what's taken from and out of what's lain on top of them?'

'No, of course not, I didn't think as far as that, in all honesty, my good man, I only considered there being a chance for me to get out from underneath the pit, upon a shallow shooed upon cat's fallow feet and taloned claws to broth of undertaken stones and those whom might come after, upon the many weary homes in which it had come through and around, I've seen of plain things and I've asked before, whom might tell me what's gone through my mind, after careless planning failed, and of little as I remain dumbfounded as how was it then, but now, that I am come about, hour-soulless but run-through shroud she's wearing, mine but taken, fallen through, upon the slide, I've come as pure as a new-born child, carried by her, but turned around and thrown in one of the bellow-cans she's hidden away, of little more will I say, but so you know, I've been betrayed by that feline demon who's in turn had me taken to a place, akin, and similar, within reason to the one she's been through, marches' pouch, and would I have known she'd do this to me, I would've had myself wrung first instead of being so-so forced to suffer, imprisonment in the lack-of-key, and puberty of infantile glee that's been arificed inside globe-for-bog replaced murk for courteous iris, taken sight, I've come about to realize, that, they, they, the lords-of-lay, standing between us to such countenance as one would have it, imprisoned me thinking I'd rather had it, then take my life before the day of the guillotine's spine-sprinkle of slat-but slate of stone conveyed but blood wondrously taken away but granted to starving children into clot, upon the broken streets of thine' kingdom's wrought and robbed of much-awaited liberty, kept in silence, orphans that would not betokened to wait for me to stance and lay, as they've taken me soon after, from one point to another, upon burdened wheels of classy steeled-grazed, but coated, and missforgotten ventures to each guard's jest, where they have left me hanging, drearily during nights but longer days thinking that something might happen if only I could see, mine taken from me, before the much-awaited, longed for at this point return, when fancied themselves not, to bring me moist bread but taken away, with rust upon the rush-of what's lain inside the little worming roots, as shallow ground and soiled dark, in wingless and the signaled to me decay, that's to have served as a warning for what's to come near the kingdom if I decided to stay may, into this world, as I was made to suffer for months after, of such dysentery felt absinthe, fed to me like gulps of filthy grit and spindle, as they pointed, somewhere above, where rook was joined by craned upon, most bastardly awakened, upon twisted most-malborious branch, as mockishly purple-painted cheeks belonged, to such squirrels as one would have, but given to my heart, I beckoned to be replaced by them, that I may lay there, even if by pain, put-down, by blade much bathed in myself, but oozing sweat be-brought to a stomped upon verdant nature, as the kingdom that awakened me to reality's dark elation has only stopped when brought such forth, to a man named Ethalyon, whom served such gates, and deep-wrought chains, upon his back, this very day, therefore remain, in place but bid, and better seed, that his parents planted, upon their farms where they may have gotten rid of nasty pest, be it snail of darkened snake of little venom – high regard, where he was born and thinking of it, until a time would come that he would finally be gotten and made sad as to realize and be known as well, upon the high betokened fame that he could fine such lords, instead of beg, and force their hands, until, they will have recognized him, such and such, as well, that in the end he would be one of them. It is that man that I have met upon the gate, when brought near to him, I spoke, to tell, of story lessened, to be shown, much and well beyond kindness that I alone would not have recognized by no means, as they would have it pleased, to be given by higher coil, and reddened rage upon the ones of foil that stood beside him, I reckon.'

It stood before there, mighty tall headed as well. A bucket full of sprouts that shot in wild directions, kept up high by four mighty poles forming a cyst-like crystal, standing high. Each pole being split in half, as if they held a furnace rounded thing, a forger-blacksmith's plain delight. Upon a girthed oblong pear- whose open body, lower-near its belly below, formed four black tunnels that receded in the back, into a trough. From the distance they looked like stranger-hardly did it matter if someone could comprehend, teeth-deranged and curved at each end, this fatter lower-matchbox body, bearing its roots of gelatin, spread awake in the surroundings, made to waste, within its 'feet', which connected, dartingly to a flying veal, liquefied appeal, flying as a slug-contorted like a murky pool, pincer-like contorted, like a leashed horse, it shackled it with its mighty spread of spear-roots, both of them together, put and wrought in part as well, contorted in each other's spell. Though the slug's head bore a much stranger, harder to look at, let alone understand, almost a falchion-like thing coming out of it platform shaped head, but mighty stinger upon which wrought, the painless and tormented, wrought. They were both strangely lobed and drew to the side, nearest to the city's watches', a loss of people being near them, wherever they watched. Their ghostly, rigorous, unfathomably comprehensible as to forget what happened to them, was cripplingly forgotten then.

A few meters away from them, a pea-shooter long-shotter, bearing a fat elephant-girthed front canon coming out of a barred giantly elongated helmet, barred around the rims of its curved head, the area being polished black and filled with torn-apart led, a wriggling neck beneath it holding a mannequin's torso connected to a curved, almost grabbing door's handle, of which wriggling coil then aligned like a finely placed snowboard upon which it drew in the back, chained and filled with human-like spine segments as for the hinges that kept it together, like a finely clothed woman's corset filled with iron-black shoelaces pushing aside. In the back only a dark worming thing could be seen, drawing from one point o another like a planar thing filled with smaller buds beneath it, forming pairs of two that, pointing dowry droopingly to a fault, whereas through them, down-cysted, came an unnaturally – low strung wasp but thinner like barely standing syringes, pointing below. It looked, from below like a deformed pupae, or the bottom side of an ark, filled with the wriggling tips of ‘blood-samples’. It was followed around by it, although that wasn’t something they spoke of out loud. Bodied by a strange pinnacle of littler things that came together for one last time:

‘I’m sorry mister, but I feel as if there’s a need for me to apologize for something, but I have somewhere else to be, an appointment I suppose, that I cannot for the likes of me, miss or delay any longer.’

‘You’re free to go wherever you have to son, don’t let us stop you or anything.’

‘I won’t, don’t worry your pretty little head about it.’

‘I shall do it nonetheless.’

And the kingdom as thus put under distress, since there were power-reactor crone-shaped tower-figures floating everywhere, drenching every one pedestrian of Yore in basked upon energy and more than enough of it started rubbing off.

They were much prone to ask for shone, upon them, merry light, and upon blight they called upon, obtuse delight:

‘May I have an apple from the garden market, that I may draw upon, as one may be.’

Walked forth a hundred miles they did without any repercussion for the pressure that was being forced upon the much-eroded ground, torn apart, where they were waited, by the side of the road by a giant pear-giant faced-head, worn-skin, murdered man’s’s, with a drooping nose the size of a trunk and a beady eye and a fallen apart growth-molder of skins hanging low and a short fifty centimeters off the ground raised off, melted-as if of gelatin if it were, carpet-bubble giant boil hardened puddle as if frozen in part, mix of teeth and other bones taken off the skull, if it were a cranium and mixed, on a pseudo flop-flopping roll that drew around upon which it dragged itself as if it were melted and he was part slug. A humanoid cranium whose lower side beneath the cheekbones and the general area where the jaw connects was missing but out of which, on top would it be standing on top a cushion or the likes, as to draw from side to side, every now and then but not for too long.

It signaled to them, during its approach.

Back and forth as the cog of branches, trenches and spoils, the cabin it dragged with the, half of hill and the two great constricted pieces of woolish things that entered it from both sides.

Of little worth and just as soon jotted apart, both pieces of land entranced, and bidden so, side by side uncannily, more than a few hundred men followr behind its track and pointy starving.

A darkles’ point, with a roof on top moved on, with piece by piece, but pieced was the land together, it dragged on top of wheeled cord, and plenty more things that made it whole, the up-front hanging anchored to the next-bodily giant, whom had been him, shot a glance. But he was legless if one were not to count the one elongated piece that was akin to a kite’s string but hose-filled with organs, drawn upon many growths that made his own, and plenty more all adding to a great humanoid torso, with only two buds sprouting out of every side, with a tiny, although made be, a sarcophagus with a dog's Anubis height, with a head that was a man's but round, rounder, with only two misaligned horns it wore for crown, a facelessness that only bore a single eye that drooped ever-so lowly after a point, fallen apart, upon its girths, carrying along the cadavers it drew with it and drew along:

'Lo, my master has arrived, upon frail ground that may not be may-be to be called for, conveyed and covered, from one point to another, where the hiding might deflower the ones that out-grow others.'

Even after, when front-done, upon stubby legs he'd walk and talk with little more than what a piece of head, was he left, or he'd been left with gone. As was his mind, but asking, a stranger, never-again, if living, passing, right by him, he'd ask but throng and walk away, of little mind:

'Whom have you angered, great lord, worshipper-maker, of the giant whose ease draws upon all that is destroyed before him?'

'I've little endearment left for those that follow me around and I of all would rustle with no eve that would be taken aft. Therefore, I might seek no countenance be taken.'

Frog legs sprouting here and there, attached here.

'Will you simply lower down your gobbled up things, your heads and human teeth and bodies if I were to ask so kindly of you to settle down arm and carry on from this point on?'

'Nay, there shall be no reason just yet, to forget and lay.'

But there they stood, before the broken house's ledged trough, one of them was standing. One of them receding in their backs.

'A point to me, my good friend.'

Arparn had settled on another cruel thing, his eyes, which was underneath his glove. It leaped on top one of the lower-wells that had gone through the flood's grove.

'Wretched was there a day, when a dire thing conveyed in heavy graves would've called as such, and would to be, was there a cast, there yonder, of little there is pained, as it's. For what's seen by it without you now there's little chance to see it flee.'

In flight they went, and those adorned, along the way. Comprised of people:

'A cage, there's a threat in there, the scorpions gather around, munching on one of the most insolent of creatures, the servant whom named himself Afhweq, servant of the rods, muncher of stronger bonds of iron he's been fed on for the past few months now.'

'How do you know all that?'

'I've seen it during the first mental crisis I've been forced into by spell of praying as to think myself sordidly invincible enough, pneumatically perturbed in a mostly unfathomable manner through which

I've seen the manifestations enfold in front of my eyes as they would speak to me during a time of most unbelievable scarcity.'

'Is there a need for eyes down there?'

'There is a blood pit of blue and red, and green and oozing gelatin as well. Of course there is, as the many people who venture below as in dire need of eyes be taken to them, granted, cut, and shared around.'

A shortage of cement, and plaster added to the collapse of the great stone-floors they appeared to drive the road to. Somehow it followed in their path, the three of theirs, as if it would all of the sudden jolt the entirety of the country in a snap, the stone that had made the pavement upon the couches' wheeled nest's bickering of lost banter, would there be a second chance? If one were to ask:

'What is wrong with that underground goliath's head?'

One of them, most disgustingly looking, purple, from end to end, had homed hundred of tiny bat-seeds white, little whitish bulbs, fashioned like mice but kings, all wrapped around, wings below, all curled into a ball, but capable of light-propulsion. A most disgusting turn of wreathing curls.

'You oozing thing, there are parts of the entire window that entered you, couldn't you have known reason if it had hit you thus?'

'I was poisoned and so were my eyes.'

'We all were, and it went as rue's pus.'

Would it have spilled either way? Would there'd been a second wave?

It was reeking all around, most disparagingly, of coils.

A body wrapped in skins and toiled with, cattle but with tawny, skinned, with stitched holding everything, empty sockets, empty light. What he held inside could hardly matter, since there were hundreds of them, the black coiled hoses that made his gander. Immediately as if on command, they started drawing out of him, each voice, of tendrilled rattle that followed through beaded thrice a spoil:

'Answer us, answer us immediately so.'

A door stood at their the threshold between the one man and the one carrying the bricked stairs on top his kneeled upon maze that made his open boat; the creature that walked on rafted thoughts, the sea was made but would only appear when he was done:

'I've seen it, have you?'

'What'd you see, again?'

'The collapse coming, heading down its way, the one whose treacherous approach is but completely stilled in place, fornicated almost, but broken into pieces on the trough, they call it, Sir-Emen. They'll come for it eventually.'

‘What’d you think’s waiting for us there?’

‘It’s hard to tell and hard of shout, as I am, there’s but ill-left naught and just as little peeling off my lip and mouth. But I’ve seen it before.’

‘You keep talking of the fall.’

‘There’s no fall, buffoon of man, there’s only a most unnatural thing as well, ever so encompassing, whose presence’s yet to appear or make itself fell known.’

‘Will you stop it already? I’ve not heard of a single man think of it that way.’

‘You’ve yet to understand Haygas, of what ought to drag along; through spindly-kindle of the feathery gaze the watcher’s known to, it alone would but suffice to start a conversation with him that would last for hours.’

‘So what do you propose, much, then?’

‘I suppose we could lay in hiding and in waiting for the Collapse to draw back and return, to come to a time, whereas even the slightest most hard of mind and blinded by the things that don’t align will yet have complimented us, misguided. They don’t know much better.’

‘Yet you do?’

‘I suppose I would know that, if it were true, that being, you know of ought of which I’ve yet stumble-drawn, to have ill defined of little-mounded thought, alerted. I’ve yet to ask of such dissected hope.’

There was little to the land that mattered in any case, for whatever lack of lustful there was for it, recklessness had taken hold, bouldering what was there placed of finely crafted stalactites, stalagmites, all but curved together, torsion after torsion to form as such a strange barrage. Trapped nonetheless.’

If only one of the gliding bats, the ones trapped inside each cage could simply come apart, one night, most disturbing light there was, therefore taking, out of cogged throng and hilled upped song, confess of what’s been happening to them. A gloomy graying hairless head, at the crossroads:

‘Wait a moment. I didn’t for a dire second think I would see it here, to begin again.’

‘What’s happened?’

‘One of my troops, a soldier beneath the ranks, one that could’ve made it if allowed, he was to be a greater servant and made to rot, in a place where hairs’d-be brought to a swollen devourer, filled with many such incisors as for scissors, cut, and chopped even, theirs being a habit that even the barbers would yet to have brought to their attentions.’

The gist of misdirection, he’d known it ever since.

A hold of stones was broken down. Out of it there had only been a sticking piece of shrapnel-sound lodged in repeatedly in eight of the jointed in great houses that, kept in the air by rusty sonorous chains. Between which an elongated tree-trunk torso-id with a humanoid heart shaped head covered all in chitinous plates, with a downward elongated pipe-opening rounded ellipse, out of which stick-bug legs connected with not only the chains but the houses and the people it was devouringly feeding on. A most robust stone cracked itself on top another, flinging itself against a dire-red vaporous filled with acid cloud. A servant joined another, as the communion began. They prayed to be bathed in acid, as there had been many rains that had eaten through the ceiling's rum. An iron lockbox with dark initials cracked as well, the echoes signaling they were not alone, again. It started bouncing against each wall, against reflection strung, the name of the Champion whose surrender gave birth to the crowded grounds, ever on their lips, the scythe-bearers approached, each but pointing their blades inwardly towards their wonted chests, warranted retreat, a second and a third floor fell over themselves because of a most deprecatory scent of rotten mean.

'It's worse than anything even remotely imaginable, worse than I could've ever expected it to be.'

'Only a few living men made it, as far as I can tell, there's but little we can do about them.'

The box oozed in place, no longer eerily given, but grabbed from sided trench; a few fingers curled around it, digging deeply and even deeper than allowed to, one head bust through each dead. A few more of the corpses came running in, all of them missing their feet, appendages being set in steel, yet coated were there pair of wheels upon which they walked. Monocycles, as they bore, filled and covered with blades and knives and plenty of sharp-stingers that all came to life when the master of a hold approached. His reign had ended, yearly upon a faded brow. Grayish strands emerging from his side-long glance, a helmet blue-choral of broadened single handedly beaten-as the army slain lay hid inside the crowded grounds. Although putridly were his curls, emerged, a faceless thing out of his chest, frost. And guarded rails were frozen in their tracks, the demons falling all behind as the master of his house but cackled:

'You shall not get me still to come after you after. You shall not taste of steeled bow, and face but braggingly, that you have faced me and lived on.'

With which on dark command, he'd given, missed his chance to flee away. But stayed for long enough to watch them glancing as the tar released, along the way. Part of his hold tightened to such grip as there was, an extent, at the expense of a single man watching, whose swollen tenderly, embrace, had turned up to be lush-less. Of darkened head, there was a pistol shaped rock, in one of the dens.

All attached to it as well.

'Champion of Erie Dowry Sour, you are called upon the hour to attend. An assassin came upon me now, in yer' watchful hour when you were supposed to watch over me, then, wilt he my life by failure do I live yet such. I will of you to draw much forward.'

While going through the library of limbs and crude made weapons, in this outlandish thing.

That is to say, it was a flying bastardization made out of various portcullis, houses, homes, little trenches, flying hardened fields, buildings, watch towers, dens and other structures joined in, even a raft and a boat, and a few animals whom were tumors, some but not all still fed upon.

Along the oblongidity that ran the course around the tip of his fingers had he searched for a disturbed mental-hardening ill-thing with beating hearts to draw breath and fling his teeth, planting them upon their wretched melting frets; as he found out by himself that some of them but melted skin on touch, severely maiming his face as some of the Greater Appendages fell, wriggling so upon his brow. One even began producing heat as it worked its way through his mouth and jaw, then even deeper, submerging past the ration that filled his lower body-sacks attached to his throated upper-chested bony-taw. That melted quickly, in turn revealing, that not a single clayish thing was there. No skin but a most disgusting plaster, that made his bowels yet but trail.

Crossed upon the walk :

There stood a few crickets stopped in place, no longer trying to enter through one of the tinier holes that were made, beneath each there being a louder voice that would deliver, no hindrance as to hear what they've wrought in pain. Sculptures of most ubiquitous drew out among their way:

'There's a broken lid that's been shot in, through the lock now both of them but block the entrance.'

'Have you tied a knot of iron, spiked and to their like but strode through light? Of vengeance there's but little alloy to be cast, not that I would have it thus, but there's another, much brother man that's been here before, asking for a thing of lust.'

'SO it's her, the one who locked herself in, Sybaal, that wretched fiend will pay for blocking us out, for what we've come about to hide.'

'What did you find?'

'A most wretched thing, come and see.'

An open window yet appeared to be set-upon a much higher place, upon a higher plane where one could but hinder his descent, upon such abodes, as the lower-ones that were set to cone, and grander, much less stronger, bodies wrought in thunder, that sparkled in the house, and there were other crackling fire, others steam, but in-between a butcher with eighteen blades all coming from within him. Tool of war, embodied in cones, some had grown their limbed thrones, that dragged them in, but removed by cords, attached to the sets as well as the cones, allowed them to move forward wherever they would go towards. Some stole men's eyes and walked on feet stitched together onto them, these sharp-pawns, but her servants, her, no head, but hard a few scythes and crowbars of cartilage coming out the stump that used to be her neck.

'What a terrible house to live in, is it not?'

'I so happened to share the same thought as you had, but it never crossed my mind that something like this would happen. If you were to look closer, even for a moment's notice, you'd see what I'm referring to, you'd see what I'm talking about.'

A single spark, and there a release, a basement of globed people of whose heads were movingly attached with chained-stones that made them go back and forth until busied by the pain that's been pinning them down ever since, and lain to their side, another woman, made out of three joints, two hers and the last a giant pumping eely thing that entered the side of her 'toes'. Her head was elongated and fat, to the sides wider, but her brow filled with miss-placed eyes that all went into the wrong sockets. Her mouth was a giant car light rounded can, with a speaker's bolt in the middle of it, producing cries and sounds of pain, as some of their insecticide ran their course, but none fell, above her rains. Since most of them, for some reason kept their distance from the hole, not to fall through the floor immediately, but flames that wrung the air, bore, some bodies in the making dancing, eerily jointing themselves to one another's darker flowing heat-makers, during cries:

'I seek only entrance in, will you please allow me to open the window'sill?'

By noon, they were still there, both wondering how the house did not fall.

By darkened spell of midnight burning, the sky was but done, painted in some eerily reddish-black with pucker-picks yellow-glowing star-solidified cyst-filled formations that were filled with yellow-fading falling-disintegrating parasites that joined the jointed men, who were shaped like helicopters soon and then. A sea started flowing, but it was made out of faces. All but terminated and disgusting, mages; had joined the four of them: Flaiff, Sour, Ick and Point. Made even more paranoid than before, not that it would not come at a cost, since they were all pinned together with the most obtusely disgusting things, these deprecated fiends, that referred to themselves as 'sorcerers' of some appeal. Feared as they might be:

'A darkened veil there used to be that governed upon this lass, as I see it fit, there will be no reason to cast another eye in her place and through the vane of the distraught. I seek but something close to restitution.'

Here they lay, of facelessness melted-bile, defiled by the man they were connected to, all. Every tree and every man and every person, even the infantile women, the broads, were unseeable as to be unattached to it. Ick was the one whom possessed the poor man, although on a subconscious level not even he could possibly hope to endear. Since his open-mouthed jaw flew out of his mouth, then was stuck in mid-air, like a mid-wife trying to deliver a flying child. The Jaw knew, although eyeless, it turned. Its master was bleeding out of his mouth, down his non-existent chin. His shirt was stained all the way through as petals of roses were embed on the prowling mantle he had worn. He paid a good price for it to be ruined, the man did, fifteen hundred and seven coins in oysters, and in bramble pinches, taken from one of the village-dens, that was owned by his cousin, Gerard Treehollow, against whom he had been charged for committing vile acts of theft. Viciously shot, the jaw ate through his chest only once, leaving behind it a trail of puffy blood and a hole the size of a big man's fist. After this vile act, it stood there, eerily contemplating. As if struck, the child was out, the water broke, below the jaw, a single skull-eely jerky thing drew down, like a sea-jelly with three distinct iron wires, contorted as bagels, with electric shooting gun-capacities being tied to every rod's end. A chitin roundness made of one piece, or greater plate, with the appearance of some Prehistoric terrestrial sea-dweller, or one of its spiny segments at the very least. Its eyes appeared to be drawn on top of it.

Disgust could only rear its ugly head in whence allowed the realization as it were to stumble upon the fact that no one, who was present there cared for what was going on at all. Since the demonical things that entered its 'face' were wild manifestations of evil that appeared to have dark eyes in which primordial insectoid-creatures whose lower ends started prodding out themselves, little by little until now.

A groundless abode, near which a single muscle twitched of sound; they entered before tingling-a-nightfall:

Within the eye-sight of a thunder's bolted strike in half, hath he but cut through men, halvening their iron-sights, they might've sullen lain before him dead. Stroken of miss-holden eyes, of sightless lay, before him, the men on the ground. Rode upon disastrous march, towards them as he'd have it now with mostly after- left to him and whispered sayings:

Almost but not enough, several of its pillars taken down upon a break-through in its case, the elk of the first kingdoms, blossoming upon bell azure stalken on a flight of stairs, where a lifeless butterfly patch only thread on whenever it was quaint for the release to come, from the blue-crystal cysted barred gates, lowered from inside the many put together prison-chased, cage and gouge, for they had stammered upon a pendulum's lowering release. The two gates laying beneath it, the chaos of iron that came out of stone and shoved itself wherever it could thread along, whether it'd be facet or most obtuse, disgustingly a head-long trough that carried many craniums, many men survived, the onslaught only following after the dark-helmeted man whose eyes reddened only revealed as much. Not a single bone in his body, of skin, or sky-feisty, but a liquefied pool, whose 'eyes', that had been shown were only the reflection that bounced along, from the very bottom-soles of feet he bore, inside his chained cuirass, inside his gallant iron-chained boots, from whom, to have been stolen if not the Chieftain of Pavruucks?

'Cherish blessed day, I call upon the say of quiet, that it might be opened for me, lowered as I'm to feel a bitter lay, of sayath.'

As there were many gates and many bridges, that were blended with the world. And one could only cross them if allowed. In this case, it was a piece of the sky, some dead people and rotten-wooded trunks-wide spread, part of the foliage-connected to it as well.

Foul play

'I hear something down there, the chirping echoes in-between a toss, that paints a river's drought in faint carvings.'

'We shall see it then.'

An opening, somewhere on top a few rafts. A great fall's deep got entrenched beneath it, through a tomb-empty block of water on all sides, holding it all together in place, this almost frozen but see-through as for this water jelly being liquefied as it held everything in place, they decided it would be best if they descended as farther down as they could, without sloping or spending a single minute holding on for too long, ropeless, yet inclined to ask.

'What if we flail around and fall short of grace, entreating an escape wherever else they might cast and lay?'

'Of whom you've spoken of?'

'Only of the most irresolute of things, uncanny, the ones that were trailing after us, along the soles without a winded cliff and sorted out, tawny bocks of stone-filled ant hills, it's there that I thought I saw them last.'

'And if they do show up?'

‘Our way out wilt be stooped out by lid.’

‘Then we shall have as little of choice as to endear no return through the way we came from. I can see it in any case, the water sprouting off of air. It will cover up the way we came from, regardless of whether or not you’re to find it fair, no more nor longer than I do in any case.’

‘SO be it.’ With nonchalance, he cried towards Josephine. As she only pulled out the slingshot martini-glass shaped device; holding it together with its two talons that drew out of the side of her brow, out the temples, inside of which, both hers and inside the glass, two ropes appeared to be coiling in controlled-convoluted areas. One across her forehead and one inside the funnel of the glass, the deep depression, which was filled with lesser things-like deep-crag filthy-drowned, puckery parasites, all that had belonged to her was theirs; all of her belongings, without exception. Started even speaking to them, she did, instead of with her travelling companion, whose torch only shone on them from time to time, without even a thought crossing his mind as to inquire, why, why are doing this?’

‘Shh, can’t you see I’m trying to undo some locks here? You can’t always, damn you, I’ve knots in my forehead and there are some inside of you as well.’

All of them were thrown in, she could barely grapple anything with the grappling-hook inside her head. Let alone the one she held, without ruining them completely. And they were something akin to her children at this point in time. No mother should slay her children by any means, as that would be an act of insufferable bastardity beyond the beliefs of any common minded person as to have them crossed.

Forest people are driven out of stones as light-shone through them, sprites, of little more, of little less, a blue tint around them, with a miasma trailing off some distant shore they had been drawn out of. A plump creature, dark, but only feet and a giant fuzzy head; a man’s, but perfectly mundane, whose short-wont soles crawled along as they were dragged by his strange moving motions:

‘You are not to approach that part of the cave unless you want to trigger the water’s shout through sink-open dark repair, twas told to wilt have drowned you if you as much as tried.’

‘Then we shall not, if that’s the case. But until you tilt that stone.’

‘Which one?’

A short silence ensued.

A bastardly creature whose bottle-was drool; two assassins by its side, both openly cloaked in gelatin stashes-drawn on top of.

A day was passed without anything wilt to happen. There was no a single door uprooted from its hinges yet in the sight of all, there came a single sun’s will-flowery daze, who drew a man whose prisms, wildly attached to his head, around a temple collar, through which he saw no end of life, had taken out of him, little more than needed. A stronger light heeded an entry to the poor stove. A pair of wagers drew up-front, no closer than permitted, every single throne was down. Spread across the hellish place:

‘What have you done while I was missing?’

‘We’ve been extremely busy trying to fornicate through some of the broken vases, bowls and other little things you left behind for us to admire.’

‘I didn’t expect this chaos to happen, let alone you remove each slab, each pile and every stone block that made this fine side of town. You’re strangers to this place and you’re unwelcome.’

‘Yet you paid us, in as many spades as possible as we could see but little option that to prove you that we’re not without a mind, we’re not without conditioning, as to please ourselves and slack. We made use of what we had. Even if it took us many hours and even if it took as much effort as to undo every binding and every chain, the one that kept everything beneath the pails of earthen bodies in which they swam before releasing them.’

‘I can see that.’

And there, before him stood a hole, a strange thing that lend him the impression of a pool of mud that’s melted through fine chisel and through stone, until it had encompassed every and not a single piece of toil could but be made of what he was looking at, as various lumps, bumps and hill-like leapers made it seem less endowed; wavish even while everything had been completely contained underground. Yet he wondered:

‘Where have the corpses gone? Where are they now? I thought I would be met by them, I thought I saw one where now, there would be none and no more again will I work myself up with thinking until I’m reasoned with and answered. Say, what have you done with them, villains?’

‘They are there, but they are free to do as they please, without the intrusion of either the living or mankind, or liege-intrusion as to serve every and anyone whom might willfully stomp or walk on them, despite uncannily forlorn deceitful were, to behold the den in which they’ve made home out of, but lo, they’re struck in ruination, damned to join the dirt, as bone is a trifling creation whose existence cannot be forced to last for long, unless one would find himself swimming in a muddy sea of spine, of spiked shrapnel made to die of such affront as taking but a dip, to have cast his feet where fish had lain, rocky chains and iron holding them away.’

‘But have you not removed them when allowed to ask? Surely, there’s but no reason to have adorned their crowns with most useless a stinker.’

A knife carved path, done by hand, that looked as if it had been carved manually by the far end of a chisel; where there had been a few unnaturally defunct, reeled in the green verdant globes that sunk-in the probes of stone:

‘I see there’s no reason to maintain any appearance any longer, not since you’ve showed me your true colors.’

‘What would those be?’

‘It’s simple, although I will never catch you revealing them!’

Down-north

A virulent thing came in the air. It spoke of the north, of what used to be the southern border where there now lay, only a few standing strands of ice, all frozen, yet aghast. Many puffy fires that were struck, many other ropes come from sea-faring but one thing was struck so, around some higher-circles, men were spared:

‘Come, come, I think there’s still something we can take from out of them, just give it a try!’

‘Won’t they leap together, sickle themselves out of their cells?’

There’s no saying whether or not they’ll repeat the process again. Since with those things lodged inside their chests.’

Fifteen centimeters for every single one at the very least; They were more likely to hail themselves as beasts than anything else, most disgraceful as it’s come to them being cut around, yet those things, those ‘stones’ that beat out of them, puffy hearts, bigger, as some blubber or some fatter-quails, holding them together, preventing any fall-apart, whatever that might mean.

‘Make a cut here and there and you should get a better idea about what’s going to happen if we leave them be.’

‘Fine, but if one of them dies out of shock, it’s all on you, all right?’

‘Of course, of course, you know I wouldn’t dare spare in a lie!’

He approached slowly, knife drawn out-unsheathed, then, as he approached one of the wrapped around the pegs of coal-wood piles, as he angled himself not to lend in an accidental sleight of hand as to slip and cut him thoroughly on either side of the two remaining human-parts of his body, he simply plunged in with an almightily amount of force, entering the organ as if it had been nothing more other than some puffy fat, then bore it out as quickly as he made the cut; vividly vilified in shock. This should not be happening by normal means, nor would there be any feasible explanation as to why he survived. But the prisoner simply did not bleed; he didn’t reel back or jerk his body around as to signal any kind of pain being received. Instead he simply returned a cackling smile; an ellipse that stretched a bit, but didn’t move around.

‘We think they’re parasites, these rocks of meat. They cut men in half then they attach to them, but they don’t leave nor do they kill their hosts.’

‘And you’ve tried cutting them as well?’

‘Lower side, by the waist, undo the wrapping and you should get a good enough idea.’

Twenty or so curved scythes, some of them recent, others incredibly old, going on by some vague approximation, perhaps one would date them fifteen days or so, far exceeding the time they were informed about them. What made it all worse was the fact that he had it to be the same as he, this wretch that’s become the man, no longer a man, no longer one of them, yet anything but it, the rocky meat parasite attached to its spinal cord and fluid.

‘He’s still keeping him alive, I see.’

A fresh enclave of limbs; a few of them made that very gate they were gyrating their heads towards, lopsided then whole; there was a cistern by it but that was, wholly so, to an excusable degree, to be ignored for better reasons yet withheld. A manner of speech, then saying:

‘Fewer mouths were cut for this!’

An ignorant little deformed solstice, gathered around it lay only a few unnatural people that could barely move from where they stayed, then joined their insignificant other as they simply found no bothersome in-between and after.

‘The man shall feel for his life for no other reason than this, I wager, from this point on, you are to humble your feet and cut the meat for green and worthless surroundings, be abhorrent from that point soon-after. My son, promulgate your little-infantile desire to cast away the sin-as anchor. For there’s as little to no less that you may do, as soon as they’ve impressed onto you that follows!’

‘Then what should I do, lord, protector, father?’

‘I see no lack of need, nor countenance abhorrent at the hand of such disease as anyone would fathom to achieve You’re to be culled from the rest of the herd!’

‘But good sir, I’m but waned by the trifling pointy bit of a sword I’m lest beknown of employing in jest of hard apparel and countenance withhold upon blighted sight of come upon my brow a man of no delight as would’ve had himself thrusting into my chest, burying a pacifier of my rage twas come to such degree of burning Fahrenheit, of coldness such depressing into my very lust drawn again for vengeance, not to be pitted again against some slumber come of age, they draw and are alike to mine, the people if you’re one of them, I would lest say of yore, be tall and kindred to them foreboding of such mischievously benigned feign as to pit me before another man of lest countenance draw me to afford such putridness withheld from me, I seek something that would have my worth unmet again, so I ask of thee that you may lend a hand to no other man, then allow, whenever called upon, by sickened onto you draft to look the other way and join me, yet in flight and yeast of smell, of brokenly rock and crest, deserter, sickening the dogs upon the worthless, tender, as broadened be thine soul emergence come upon the newer-bow, to their likens I shall deem you no more, nor hold grudge for the satisfaction they had robbed me of by rapier stiffened upon my mind distraught and disgustingly abode in which we stand of left overs, cadaverous remains, that rest upon the blasted fathomless remains of cold, colder still, and cold falls, of snow absinthe, during stormy rains where the lightning ever tells of the most malodorous sabbatical audacity, as the echoes, the echoes that are reminded of beatings of the swollen drums of war is come, onto the plains from where I come and onto the blasted roads that roar upon a countenance long withdrawn from my spiritless sanguinity’s lost forbearance called, for my spirit yet again, be done with it, allure of angels, the fallen figure of Lucifer’s stalled upon vengeance that would have me punished, intermediary delight, if I were to say a word of his true-self, called upon name that he has blessed me with such bequest as to have known him still and yet be knowing of the kinds which he had blessed no other, bloody coin upon rum doubloon, as such as I would be, called, yearn that I must, a nasty-minded swoon-baboon, niggardly inclined as to listen to such beasts that would’ve robbed me of my mind, this mind that belongs to him in thought and underneath the candle’s lightened blight of many gradients of shades that switch from one another, as to refrain, from ever-quiet war that’s been the bastard’s most insolent cone of dark retrieval, thing, of much tranquility, bastion of ever-been that I may not plight myself of such reminder, for he, he, the lord of darkness, blest be known to most that would bemuse such blessings, blessed thine be thine countenance if thou art still listening to my plea of rite, born of such occultish hobbles into which, I have but sekt but such delight into my young days, during which I would've held no blasphemous a thing, withdrawn and counting upon they who would listen to me no more, nor seek to ask me questions that would allude to my broken heritage be known, as my body's lousy mark, his son, had grabbed with a talon-branded as I come upon the flames, such apparitions of withdrawn breath would've burnt me to the ever-green flourishing heaves I had once been destined to achieve the flight of, until today when I am blessed no longer but I walk upon a path that, they had thrust me onto, as to have me sickened like the hound of war that would drag us both to answer the melodious call during the time of anger, and the time of thunder's storm come onto as when listened to him, the one that would have us come, onto the realization of distress, as we hold, hand in hand but a last moment of such acuity, of bastardity that would drag you as well, into the pits where you shall only share home with me, a bastard of no day, a bastard of no heightened sight and lay with me into the bed, of lavender spread, into the cemetery where we shall stand forever, thinking of the darkness that had come onto us, and the boneless skeletons that will invite us, cheering, of large up heaving, into that graven holes and pit the gravediggers had drawn, the coziness of warmth, away, from the coldness of the war drums that would have us freezing-chewed and spat, and taken for granted there are things I've done that would yearn me nothing more but the most disgustingly, most protrudingly of destruction, of my soul given onto them that I would obey the call of a most disgusting lay, each of them, for my family's in a bag, where I shall be thrust, into my family's crypt, where my ancestors are, but shall no longer be gone, for, despite their bones being thrust away into damp, fathomless pits in which the twists and flights of stairs are gone onto, that they will take a second more to rejoin in fairness and in the fair sight of joy that they would lend onto us for a moment more during which we could lose no countenance if we were to take a second to appease, of such glory they would have reprise only to hear us a second more, their lights being met by such galore of thunder, that, eventually, the war shall be brought onto us, oh lord, such disturbance as the thunder's roar as the rain that's fallen onto us, and more than that, the falling and the coming of a winter that would only have us run like infantile children during our play unobserved by our parents who had taken their time out of the day to leave their house earlier in an evening as to attend some ball or some societal party they might use their charms, as to their abode's employ, run, while leaving us unattended, least one would realize what unaccountably unfathomable an error was made, where the servants would step right in, as, I am struck by pain and a migraine, caused by the vision I've been witnessing since the very day of my conception- of my come out of the Providence, and home out of which the bastardly apparel of my destruction's come to an end's enduring, out of the hopeful endearing insatiability of knowledge that has been lend onto me by ancestors whose limbs were elongated and were joined into my back, as they've struck me time after time again, since they were rounded-fat with such balloons of fat and lumps, with many angular faces but legless as if they were all attached by cords, if I remember correctly, conniving creatures of nightmarish origins of whose cowardly contrivance make the ruse of my dumbfoundedness a thing of even lesser regard than that of my very birth which has been continued upon, worked as by surgeons with no limbs and many strange metallic mouths and grins out of which many look-a-likes such as I exist, in this unfathomable gull and gulf, to which I still allude, that you shall join me eventually and seek no such distress that no one else might find it easily, upon you, as such, impress the joy of finding yourself lost in the eve of the uncanny!'

‘We pray to him but he doesn’t hear us do it for some reason or another. Either that, or we are simply abandoned and left to our own devices as to breed the seed of darkly wrought, the ones that follow after naught. Neither of them will ever understand the Relics, the relics that have granted us life and crucified our expectations on a wall of shameless clocks we’ve yearned to stop in front of crowdless masses, judgmental to our every tick at the tip of the tongue, but only the even hours, we have picked clean like bones, as timeless grunts abhorrently passed our unfathomably insolent rise of our very un-lovely anciently-written tones, rapier of the sun, the seasons, men coming along who glow of treason, yet forlorn of sun and come of moon, bastion-yet-intermediary with all the season’s come of gloom, during the likes, and the trifles, whence, and there-away, ashened-coal and stay-away.’

And gloomy-trodden, sarcophagus-stay, the cozy-warmth of stoves but stinger, poking all the mine’s come forth and tinder, the venerable Orthodoxy’s pariah prayer titter, to which a single-star’s yet-glow upon, and light revealed several if not all, crimson-hourglasses stung but stray, out the maze that is the drainage that’s but pained. En-tombed the hurricane in absinthe, gathered had the bulls and charged, back where they had started early, watching kkk-clocks. Puffs of thunder scorn the see; the light-house blinding, never me, for I do man and man does me, for either one of us or else to be. A simple widow, celery, on a dish taken to sea; where my lover’s yet to be. Where a giant headless body started creating pus-balls with outlandish spikes and insufferable dark abodes made out of the most uncannily defiled creations, bearing hundreds upon hundreds upon thousands of eyes, with bore-forth bellies filled with unfathomably defiled, headless peons, peasants and many slaves, niggering around with their servants, whom had been trashed away.

They stopped in place. A wreathing coil of clot and many unnatural things came to life, defiled and made of bile, with many unnatural heads brought onto the pile, from an unnatural heed of stairs and many flights of dark remains.

It stood onto the ship and strained but many legged things, with elongated cricket legs:

‘I wish to speak to one of your leaders, that I may devour his heart!’

‘You’ve come upon no nasty place yet you are brought onto the life’s trifling stare’s delight yet mourn of little oft and wager!’

Forth he came as he was little to no servant nor a stranger!

Born under the sign of cancer, eighteen crabs appeared to come oft from the depths of the Froathing Sea of dead-animals.

‘There’s a man walking on that street, make him stop!’

‘I can’t, it’s not within my power to do so. He has too many black holes with eyes attached to his tar-like eaten by tumors body, he would devour my soul in a matter of seconds.’

‘Niggers are monkeys and need to get kilt, as well as kikes who are also in need of being lynched!’

‘Something’s insoluble in the well.’

‘Was it an anchor that drenched it before it fell?’

‘Not even one, although I would seem to be of a similar simile.’

‘We shall lack such an affront if there’s something coming down the reel.’

But there was no man out there who could dictate it otherwise, yet some broken floating isles, with their hills that were connected to a downward pointing tower but no solid soil but bricks; a floor at the end of it, and two almost flat-pincer like domes on either side of it. With every floor and every room as well as everything else, but niggled on by the beings living trapped inside of it.

Living inside of it:

‘Most peculiar a thing I’ve stumbled onto!’

‘What is it?’

One of the more disturbed servants that had arrived; through one of the fallen laundry stocks, that entered still of nimble-benighted. Fungi of blobs, with barbed barbed fluffily fluffy yolks killing some fucking disease, yearning godly appease, not sounding frustrated umbilical-cyst, bludgeoning the safari fingers and a floating iris. That appeared on the walls. It spoke tenebrously in tongues but forgot itself after a while.

My servant, my servant, where is my servant gone to ? – a voice asked, through the bask of a cello; although somber in sound.

‘There’s a pint for shun, and come about, you’ll find one!’

‘I am not going to be kept waiting, do you hear?’

Awful place, a piece of a trunk-thing, a slug merged with horse-back, holding a small raft, the sea around them hardened cartilage, built upon it, many moving structures with long legs interconnected by bars with strange oblongoid faces puking some vaporous thing inside each other’s mouths in order to walk.

They were watched over by the guardian, a peculiar being that watched over everyone; whose half right of the face was a shell-like oyster formation with three sharp incisors that were curved and made to be like Cretaceous back segments, wide and long, spines almost, or as lengthy as to form a trail; but meaty and organic like some prune, coming out of a pseudo-humanoid fat-pumping in and out like a heart or a lung, tortoise human ‘head’ with an oblong neck turned into a stump, eyeless, featureless but resting on a giant pebble-shaped fat mushroom organ, to which it was a part of, less of ‘resting’ on top of it like some seal, and more so being the top growth in relationship to it. Many long tape-wormish ropes and coils dangles beneath it and threw themselves around while it continued its flight. A fat tower-like torso shaped like some blob-fish taken out of the bottom of the sea until it had become a thing of gelatin, in terms of how it slithered in the oil it was covered by. Beneath it, an organ egg-shell like opening into which this torso diverged into kept a hold of an almost eye-ball giant organ that appeared to hold its organs together in a forward thrust spear-like thing of fat which was protected by a giant see-through transparent worm-frame that kept most of the organs gloating, floating and levitating in the air, still connected by tendons as well as other tenebrous things that were all kept inside that insidious organ. Multiple openings could be seen coming out of the ‘eye’. Hairs above them that looked like stitches where the trunk and the roundness began converging, lending on the impression that it was somewhat eating it; bearing moustache pieces above and beneath a wide-spread around it jaw; whereas the one head at the top looked as if it had been alive once but died and lay rotting on a puffy surface it could not lower or drive itself away from. A blob-cactus connected to a hot-aired oblongoid-balloon; suckling on a sphere, while the worm in front of it wriggled; with the one inside much worse, with every strange, almost elongated cylindrical with split-pricks at its end, diverging into slithering toots that could feed on bacteria and everything.

It enjoyed the attention it was getting, never resting and never growing tired of it; especially since it dominated and wanted more.

The tendency one would feel towards the compulsion towards which the aggrandizing yet savagely wrought cast in which their inner most precious and kept to their selves' warmth through such insignificant times as to feel the aforementioned destruction of the eve's last hold inside the pile that had amassed alongside the ganglion carapace great epidermis of growthal range, though unsatisfactory for any-who might walk alongside it with their armored-fashioned suits clearly made for their benefit and protection as to forget, even momentarily, the mortal danger one would eerily feel once they would be exposed to the bacterium-concave citadel of many similar of kin simian-trunk detoxification recsis; as to resist it would mean a play of mortal danger beneficial only to the moldering bodies accessed by some of the illustriously raised statues with humanoid heads connected to their inner devicery, keeping their alive while their eyes become slug-like poles with many t-o their likings molded other faces would float around and search for something they could lodge their incisors inside, as to feed upon whichever and whoever they might feel a need to implant themselves into, without a long serration, without administering the procreation of the little ones that ejected themselves from the giants that fell upon themselves and picked up the blob-like boxes in which hundreds upon hundreds hid.

'Alas, I feel as if I waited for the sand-light for far too light! I see only the pale orange of the water it's made out of, carbonated in crystal eyes.'

Every molecule watched closely. For they were glassy; inside of them, microscopic fetuses, with elongations that shot in every direction, wanting to get out; incapable of escape, suffocating with the pucker sucker, the pus and the musk.

Musket, he brought it out. A' pointing narrowly at one of the crude eaten crook-like pillars and deeply yet inside:

'I know what you're hiding little man.'

Dark corpse skinned alive with a red completely painted head belonging to some other man. Spikes of metal on top of him, flashing palms and bottom of his legs gave it all away. A heart symbol where his head is appears, it speaks through it, mouth unmoving:

'You can see the veins pumping in my forehead. I think. In my nostrils, in my real mouth; this is a real heart that's been implanted in my face. I cannot remove it or else I die.

They stole my real heart and threw it away. Look where my heart is.'

A blue liver appeared. His face-heart flashes and disappeared, being replaced by a spherical thing with spikes at every end that extended across every features he had. They started spreading in some strange triangular long-spikes that started pushing out of every direction, out of his body; until his body had become a strange flat band bearing every limb and piece on top of the flat triangle-‘boards’. It felt as if he had been crucified, but it wasn’t the same, since he crawled on the deformity, which twisted and reeled as a paper-sheet, upon which he surfed through the cracking of the sand-globes.

‘I could cut you like I’m a butcher’s cleaver. And I can make it clean and I can kill you if I will!’

‘Then do it! Get it over with! Do it, kill me this instant! I want to die this instant!’

‘Calm down, I’m not intent on killing you just yet. I just want to talk. Since the watcher’s making me extremely uncomfortable, I could only swear to it that I’m being watched especially by him, although I should not be, since he’s always picky on who’s he yet to kill!’

Trouble, too much trouble for it to count in any case; too much to make any difference whatsoever or to break from the insolent embrace that was promised to him; both were pained by living in the livid area of the world; incessantly hard as it’d gotten, bastards survived no matter the cost and trade. And this would only serve them so much less than an assurance to the living and to the bold of what entered through their spirited drink.

‘Here, have one, on the hose, hit one of the Billies while you’re at it!’

They were to be bled upon immediate notice, so as to be of an incline that would not endear the startle of a few infanticides; there was, whereupon the first start they had gotten to run around, a single flash of light to endear the drawing of. Locks of seals had flown in sight, carrying only the parcel of a toolish thread of spires black of iron, all making it appear as if it was naught but a tool of war. Spines and spikes, raised from the flat; a large block that was moved by them, with rotating grinding stone-like spiels and shrubs, entanglements of barb-wire and draughts of blinded-yet-distraught, heavy headed, poisoned by their blood, mindlessly endowed, vaporously inclined, deprave and insane, wretchedly feigned; for what was worth it, not a single soul wanted to recede back into the place they have started from, not a single soul to starve the beast that was the sole master of their wreathing:

‘She is the sole reason I am a failure; that blasphemous cunt; an anchor for teet, that I should not withdraw if I could have it straddled upon sight!’

Was a must that could barely be held!’

A spindly back twas crooked on the road but followed, gnawing somberly upon some flower-cake it carried in its back, and therefore stood at last, without a hag to yell out, shouting but standing upon a fronted sight, to ask of less that followed after, come at last upon a comb of many worms, she rested in that bed of crags, allowing them to wallow on top of her as if she were a bed of dirt, inviting every single one of them to dance upon her brow and worth. Was there no man of high regard to put the wench out of her madness? From which she had been forcefully thrown, and left to wallow in the spindly crevice of the worthless yet forlorn- apart torn, disabled were the dogs that were under her command; but neither one made a sound whose echo might eerily, or by some accident be endeared enough as to be heard. It was too perilous for such an allowance to be lessened or courted not for worth had cradled inside her insidious skimpy coat of puck. It was enough to get on her nerves, right before throwing a tantrum again, squirming in the dirt of filth as a stroll of crows ventured in to laugh at her, as they wallowed in disgust!

Then a tall giant skinned alive but underneath bearing many spade-shaped faces with empty sockets, that was as hollow inside as a waterless Silo, with tongues coming out of him in grim formations of keys, bearing five arms that were wrung around his waist like some band or ring, shoulderless, without a neck, while his head was as wide as his chest, and his mouth would lay in place of a normal humanoid's collar bone; in possession of no legs but some mantle-growth baggy slug-like stump on top of which it crawled struggled to drag itself towards her.

'I am your fiancé, my dear!'

'We're married?'

'Of course we are!'

Dirty tower of seeping faces, all trying to claw out at my face, the wench thought. Filthy wretch she was, following him from that point on; right as he turned, he crawled in his back, in a coffin like spot, which encased her into a crystallized diamond form which allowed for her skin to fall apart until she was all made out of bones, glittering in the sun. Fifteen meters away, a rock had been flung, completely squashing his head, right before it threw itself the perpetrator of this deadly jest. A peculiar antique fourth quarter of an armored chest, bearing a helmet with the mummified body of a cylinder that leaped on top the worthy crest, the body it had lodged itself on top of like some totem, now in possession of a new body, and as well as the wretch. His servants from that point on; for with his new arms, he had grabbed a hold of the face that lay on the ground, seeing how it was still alive, resolving to taunt.

'You're mind now, you villainous beast!'

'But lo', new master, you've stole my body into prime, alas, I'm bested and shall end my cat!'

'We shall soon devour it whenever we slither a chance to come into contact with it, but no sooner than it's needed, for such is fate, from this point, very much conceded to my hopelessness. I am but wreathing in agony, such is the impression to which I'm blessed as soon to lend. My many servants such likened to you in mind, they will show signs of gratitude, I'm certain, as soon as they're forced to share a piece of the cricket's left endowed, and multi-crackled, sound-en-sound, ensnared for empty sayings, they will greet you thus!'

'But master, this armor of yours!'

'It's made out of people, no more and less than I had bested them as well, and eaten them in bout of rage, annoyance to be tinned with dust upon rubbing myself against their skin by force encumbered now!'

Wreathing in place and walking in slow paces that were thrust from side to side unnerving; it should've mattered little to someone as well-thrust, forth and cast!

A weather-topped roof tile of some distant chimney swept river-stop near another head-long foot floor with a few corpse tall tree-tops near them, with branches holding cones of chipmunks-sharpened toothy balloon-fat, elongated tiny inflated parasitical head-openings inside of which crayon sprawled lynched niggardish tiny brat-cocoon rats appeared to swim inside the pool of.

A large carpet adorned a simple enough room they had barely stumbled in, upon the sighting of a clothes' rack standing a spine worm-of many beads of cords that were attached by anchored men entered through one another, shoulder armed extended to the ceiling, whereas they stretched, from the right side of the wall, to a root-spindly enclave of many squirming wrap-arounds, that, upon a second sight-back, rebound to have revealed them where they stood, and then again, after the shroud, they notice that the men were no human at all, but that their mind had played the most hickory trick on them it could, as, these fashioned to look like them, suicidal things of rooks and bramble only appeared, frankly, their mindedness only allowed for a slight retort from one of the men present in the room who were more so focused entirely on the clothes racket than on the main-subsidiary itself.

Strangers in the hold of quiet

They marched in without remorse even before the hour came to an end, half of the clocks around the room being very much, completely ruined to such a degree that many of them were not only completely blocked in twenty or so people's bodies, lodged in, as to befuddle even the most skilled of body-operators, but they also appeared to defile some of the most innocuous time-aspects of history that came out of them, not only so, but apparently being completely defunct as to what's become of them in the next few minutes, where every single man in this ugly, disgusting, hard to look at room got completely slaughtered as if they were nothing, not even the slightest, more recognizable remains being somewhat left there as to be recognizable in terms of who's what's made, enacted against and around whose, niggerly being the way in which these acts of terror were forced against them. A most malicious thing followed soon enough after, as to completely ruin the mood, the gramophone having stooped so low upon, being met by its melting point, which ran across, dwindling across the fingers of the player, whose tiny titillating toes were curled in spot, loaded in his shot-sandal revolvers pointers. Near-them by, a few centimeters at the very least there being a head that only now stopped rolling, having belonged to a man that died, not so much as twenty minutes ago, after an attempt to put an end to this early on-set debacle which had ruined them completely. Red were the people of the daze. Many of them being the people of miasma-fire grain-pouting protrusion-sprays of shapes and unnatural growths that were made to home the parasites inside the room that were with them, dragged along in a most continuous manner that's been forced through their skulls as to leave the sides of their bodies. Leaving behind them only the most, grainy open bags, left behind deflated in a mannerly kind of fashion there being naught but him. The man whom he's feared he'd be there all along, although too afraid to open and purse his lips, the plaintiff being placed on a rack, nailed rustily on a most peculiar support pillar, that was part of the man he had been staring right in the eyes, Gumno, and his cherished eyed-deformed peculiar thing that was half-his fingers long and wrapped around every standing man he was currently suffocating as to pull out the filthy rationed Parasitic parts of the unfathomably hard to look at Lavhbudd, the parasite. It rested no longer but used this opportunity to put himself together as to fully lodge himself in one of the amulets he picked up from the ground, the most peculiar one, inside of which there being hundreds if not thousands of similar shard-protrusions through which he, used, as such to familiarize himself with every method known to man and beyond him to enact torture upon the intruder in order to facilitate his own escape through most of the towns that had crawled like cockroaches outside, uniting one another as wax-stamped rafts and giants that were coming out of their roots, arms fully stretched into millions of pantheons of similar kinds of humanoid deities, all of whom were legless but were trying to pour themselves into the dark world that lay between the known one and the dream-like formation of cyst-ships they not only communicated to but had called upon as to adhere to the dark tall spectral things that were formed inside their minds, their lurid brains sticking out in the same way dark shards of peculiar dog-formations of the most irresolute kind, through which they had not only found a way to create little dark servants of destruction, angelic cherub-feline beings that were now flying above the plainly exposed open-universe like hole through which a good span of the flying balloon-blimps that were engulfed into spikes with gun-like canons, being struck into firing motions that could not be stopped, but all of the sudden, various voracious eater-dog cretins that had been brought from another world by the Divinity Mold of flit and eyes, creeping about in the most obtusely hard to deformed-angst-like perilous petulant destroying form-like dark-crucifix there being embed in a few of the creature's chests, it, all of the sudden, was, this, most peculiar thing that was supposed to be a simple altercation has become nothing short of a fully-fledge war-refuge, through which not only would they not be capable of fully going through it because of their apparent, yet incessant, most unnaturally to, clearly be seen weakness that had been adhered to, and against, but the stolid darkness that followed soon after distracted the War-God Champion, crowned Gunslinger-Kid, Gumno, as the Parasite itself started making its irresolute advent through the most and darkest of recesses below the earthly plains through which, as he'd seen it, for what was worth as to recall through the most and only most of twists he grabbed and flung itself, there, in a deadened moot-point where he'd seen, laughingly naught else, but a gap of light left behind and projected through the roofen' steely plank-broken dark pit-hole he had used for his escape. A most peculiar thing happened, as the joy of disquiet had settled upon the most wretched of accesses to finally be revealed for what they were, in a most peculiar turn of events, he decided to follow as to see his arms and he himself being wrapped around the most innocuous of treasured anchoring devices that kept some of the lower-termite holds through which, swung along a rack of stoles of high-velocity rotating argyle giant commoners that had grabbed him before he even had the chance to move from the dead-point of decayed ground he had not only entered through but he had found himself paying the most heedless of dark approaches, as to, less to, forget what entered his mind. Being split in half, there, oozing as the growth began. Most unnaturally of torn apart, yet incapable of fully grasping what had, or was wrought to him when, he ought not to have been pleased; his tortured body being fully decayed in two sides and two parts, out of which twenty billion demons came out of, all of them bearing bleared out chests that started sprouting even darker shapes that could not even hold themselves in part or check as to fully comprehend what's happened to them during the first strike to his half-chest. As his dark eyed holding half-skull only dragged behind by some, queerly unlucky elongated demons that had grabbed some of the tiny humanoid skulls from inside the room through which he fell, as to tenderize them, being molded in part with their brains, having then, all of the sudden, granted them such vigor as to bring them alive, the Saint-like creatures began radiating with a most maliciously deformed color that started spreading everywhere as to reveal the world beneath the world under the control of the Nemaia- deformed, whom called upon him to stop his spread of terror that was ensued in search of the most salacious of evils.

'Your tenderness is most tenebrous and you shall only heave yourself to suffer if you continue doing what you are!'

And most evil of all the vile gods, that had been servant once, if Filth was to be brought to him before a time could even, had been had. Of anchors, in this world that would be cruel if they were to be brought against the fate of all, that bastardly so, said in pain, and plaintiff of such duality of heads that followed as well after, billions of them that could not be bastardly called forth. Would they had known or could've called the hydra-like heads that followed, two at a time, duality being defined by death, many of them being decayed not only in part but in such stance, as comically as one could see that they had failed, their blasphemies being but in part of theirs and of their done for, dark palace veins, in many of the held-in gables, and the ones whose most inclined to be buried in, during the burial of many broken stars that had been had before they could even touch mad plains in store of bodied tombs that floated on, ever so nearly touched by them and the many defiled heads of the deformed state that followed after. A dais, and a daze. Much to them remains:

'Listen here, mighty ones that hide in the dark but cannot talk to me, or else a fatless thing might take out of me what I cannot feel without the ferality of my true animal nature coming out.

I, lord of Warts whom had been filled, alongside the servants whom the niggers are lynchedly drawn towards would seek no tender countenance as to fill my heart with blasphemies that would be torn by day or by night or least of all convey what went through such darkened night that came before and long after. I seek not your compassion but such solace as for the viscititude to be adjourned by this unscrupulous fate that's been given onto me to hold onto.

My palm may be split in half yet I carry part of it in head and wont. But I shall not for my likes alone pretend to understand what's happened to me, during day and home, when, taken to, I am become part of the cone, of gelatin hardened embrace, though I remain a desolate creature, cut, but half of face, I shall do what I may in that regard and I shall find a way in, and through the shrouds, will I have gotten through. Cut them into spoils and hang the niggers and the kikes in whichever way I might see as being true, to such regard, as these mongrellic abominations are to be curbed of life, and lynched after. Burn and filled with pus and strung aghast, for I shall cast all of them in might, lust as one would feed himself with wild arousal by the darkness that's to follow after the greater stove in which they will have been melted, much more so dissected by fire. A most admirable thing that I will find myself finishing after and know that only then, by time alone when I will have been done, will I accept solace. Granted as such, bold stung, not asylum, but taken by force as to prove to myself, of mighty worth as I am a man.

Tenderly as there is, such as would I take, embrace, I call upon and onto you, of right alone, grant me one. And such a way, through lain and pain, and farther-farther as I will have found a way, there, in pipe-dark where he had crawled, and such, I'll follow. But belong to none after, for my cowl, though formed in march, during which I wilt it, enslaved as such:'

Though he had not said it, he pointed much farther and yet closer away, this and yonder and there he was, darker still, darkest of this day:

His skull stood tall yet deformed by waxed globes that made the many eye-like pearls of old but eyed and died with many appendages that refused to die but were filled, themselves with many peculiar humanoids, all tall but spread away, but bearing, out their own limbs, but swerving, darker puddle-hardened strange drills that were but angled upwardly and looked mightily ill, and were deformed as well and wore, ship-like sails yet deformations that were connected to their faces and their heads and their bodies, there, none of them around the great cranium's peculiarly dark and deepened sockets, deeper than that, one would've seen canons or been inside tunnels himself, fifty hundred seventy seven miles in each and they were emptily wrought and darker still, as if they were mega-cavernoids of themselves in which not even the people that were inside dared crawl in or about, since they feared what might come after, if such was such, as dark as would they heard the embrace of lovers trapped in, and cursed, were there billions of spirits but all fake. Since they were only dead copies, clones, all chained spectrally but mourning each of their own, since they were headed like devices, working still with coagulating things that were part of their super-cognition, being trumped only by the tidbit dimension in which they lived in part. In which they started talking to the unnaturally hard to look at holds of trapped in people with empty headed rows of dark commands made out of super-guns that pointed from one side of the dimension to the other, being elongated and filled with billions upon billions of more super guns that were only made to kill the dark-flying nigger-shaped seagulls and other dark skinned minorities that flew about and attempted to leap from one dark dimension to another, being incapable of controlling themselves, since they had spics for brains and were incapable of refraining themselves from committing more than fifty percent of the violent crimes in the United Flying Sea-gull States, despite making an insignificant minority of their population, yet being promoted by the rat-Jew-kikes that were attempting and still to this day, to somehow brainwash the white people of whose superior race was beyond the likes and the limits of possible imagination, therefore the kikes being extremely afraid and threatened by the WHITE POWER SUPERIORITY, they promoted miscegenation in order to destroy their homogeneity and dilute their pure racial stock. Well enough this dark megalomaniac skull-cranium thing had billions of elongated power spikes coming out of their heads, all pointing at the sky like uberspears that were all connected by, the most incessantly hard to look at power-filled with muscle tendons that had not only adorned these power-syringes that were filled with strange fluoride boil fluids that could castrate anyone in sight with drill surges of slug-like beings that would be, manifestly wished into existence as to shoot dark disc-platters with eye-like destruction surges of megalith bodies that were all attached to one another- forming strange lagging, sluggishly, in a most lavish manner, way of destroying the darkened days that were formed in dark bubbles of gelatin-people that were and had been given birth out of the body of Nak, whom had not only wished them away, but found himself cherishing the long-days of reminiscence in which this dark-conundrum that was hopelessness was being lost to all of humanity's dark ages that were a part of the Quantum Magic-filled with power strangling grip that still infested them. That was only his crown, that was only attached to him in part, whereas, the two sides of his eyes, being very much so two giant elephant ears-lobed blimp-like transparent things, although it seemed that way, to have come out of the empty sockets, they in turn rested a few meters away by elongated tube-things that were aligned like the most incessantly hard to stare at rodded knobbed, leathery condom-transparent ropes, but were akin to feathers stuck in never-ending floating away loops out of which they could not escape out of. Which also bore the most unnaturally, hard to look at activators of partially tormented, dark fighters that were stuck in un-death, these corpses being only part of the never-ending battle that would destroy the world, in the darkest days to come, out of which they could never get away from. Spiritless, as they were tormented, it only seemed queerly so. The body of this Parasitical thing, this morbid creature was akin to a great tongue coming from below the skull, but entering a small shell that had seed long growths below it, out of which many eely things now only came out of but had two great-fetus like beings coming from both sides and shooting in both directions, one being headed, and the head was like a pin head's pulled on the top mask-like cloth that was being stretched and attached to the side of the seed, whose lower body was fat-like a bulb-covered in warts belly that had a giant overly grown but turned or fashioned in a newspaper's most irrationally defunct and defiled belly-funnel in which the dark children without faces lived in. And they were tall and elongated and their heads were bacteria-like and filled with eyes and mouthless as they were, it seemed like they wore their faces outside their bodies and these strange features were only tinier parasites of their own, hiding in, whereas they would be very much so incapable of turning away from the dark mass that was become the last fragment of humanity's giant planet' Oblong thing, that was in turn, only the Head-of Earth mold-heart part of with many out of the back of its head, strange tendon ruffled with dark spherical spears that had billions of bull-children attached to them, many of them spreading disease out of their deformed bodies, until the very point of being incapable of touching anything else that was being added to themselves, since the lower parts of humanity that was part, or had become, on the side. Being very much so, a lump of many pipes and destroyed streets that were put together in the most innocuous manner, destroyed everything. On the other side of it, a hellish vortex moved in tandem with his dark sight, that turned every facet that came into contact with him into the most disgustingly deformed thing; bringing this very world to brinks of becoming a hell where the servants of filthy would simply breed with one another, giving life to such cacophonies of hopelessness as the likes of which no one could even hope to deal with in concordance to the evil, malignant hearts that were given life, into, sufficient as it were to say, slice. And splatter as to mock the one who was after him.

'He will never catch me if I will it so and by the time I am gone, the world shall be mine.'

It was already decided, In the worst possible manner.

Below them, the deployment of the Great eight armies whose robust bodies were made to begin walking again, since they were legless after all; a few more hundreds of them floating with termite-launcher and generators that could turn air into solid fluorescent powder-power that was immediately used, while also being shoved inside their great launchers, as to prepare for the on-coming siege.

A ball-sphere top of an inverted milk bottle device with four great iron legs adorning it by the side and many mechanical faces and machines that were being part of the great thing that was humanity's most disfigured blotched spear-like chodes of wriggling birthers began giving birth, slowly that is, to the greatest soldiers humanity's ever seen during the likes of an age in which ale served as a repertoire of many long-lost ill sounds that could never be taken back, abashed even by the likes of their own, there came the swollen, most disgusting of peon-people who wore a dark power-armor of dug-trenches and petty cadavers adorning his long-horned chests, the two of them being overlapped by an old Japanese man's face that was not only transparent, but was also vintage-VHS-painted black and white, but he was smiling and was acting awkward, yet it wasn't a projection.

A most peculiar man appeared, by the name of Cackle-Bone Sentry.

'Sentry, you've arrived just in time to see the fireworks start again, I think you're going to enjoy this.'

'What is there to enjoy of this broken world when all its people left half of it in shambles, then threw away their only chance to bear one closer to a knit?'

'But my dear man, you couldn't be absolutely stiller on this issue than you are now, for I know for a secretly kept fact that the construction of the new world, its long-awaited inception is truly on its malicious way.'

He had broken his back onto one of the lower ceiling-sets after all; no earlier than a few days ago.

His back was still there. IT hadn't moved an inch from the initial spot it landed in. But it was much worse than that, since it tried crawling out the inch-by-inch left behind stone-depression made of shards, the crack-pissed through, crater-like, a few meters to the right and there you'd see a barrel lodged, him and Trunk, standing by each other's sides as they realized how, close it had been just then, with it flying out of socket, engulfed in a voracious flame that spread around, cradles of eyes trailing their way, intersected whereas their lower-sides cried, akin to the Eighteen seventy four's Fall of the Century Globe Durge-Day, the streets that surrounded the bore-through after-side, a 'suppository' of all dark clouds put together during one of the wide-spread of parasite; that stood by their side, in Mortem standing they began chanting with the darkest of people that clouded the judgment of the vile days that pushed through and the niggardly doings that had drawn after, much to likes impeded after the coming of a most tumorous pus, there came the womb of Mongol, bloated, eerily so, during such a time where one could but forget, for a moment that was alive, when both men, being met by this nigger sight, of disgusting nigger-lack-of light, and blighted nigger eyes that would follow through, one could but forget what a vision of earthly things but looked, and stranger buildings, all contorted in sinew, and bone-like but with cradled demon-figures standing on top of them, all equipped with most engulfing things, many wings and appendages that followed stings, which flew around them, much to the vision of this city cast against sombrous veins of vorated waves as to be covered thus, during and not soon after, when, the man whose decadency was only rivaled by his predecessor, an ancestor by the name John Trunk, whom had escaped the butcher, whose mark violated skin, branded as one would have him since, and therefore, standing near they were drawn inside the barrel filled with acid guns that shot them in their heads, immediately taking their fingers and their eyes ahead which were ceilings, that could only see when someone threw rocks at them; during, strange existence, as there was, water-bloated venom-poison being put in cups filled with hearts in which they lived for a while, that attached themselves to the barrel, that was put in a twin-train-trail formation of weird segments that were all godly and strange, but uglily deformed like nigger-Quails, the beings of destruction, Luciferain distractions, diseases and tests being administered by their side, part of the Nurse was a whole building but she was a giant with knives coming out of her mouth and out of her belly as well as hoses that were big and filled with unnaturally dark eyed-wings, that were constantly Holocausted by Nigger-like in-human creatures, whose incisor hoses, stranded out of their mouths in the building's floor's shores in which they lived but were prayed upon by unnatural artificial beings that imitated their motions of chucking spears, in which they lived, the spears that is, the niggers, also, being lynched by the motion of being flung back and forth from one machine to the other, but the land was worn and it looked bizarre, since most importantly, all the walls were normal and the apartments were flat, although the nurse had little care since she had no eye sockets and no legs, slowly, with her, being levitated out, and through, before, a giant shell made out of strange elongated people that granted years of life, projected as dead people that would slowly take the mind of those they were bestowed upon, whom had served as a guide for both of them, masks of evil adorning him with large scum-people towers, that were mainly just elongated fat humanoid cylinders they were being drank out of by ugly cats without spineless, disturbances that appeared to have completely engulfed the land in a most hard to look at swarm of blue and orange, reddish gloomily set lights of powders, days of Nigger-kill, and Holocaustic tendencies of laziness at work, morbidly blinding them from the evils of the world. Slowly, this all having happened yesterday, they both realized that they were equipped with guns and were in a helicopter and a cat, speaking through cans to the cliffs. But the cliffs were painted with ugly faces that had cut-in halves oblong ellipse-like eyes, only on one side of the face, growths of four vision-organs of the other, a mouthed eighty five, respectively fifty five, eight, and even ten degree rotated C's for mouths, and other slits and slashes in the ground for noses and for wrinkles, no women were around since most had been raped-killed by god-damn-fucking filthy nigger-animals, it's all they know.

A dark wave passed them, a refugary regiment, swarm of battalions, godly embrace, with spikes for eye-guns, coming out of their chests, through which they swam, and with clouds being gun, there were people without legs eight, going out but splatter.

A dark vapid, yet insipid silence came soon after, although no longer would it await disturbed. An unlawful thing followed soon after, that no one wanted to acknowledge either.

Of lesser winds and many destroyed yet prayed upon streets was there a thing to look for:

Knivek stepped in.

He carried the most deformed mountains ever seen in existence, whose destiny was to topple the very world by nothing else other than the very nature of the small, yet fragmenting, bothersome for sight universe, piece that he and others had drummed on top, adding on further sight, a burdensome ill-thing, the speed of a flying beam of steel being, crudely wrapped around a man whose face was melted and become part of it, flung from one side to the other of the dark pair of twin coiling things that held it from falling apart on an immediate notice, being so much so prevented from fully blooming open as if on a dare.

Out of the many barely standing in the Oak-mix, the pools that were near it being extensively engulfed in the strange acidic surface that appeared to be peeling off slowly off it by itself, a reverse summer rain towards the sky from mid-winter, this almost gulf-like area being a spot of meeting between molecular-cadaver bubbles, all dumb-struck by the subtle change in atmosphere that happened, only, as far as it could be observable, no more than a few minutes ago. Strangely so, one could not come to an understanding with what's been happening around him; in the past few moments or during the past few moments he's been struck by the, peculiarly defunct set of information transmitted onto him by means of direct bodily-chemicals exchange that would've otherwise never have come to make such an exchange with him, at the very least not until the poisoning had already taken a kind of fetal-position induction effect on him caused by the intoxication he would be forced to deal with at an unfathomably bizarre interval of wild, barely addendable, numerically so, in rapport to the atmospheric pressure per hindrance volatile influx addition conglomeration of, a giant skull-cranium that was spiked with jewel-eyes that were filled with blood fluid-drowned cat-heads and dogs, dead-hounds, that had been lynched as well, for bloody-power rape, fantasies of rape, lots of them, the dogs were allegedly accused of, mad dogs, mad 'dongs', rape-rape, whose apparent scent was present in the air, vaguely distorted the perception of the general, hardly-a-matter of it being deprived of any objectivity in terms of analysis being put into question, as for the people who were present there, they were dead, and bald, embolded, into the stone beneath the fats, underneath the pillars, of the Lords, of Darkness, underneath it, eventually opened, his chest was, out of which billions of cackling figures being released.

'It's been eleven hundred thousand years since the pot-covered crystal filled with cut-out faces, taken from the dead men then put inside the globule filled cylinder with acid and strange soulless parasites drew breath.'

And the lid on top of it still tried, desperately to break away from grasp and join in.

‘It will, with enough pressure, we’ve set four pills already by his eye, they’re working their way thoroughly through his thick skull. Between the two of us, though. I’d say he’s basically dead within the hour. If not, comatose, at the very least, I’d expect no little from or out of it.’

Carefully he rubbed the area around his colleague's arch, it was bent. Ripped off, even like a cog that's been begging to be taken out for a while now.

And they put a gun-shaped tumor in his other eye as well that made his entire iris bloated-out, close enough-looking like a duck-shaped giant form with little barrels, banded, a Gattling-gun's, pouring streams of solid liquid bolts out of him. Ant-sized star-formations drifted in the pool of seas, the red-departed concubines just showed up in the room, most ceremoniously.

'Is he dead yet?'

A door was slammed, a second one, walked in.

'I am the king of this Bastion, God.'

But he was trapped in a chair as well. The door.

'A nigger, there's a nigger trying to get in through one of the roof-tiles.'

He was titalatingly moving on himself, on top of him, the door. It was, trying to strangle him with its hinges. The nigger was dying, most obtusely, suffocating, bastardly, demonically unorthodox laughter echoes rippling around the small chamber thin-foundation that entered their little soles as a tall corpse with no eyes, whose face, half a small chip-bloated thing, in an arc, a crude thing, whose mouth was shaped like two fat-boots pointing in both directions, whereas the other side of its head was made out of a few hundred appendages. Although the open-slit that was its mouth-hole was more-so akin, much-closer to it.

The other thing behind it was a giant cylinder cigar shaped mannequin-headed with an open chattering Nut-Cracker toyish expression on its face, with a lid on top its skull, and four great pegs of wood-like standing, but coming out of it, in a formation, like two put-together but malignant deformed distorted harps. The segment was strange, as its body was actually a thinner cylinder with a pseudo-band wrapped around, in the same way a scarf would, pinned around it, holding the upper, much wider set- with teeth protruding out almost flat- from the side, face, but pseudo-rounded altogether, whose top lid, despite being close enough, in similarity to a sewage gate, that was only superficial since the actual top, almost hat-like put together, well, actual lid was pentagon-wrought in form attached to the head, as if it was been planted by intrusive surgery. Out of its left ear, a strange cylindrical pint-came out of it, whereas the second one, whose position or exact location was much lower was attached to the 'collar' band-scarf beneath it, and the third one, which so happened to be the widest, coming out of its chest, was kind of like a plank, although all of them, together, when seen from the side, upwardly, with the fiend being below, would look like pseudo plane-wings put on a strange incline, as, whereas, even with the barb-string, they'd be taken for, or the entire segment would be taken for a wet-clothes drier, a traditional one. Below it, a giant elongated two-segmented leg, its sight, whose giant foot was split in half, a Cain's jaw-bone blade sprouting from one side, but with its teeth pointing inwardly, at the area it was split from, as if the heel had been bashed into crippleness. The other area had two 'legs', or appendages, befitting for its form, one being a pseudo mantis claw- talon blade-but with a rounded footless empty cylinder, empty bat-end, beating against a giant pseudo-elephant tumor-spruce- cysted-with warts boulder, that was being hit against as if it were an anvil, by the other appendage. Together, seen, from the top, as they were kept on a weird angle above the ground, like two actual legs, belonging to a humanoid-person, who was performing a kegel exercise, the boulder being the only thing even remotely touching the ground beneath it, 'bore' an empty air-triangle in the middle, between them. As if, if one were to ignore the frightening fiend's real right leg and take only this into account, the two of them, on the left. His 'right' appendage would make a fine fully stretched spear-arched leg pushing down into the very ground as if the very low angle of a rock being chucked at the ground from somewhere above it, or if it were a chicken's leg with a bulb of meat adorning its end, was solidified in gelatin, as to form a cast. Whereas the other one, the final 'left' appendage had its lower calve, or knee region placed in a ballerina's spin-pose-resting, against the bulk it was placed against. Also, beneath its bloated cigar body that was finely placed at the intersecting, not beneath, as to derive the fact that by any possible means these three legs it bore actually came from beneath it, as if the propulsion gas-shot smoke or fire out of the other, receding end, not receiving end, or the pointy bit, of a rocket being launched, but they came from the sides as if, if he were a man, his two legs would come out of his hips, on a horizontal plane, not vertical. Root-grows came out from beneath him, and they appeared to be warted by boils and other unnatural things that spread in and out, wherever they could get to.

A powdery girth of landed whales, rottenly eaten, of what remained of their remains came hundreds of grubs.

'Walk-eat grains, they are forth placed beneath you.'

'Who are you talking to, master Conasuf Insole?'

'Where to, the proper answer to which, I'd wager, is.'

He pointed at the gritted rafted-stack. He thought of it.

There is yonder a couch made out of people who spoke to me last night about a few other people that were between the ages of eleven hundred seventy five and eight, backwards, on Monday-Thursday, that kind of a basis, whom were not known to them since they were masked like bodyguards trying to kill the rage- as they galloped on feet that weren't theirs, all gathered around in a circle of bubbles that were put inside disc-ed squares in which they lived, their homes being those, with roofs that were their eyes and came out of caterpillar slappers on which they walked backwardly in Heaven, a Haven of roofs with baseballs and basketballs filled-riddled with guns, whereas their counterparts, these angelic figures that were staring at them, being very much so taken from an ancient Primordial Time, before BCE when, and there, before, right among them, walked, dinosaurs with spinning spikes- conical Sixteen for bowels in which they were cradled alongside the many armies of the Chinese Empire, right before the kingdom's fall, therefore, I was made believe, or led under the impression that I was incapable of properly conceiving the very nature of the bat-like pillars coming out of their molded brat-like braces that were shackled alongside their iron-eyes coming out of their backs like locusts out a field, all talking to me in different languages of the time twas before Friday, on a scale of width and length but no Y scale, since we were all flattened during this encounter with them, where the buildings of primordial ages, that were spying on us with lustful eyes of terrors and of rape, revealed onto all of us, during the meeting, unexpectedly forlorn as to call for a more domesticated kind of cattle from our Hunter-Gatherer inherited from them days, in which we've spoken to the alarmingly amassing destroyers of stones, the luscious bothersome rake-pliers with hymn malign, upon the floor that was put inside the ceiling, hidden from some of the men that were around each other, during noon at Tuesday, where their bodies were made into one with singing voices coming out of their sprouting echoing voiceless sonnets, a chimney-harmonica in every one's hands setting the rhythm, hundreds of them being what one could think about in such a darkened age, where Earthen-bold-Hebfast, the Moon, in the Sun, was become a spoiled rotten egg all of the sudden, pointing at them, the strange men, dancing around with their cousin-mirages, there, right there, where the man was pointing, there, no further than there, which was the ceiling, the floor, the building, their bodies, inside of which they had not only spent most of their time trying to pick up on each other's speech patterns but they also found a secret way of divining the dark being standing before them, who was like a one footed strange bird with no eyes but a transparent beak that had an ellipse in the middle out of which a beamed bar came right through the middle, connecting the two sides of its beak, but eyeless still, without an eye, that was out on top of an almost ice-a-cream shaped cranium attached to a water-body, torso with a bubbly clot-blood boil filled with fluid wrapped by leather belts holding the body still, the leg on which it was standing on being a two armed cartilage of muscle with a front see-through drenched womb as well but with a light-bulb nigger-killer with a Z at the end of it kind of flashlight shone on top a felony committing nigger by a law-enforcing cop who's desperately trying to keep the streets safe; although the head was more of a two piece when seen as a part of the body itself, out or down out of which , downwardly came the arm-appendage pointing down, an elongated bubble giant-holding a firefly in it thing, and a water-pouch holding blood inside of it, against its chest rubber, this being the one transmitting them the dates, out of a maligned black-boiled with red warts calendar no man could see since they were all put together inside the ceiling-floor that was their door. Out of the world, though the key was a cylinder with empty skulls bashed-in heads pointing around, wriggling squirmingly-akin to a few wormed things that drew about, then out of fashion put themselves to bleeding Holocaustic-niggers flayed kind of forms that flew around, most bastardly trying to get the attention of purple painted man in blood, the killer of the Slug:

‘Why have you killed him, you pitiful godless thing, culprit, murderer, and maligned thing without a rationale benign?’

‘I did it because of rape.’

‘You bastard, you need to be punished immediately, not. Have your skin be flayed, so?’

‘I am a life.’

‘And soon enough you shall be extinguished in death, then I shall eat your cadaverous remains until nothing will be left to pick up from where you’ve left yourself into, thrust over.’

‘No.’

And the men began to fight, fist after fist, below the chin, the slap, stapler, strike throbbing beneath the waist, a bloody fucking pint-shaped bone fell out of his nigger-throne, where he was wasted with but nigger-crack, his skull was:

‘I declare myself the winner, for your life is now conceit!’

The grinner grinned, with a gun. He shot his entire hill off, then watched him fall. Then shot-shot-shot-shot-shot-shot taken after that, he bled to death as well.

‘We’ve both felt sin and we’re being bled dry, and we’ve felt each other dead-brought down.’

‘I hate niggers.’

‘At the very least I die knowing that we share the same thought in prayer, as we waste away, as we’re rottenly taken out of our way, then made to lay wherever else.

A grave perhaps?’

‘The graved-nigger.’

‘The grave digger.’ Corrected the man, standing on the side of a most atrocious hellish thing, that fell.

‘He’s a maze, not to be touched.’

A bastardly sea of coffins would’ve elicited the same reaction if not, overtly, to a much higher degree, it was irresolute.

Moths

‘It’s been an hour already, hasn’t it?’

‘There’s been no signs of his apparent return either, which would only make one think of the worst as having happened to him. Perhaps the piece of sticks and brambles-sticking out of him we’ve given to the lone spires might’ve had something to do with it, wouldn’t you be of the same opinion now?’

‘I’ve come to think of something in the same veins, but rather. We’ve done something unforgettable haven’t we?’

‘It’s going to be hard trying to bash it out of my active mind but I suppose you’re right. Neither us nor the villagers will, ever so soon forget what we’ve done to the man. It left a mark that’s there to fumigate in ruin and pus, to destroy all there is for touch and spread; to eat through everything along the way, and when they, and they will realize that soon enough, we’ll be taken out and from this world, in a place of broken minds, where memories only belong to those who’ve sullenly swollen their cortexes and put them inside the rocks and stone.’

‘You’re talking as if you’re insane, aren’t you? You’re talking as if you’ve known of it before. Prior to us approaching the painted spot, the dotted en-trail leading to where they’re put in, and arched around the gate-keeper’s hold. Speaking of ill, to objects within that don’t reply to a sing word of command as if you’d have known much better.’

‘But I knew this was going to happen, I knew it very much so, and it was only a matter of time until you reached the same conclusion as I have. Our stay here is unwelcome and will only deteriorate as we wait. Perhaps there’s something even worse than that, if you were to claim your right before them.’

‘And what right might that be, Bassalt-Vask?’

‘The right to ask for a single appendage to be drawn from beneath your chin and beneath your brow, to have something given in return for your service to them, the ones listening to us at this very point in the road.’

Oft little was known and yet they were staring at wild drawings of charcoal laughing at them, as they inflated, from wall to a most mischievous-set of beings that were fat, incredibly fat, clothes being blown from inside out with their wrists stitched as well as their pickets, buttons and every other entry, up to the neck. Even moist-bothered shirts would’ve found themselves but crawling somewhere along in a place of less belonging, holding on some ghoulish golden beings of brass, only to have themselves melted as they drew out from inside out, inflated by pumps of steely hoses covered in basin-gelatin crevices they’d dwell in. There wasn’t any mark or reason:

‘Acts of stray will not be forgiven along the way. Shut your mouth for we’re to enter the grand eight-set of Moths.’

For as the structure opened, one could see but millions of their moth-shaped heads, all atop the ceiling, adorning globes, that desperately began procuring lightlessness:

A weighty pair of crate-attached cradles with giant ship protrusions sprouting, many ill-equipped with deadened crew:

A few ropes had been lowered, as the hangar areas were filled with mighty but ill-to-stare at for too long, elongated cowl-wearers, all whom have gathered upon a road they took from some unknown patch of the country, before told to stop. A few creates filled with fish, barrels brought within their range, the shooting stopped in one direction, a few females as well, no longer bothered by the trails of empty almost reddened ropes that gathered all around, blue felines had their heads smashes with blocky spiky-spindly hammers, and a giant ancient old man, ancient as he were, with a beard fully encompassing him, eyeless but with sockets carved in was sharpening an iron belt against his belly, with an even clearer scope in mind. To see the dark eye that was hiding behind a slit inside one of the walls. They were treated as if they were a war band, in a camp filled with most fine scented cadavers- warted but with elongated spear-shafted lance horns- scarab adorned by hundreds of them, put together like puzzle. But what a lack of concentration, of the most abhorrent of thoughts to have come through at the likes of pettier men whom had gathered around fires that had been unmade, while they only reminisced of the little specks of lost-long-ago ages, first Hominids to have stumbled on their path, to which they were joined but administered not a single thought as how come their existence came to be. Were, they were, most tertiary in terms of ask, not much was spared, no food left over either, but they only took what they considered rightfully to be theirs, an upheaval of the thinly most extraordinary less insightful jests of anger, as they jousting with each other come upon ‘s whenever they felt like it. As to draw as much attention on their atrocious out of modern-alien ways of act, the way in which they had interacted with each other being something that could not easily be dismissed or be laughed at, but something more fallacious and insulting, mockery misunderstood as for their much-desired competition being ingrained into them brought an arbitrarily skewed point of view, lightless as it was, taken from them, once they had been proven worthy enough, to a reason, to be kept inside the moths.

Seeing how there was no possible hope for the Hominids whose vaguely disapproved upon appearance provided a hindrance to either one of them's, or on an occasional glance, as for a stranger- or a passer-by's whose clearly obtuse yet interference into the in-group politics and dynamics they've already started contorting between themselves as to form a pseudo nigger-put on the back side of the bus kind of intermediary towards the clearest example of segregation they've been exposed to, it went over its way as to show a clearly, most distinctly elaborate yet most clumsily observable example of a failure, provided by the actions, although not yet directly seen by the strangers as being out-right violent, at the very least, those acts would be carried along by unseen eyes, but most people simply knew whom the culprits were, as for that being a fact given to itself, signaling that fact that this population of archaic humanoids was rather, insignificantly, yet observably so, a prime fascia example of a colossal failure for them, on their part, them being responsible for their problems, yet their primitive brains, as it does happen or seems to be the case with similarly, intellectually deficient and inferior beings, to integrate along peoples of different ethnic backgrounds, that in turn promoted not only violence but the destruction of just about everything in their path. When not under the vigilant eye of an observant that is, as a façade clearly had to be maintained under all circumstances in order to provide, for as little a working brain, and cognitive power as they had, to be able to do as much damage as they pleased, by any means, and for their own likings, in terms of how they stroke their own fancies, being very much so extremely culpable for their insolent actions, kind of like niggers and kikes.

Whereas walking, stalking, talking, slashing, cracking but a nut-and-lack of punching, slipping off, dousing in and out, ratting others before himself, punching above his weight, then dashing around in the same way a barbwire caught in dove whose remains decayed got him so far, one gardened his exhaustion, one his bastardly creep-defacto, silence to have come but follow, bleeding dryly, empty head but filled with water, shattering but squirrel's gone, his fists but finished, come back to life, psychosis over, dowry-run, as they finally caught up from behind, as each pound trailing off a foot, then no more running, pinned-acute, finally there came the dead-end wall. A dead-end, nothing more, but not too tall; with a crack in it, someone drilled a fifteen inch hole through, through his head. Listening to as to what's gone over for these past few months, during which he's been dead. Scientists and doctors had been baffled from the looks of it. They painted half his pill-shaped head in pink, as an Injun's, then beat him with clogs and iron belts and hammers, all around his body. Still, it was the only chance they had, trying to find out what got him cracking on his feet. What he's seen in there while he was out, out of action. Gausd could only remember being on the flying device on a momentary notice triggered by one of the interviewers inside the room, caused, by accident as well as deceit, which wasn't altogether unexpected during those days, especially since, there was no way to tell a man's true intention by simply staring in his eyes or gazing into his soul, most people being convolutedly soulless, deprave by childhood whose sudden stride into adulthood made it so they were unrecognizable as humans, being raised all wrong, or not at all, 'acting' by simple 'barely' recognizable interactions, on a shallow level, than what ought to be set on a natural incline, on a steep level that communicated more about them, in a way than they ever could, in the manner of which they dressed in, talked in, the cultural references they showed, or might've shown, if they had been raised in a previous generation, to have shown as such, a keen interest in, which, at this point in time, the subtleties, beauty, soliquity and aesthetics were lost on them. They were not dumb, nor slow or unintelligent. These 'people' were not ignorant either of some facts, or belonged to a much different breed, although in some cases, that point could stand on solid ground without facing any kind of disentanglement from reality, whatsoever; yet the cut was made clear enough. To a point where they showed much more interest towards something as queerly insatiable, as to be deemed as being something borderline extraterrestrial that border-lined a worked up hoax, rather than the alternative. Whose existence only proved to be something of a hard-keep to maintain over a long enough period of time without sustained effort; an affront to all, having the indecency of 'procuring', not as a natural thought, but one that's been propagated by others, of claiming it as their own, while also not realizing the calamity of their actions as well as the damage that's already been done, yet remains unmentioned, as for the Jews whose involvement ruined not only their youth but also managed to hinder their ability to properly absorb as well as their ability of critical thought, these nigger-kikes' s' s treason, during their acts of manipulation, control, subversion, so on and so forth, still run rampant as well as unchecked, and unpunished, whereas the people who suffer are usually the white European people of ethnic European descent. And everyone suffers of this Judaic-poison at the end of the day. Gausd saw himself on that flying machine. An almost ship-like bath-tub stretch with a pivoting rack on both sides, shoulder shaped spheres attached to it at the back but still on the sides, holding long cylindrical spines that allowed for the wings to keep the soap-bubbles they were in afloat. Acorn motions or the illusion of them inside the bubbles glowing through the night; pebbles of light-bulbs, with big bloated end-sides, who revealed as much about the world around him, or the one he's been stuck in. A wooden-cabin's axe iron device with many cogs, cords and other attaches cast a great shadow upon the main-stretch of the ship. His quick attempt to still himself resulted into part of his arm being lodged into the nearest of the wooden planks. Quickly ripped apart after, as he freed himself from the wooden shrapnel as well as the many wooden thorns lodged all the way to his shoulder, eerily dispatched, upon doing so, the sight was clear down there, for anyone whom, flying birded things, skulled and horned and many flying humanoids they rode whose clothes were made of iron-rings, attached to their chested-broad but darkened glowing blades. Two great beings, holding upon a candles' just extinguished light by the cold wind of winter's bode, that drove the sight of lime, coming from the bouncing around reflection, that was being projected by the reflection of the iron machine, which served as a prism, by the globed glowing bubbles to their sides and all the way through the crack, through which the line had shone after. Great were they; although they displayed a great resentment towards everyone else that wasn't them. One was bodied by two giant legs that were resting by its side, a terrestrial mammal, but only until the mid-side or the mid-riff where a big bloated thing, body it could not be called, that diverged into a long neck, held a niggerish head two sizes- toppling over the rest of its body. With a human's spine segment cartilage but only the top of it, fifteen meters or a few millimeters if so were it transferred, folded in an origami kind of way, until it appeared to be as chitinous as a plate. Which was attached to what one might think of, when he tries envisioning a bath of molecules or a belly-jelly jar-jam with tape-worms in it, and floating eyes or a partially transparent humanoid whose eely features are kept, or the veins and tendons of a man, his nerves if one were to remove the muscle and bones, staring at a single elongated humanoid torso without appendages, with a neck made out of beaded-together pebble-rock things, with incisor shapes that were saucer-like, but rounded as oblongs, that drew into a head shaped like a horse's bridle- in appearance dark cartilage skull with downward pointing incisors at its end that squirmed around forest-like moving through the bushes, eerily, a predator in nature. A sly fox in search of its prey.

As long as no one said a thing, there was no reason not to question what was real to them and what wasn't, since, throughout his entire life, coiled by thoughts tormenting him of the kills and murders that've been brought as boils returned around his mouth and a prickly finger-tips, when he leaped in place, only to sprain an ankle, in his mind, he still considered it right, this elongated almost tongue-pucker, puffy-chested with tendons filled, plated but armless with some eight-stars, sea-but-kebabs, twisted with serpentine around his brow and chest- hose-filled with insect-beings leprous monkeys-baboons, daringly he met, on horseback, as he rode sparingly over fifteen months in order to get on the other side of the valley where his yet-fatherless child was still met by canoes-of delivered from out in the country 'packages', hearts and livers spoiled as spoils, his hunts, running around in circles, jumping on top the pray, then slashing its mouth open as to hear it talk: 'I am only trying to help you, young one, fatherless as you are, I'm trying to provide you such a tenure as to grow, to out-grow this pain you've proven yourself undeserving of receiving. I am sorry, I cannot claim to know what's going through your mind right now, but killing and torturing, then raping me violently won't make you feel better, nor this animal abuse, in the heart, of the Amazonian Jungle, where you are now, trying to seek the stained razor-sharp cross and the whip of leather with which you shall claim the world, by force of retribute, as much as it's been found out through gossip, the animal kingdom being a culprit in this benevolent quest of yours as to find a reason yet to live, I beck you to stop this madness and return to your homeland where you shall find, as I promise you, the green-violent place of youth in which you've overgrown your stay, but now, you shall be received if you go there. Your father awaits you in his home, although he's changed.'

It was true indeed, his father's head now was the 'jaw'-less skull flat-skull cap of a cranium-dog that looked like a leather pouch worn as a mask, that had dark strained eyes, whereas out of its left one a spear-long rapier-thin black thin-spear came out of, lizard shooting blood out of its eye but formed into a blood-clot then frozen hard. Its right side of the 'face' bore a pseudo giant, fat half-jaw worn with giant, as it two quarters of the actual, in length 'teeth' that were over-spread as if grown mushrooms on top of it, the jaw, which was part of the skull but wasn't placed like a jaw, or half-a-jaw but like an ear, that was also rounded, around the 'tip' of the head area, that was in the shape of a giant bullet's, slug's or rocket's tip, which were being gnawed on by this thing. IT looked exactly as if a dog simply dislocated its jaw trying to eat a giant bullet, while it also had a dagger-shaped growth that was placed, or would've been placed like a dislocated ram's beard, only that it came out the wrong direction and might've been taken for the 'dog's spine or back of the head. What was more peculiar was the fact that the 'jaw', whose position was angled the other way around, as in, the teeth pointed at the ground, as did the jaw'bone', indicating the fact that it might've been a Cain and Abel's attempt to put down the animal, instead of it owning the piece of bone itself. IT was not bullet body but a pile of belly-fat as if, lumped top of a partially melted candle wax growth that came out of a two chitinous sledge shaped body, segmented, below which a few plump viscera breathing organs could be seen, behind which, but covered by a sting-curvature pointing at the back, to an elongation of tendon's, that came out of the breathing humps' pseudo humanoid torso bearing a sausage twisted, fat but with a rosary ruby for a nose, eyeless second head whose sight only came out of its 'eyes', that also signaled the direction in which the 'doghead' looked into, since it could not turn itself, having no actual neck, left it very much exposed to everything else in nature. It bore a rake but curved inwardly, as if it were a half a humanoid rib-cage if lain on a vertical angle while the viewer, or from his point of view, he was an organ, shrimp-like in terms of eeliness, that connected mid-way into the 'wax-bellies' and the chitinous membrane. An exoskeleton's cockroach – worn; his flight was never-ending and quick enough, as he was, there was nothing he couldn't outrun, living that is.

A shrill cry could be heard somewhere, although not there, on the ground level or the general area, since, there were something akin to seventeen or so inner moth-head inside of, plunge-in's, some screws inside the area of recognition, that was shared between every single one of them, systems, for each moth-head, sort of saying, excavating oil-rigs being set- for the few air-tight shut-ins and outs, lowered and raised, oxygen reined tying factors that were set within each ceiling and each of the 'floors', kept in as if inmates on a ship's captain lodge, checked upon for something that would unfamiliarly appear to be too outward for its own sake, that special inmate, or glassy air that could shatter the very body-walls they bore.

The dead man green compact, with mushroom white yolk, covered-coated, basked in it, with a red-head of squirming red worms-its brain cast out and flying, like liquor spat then spread around, on a point where it could not get out of. A, a nice, a loathsome, an incredible, a durable, a, the, a, car-shaped, pucker, adorning, a thing, a crystal, amongst whom, doesn't matter, doesn't make much of a difference, doesn't tell and don't show, a slipperiness to it, a loathsome once again, thrice a kiss- waiting in the takin', the receiver, a man-staring past his brow, pointed at it, then he shouts:

'I've seen you lose a skin before, prior to us joining you, but never to this point where you'd adorn, nor entertain living among us in this way. We've seen no better, yet no worse a place for something of the kin to happen.'

'Then you've not seen enough and you, frankly are to get out on immediate notice, unless I'm to be angered yet again, in which case, I'd drone a single puff to draw you still in death.'

Back chamber, backside of the hangar:

'The house is nicer than I initially expected it to be.'

'Why's that?'

'I think it's the absence of flies, mainly. Those ready meaty things that came out of the grinder. I've grown fond of them, ever since I started seeing them places, I no longer am in need of, you know.'

'You're eaten all up, rotten in place; a gust's about you, in a bowel's run, cast past the cans, you see them?'

'The ones running on the walls? I've seen them before I think; they've been taking them out from wherever they could. Should we pass it?'

'I don't know. Open, I need to see what's past the other side.'

Both of them stepped in, appeared in parted shade, across the other side of the room there being a great horned figure of some twenty or so meters in stature. Both of them unevenly suspected it of not being real:

A pick-like red-stage half a moon- velvet-filled with carpet-fur, with a second wider one having grown beyond it, with a few strange mammal-fat growths, standing as mounds, out of which plane wing growthsprouted waves drove out of. Wriggling-hardly shaking blades appeared to draw out of them, vaguely ringed, from both beneath and inside of, that only appeared to be revealed once they had been forced to resurface out of the mass they had been forced to sink in.

It all seemed too murky, raised, as if lumped waves keep driving out their dug-in trenches. They stopped before they could reassess where the figure had gone to.

‘Shall I remind you of the two seats, perhaps?’

‘I think I’ve had enough of them already.’

‘But not of the one leading the charge during the assault, in their wretched nerve-hold. Somehow they’ve been reached.’

‘I don’t want to know.’

‘This one is interesting, though.’

A fuzzy thing of no less stature that anyone would find it not only irresolute but rather uncomfortable being surrounded by so many an obscure an object that at a point in this savage ‘rampaging’ about as to find a clue whether or not there was still any distinguishable life around this place, as to discern the lifelessness that was being bored through irrefutable, uncannily plain-to-see objects whose preponderance, being met face to face by a group of barely, infallibly built on sight remorseless airless bags of throne-put savers of ignominy, had adjunctly faded or was put to such a resonance whose alarmist stature would render it to be improbable to belong to any cause at all, being a claimant disapprovingly, yet modern, insoluble disavowal of stagnancy, since the moths puffs whom had shown signs of being capable of breeding with one another in or perhaps during the most, profusely incontestably succinct, as for the manner of the conditions they were forced to endure being or belonging to the, rather hardest-to endure, harshest of environs, that would be befitting as to please their solvent desire as to be met by some resistance, if any, against which or whom, their apparent ‘on-set’ of skills would be finely tested in accordance to their own derived system of honor they have and still continue to adhere to, like stomping nigger heads.

Silence:

‘Silence!’

It broke off when one of the soldiers started eating, his jaw dislodged behind him, betokened in the form of a giant tri-formed pair. Three jaws sprouted, elongated then adorned by many incisors come from the anchor’s stretch, behind perilous depressions where the steam came out, there.

‘I can feel it, the heat, I see a sea in it; but don’t get nearer to it. Something wrong might happen, call it a hunch, but I don’t find it safe for either of us nearing its proximity’s clench to get nearer to. IT could swallow us both and when it does.’

‘Silence yourself, foolish trunk, you’ve felt your way through it and now you’re armed with every single one of our men’s arms. You’ve mistaken me for a tool of yearn-reprieve for far too long for me to remain silence now. And I claim what’s rightfully mine for I’ve yet to meet someone as spry as I am.’

‘Mournful standing, but you’re mutated. How can there be an understanding between the two of us if I were to listen to you from this point on?’

‘There needs not be one, clench your teeth and ensure they’ll be put somewhere, Harrison, or else they’ll eat them as well. You know they adorned their crowns with those things and still you keep showing them off.’

‘I can’t help it, I can’t. I’ve been in this recliner for far too long to hope for lee disablement flee away. With this, I am capable of flight.’

His lodged legs still wheeled but jointed in the back. They sprung like elongated three-segmented insect-things that dragged alongside him, as he refused to have a drink. Absinthe, absinthe, how well it would’ve made him feel; to drown one’s sorrow and refuse to peel, whatever they could see in ion-steel. It was insufficient to hope they could somehow pull him back from out his throne as they started glowing with airless wonder. Stronger after, hours, the canter was only his for a time, stricken by each knuckle as his fingers had become a Benedict’s crown. Marched with him came the few patched up beings whom brought along, upon their backs, then showed what little they had in mind.

‘Bottles, they’re all washed up, not that I would hope there was something else in them, but at the very least, I could’ve done with the mark.’

‘Silence, silence, it’s to pass.’

There was no sign of anyone listening, nor would there be for a long enough period of time.

A few meters down the line, a bodily warm nest housed a few hundred people or so, most vaporous a thing that followed in each other’s path being verily readied themselves to leap forward as to be sent on a path out of which not even the most tremendous of hilarities could be maintained on a frame of enough tape-long but clearly measured by a fractionally different a system than that of our own, there being no emotion distorted from any of the things that had largely come to pass when one of the many house-moths started growing out of their own heads, for what appeared to be a long enough, much awaited- even to the point of being prophesized process filled with attenuations of such contorted concentrations of angles that, wheround one were to look he would see the beads that, once put together, in their permanent position, embolded in such captivating ways of never being capable of understanding what went through them, that, upon reaching the finality of their form, there would be indistinguishableness from the lordly maliciously-repelling iron-cords whose enrapture was but the tip of the iceberg in terms of the great trophies that were being hunted by the great Adorner of stones, of war’s obliquities, uncouth, whose presence never met the apparel that was wished for, as to be discussed whenever one cast first stone, if must or if there ever was a reason to reach him, Lavash Bonecart, rightful owner of the Country of Illeans, as well as the Patron-Sage of the Moths, subservient to the second brother, Lavish Bonecart, bringer of great approval from the great council of cocoons that still wreathed and cast all away during the darkest clouds apparel in the drawing of the ends, when, and during the storms that had drawn themselves out by the hilts of the hurricanes that were carried on out by the distant, insufficiently recalled by, for some reason or another, then, and yet again, down-cast, Citadel-filled coast of the Mediterranean Beast’s corpse, this colossal giant whom had only lived miles away, and miles at large away from the hangar, whose insolent spirit had connected their tranquil minds to that of the network of the eaten but dreaded servitors of the malign, could not recall what happened to come next, during the point of interest, after having survived through the greatest wave of annihilation nature itself could ever throw at them, by means of laceration and disgust, when thrust away and allowed to continue on a path of no return since they've out-grown their shells well beyond, having formed towering wriggling spore-like buds of much-beaded yet aligned dandelions that were all connected, beating blearily against each other's stalks as to attempt to make more space or create some disjointed conflict between one another, never and very much incapable of controlling their insatiable desire to stop and propagate the catch-up the men yearned for, below them, still staring at them as if they were placed in Indian-tents, wonderingly smoking pipes as their smoke-clouds would only deal, here and there, with the ones that disappeared, incapable, as they were, hard of hearing, shooting in the range or doing errands while another storm was on its way, then cast away some swords they had, as well as it could be had; news having encompassed their almost elatedly empty minds, during the day both Pastors of the moths had headed down right here themselves, as to announce what was going on – 'The great beast is on its way, although the Costal-region managed to unite the states together in order for a final battle to erupt, a final push as well as an attempt to claim its life, I fear that we are met by something much worse, something that could border sanity's end if that's what we must call it, forth, will it come, the solid specter of it, bearing its husk, like a levitating cannibalized upon by savages-filled with human-maggots, angel, but cracked in half, looking like a boat inside, no meat but they're eating, even now, nothing but shrapnel and wooden pieces, since they're unaware of the fact that their own pain serves as a bass-relief for the mourning that's to come, as when it happens, they'll be seen as the prophets that will be encouraged, to be worshipped, listened to, yet admired, and you want to know why? Because that beast is without eyes and limbs, but there are billions of mechanical limbs, all-alike with faces, men's and other creatures, all capable of extending and encompassing the world in a second, as they would form a murky sea, a globe formed of Belial. I've seen it in my vision and yet I've been aware.' He said onto them, capable of recalling all events. It dreaded the exit, this bomb, this biologically rotten thing that hid in wood and moved as well, whenever it was cold; heat would force it to lay proper. That's the main reason behind the Meds having surrounded it with torches and everything else they could come up with after. But they were incapable of fully destroying it, since this creature's power far exceeded that of the most dreadful, strongest and yet insolent of all, of sin and of gelatin, whatever else it was, this would be senseless and it would be fleshy, as well as one could see it. As it passed, the giant, the giant, above, but farther than the likes of the village where they, the other side, the other side, where there stood Lomek and Shiel, but never approached were they. IT was too dangerous, far too dangerous to continue on this path of quietness as well as the malign, the others would not understand what this meant. But even the beast knew not to approach the other one, whose head was stone and hardened still. A giant, unfathomably tall, he was part of the land and was but communicating with a distinct ledge, like a giant stone-step or floor, only the size of a canyon, like a block of steel but rounded around the edges, an oblong with a giant tooth coming out its edge, rounded-squirminly like a toothy thing, made of some mushy-borough, made of stone, some incessantly dark metal but shiny, at time it even appeared to be made of homes. OR glassy-steel and the homes could be seen in, illusions of people made inside, but if one thing was certain about this patch of land, that was clearly unconnected to everything else, on second sight, it was busy, busying itself entertaining the giant, this stone crag of a mountain, this defiled-unnatural thing of stone, this tiki-totem giant stone-hedge statue, busy, playing coy as to pretend not being heard. Repeating every single thing twice, every syllable in disgust, flashing white-like marble and changing color immediately after, whereas, next to them, the machines. They appeared as if they took the rest of the land by force. All painted red and tall, all aligned like battle-ship cruiser's flat platforms on top of which planes would land on top of, then land aside, then set themselves in flight again. Painlessly as for the endeavors that followed soon after. A hierarchy of bones meant that there was no reason to seek someone to pull everything from the ground without facing the consequences of laying beneath it for too long; neither machine dared send their flight of drones, beneath the earth's home, beneath this dome, where they corpses were well-above the quaintness held by many men. Farther down below, in the distance:

The various echoes that had been driven forth by the giant's strode in fathomless tumble upon his dislodged, out of his putrid rotten-yolk smelly ankles had finally perished as he was no longer contorted or trapped, or encased inside the many torrents of spools he had been enwrapped, when finally he was met by the altar. No longer capable of turning around as if to set himself in some kind of flight; to which they greeted him, his sickened face. The giant-pink skulled, fleshy one that floated like a specter out a tent; tall-bodied ribbed but almost like a great bell, armed by many roots as well, but oozing with fluorescence while the other stooped as well. A worming yellow tipped shaft, like that of an arrow came out of a skull-habitat. It only bore the sockets as it squirmed but rested, around this hollow well, whose top was just extended. Standing very much extant, the many shaped wildly thrown here, there and wildly, wily-nilly, yet around, it opened its canines and drew, finally upon the dark sinew, as to revel in its chilly breath. A virulent thing stood no further than it, plain-as to see upon the arches, a great oozing with pores and lavished in the mushroom-puffy spores, a wingless bird, whose only beak remained as well. Legless but from what one could tell, levitating with the rest of them, in this place of deep-abyss. Where they chanted during the lack of peace; they were crude and cruel, but welcomed the saint. The one that came out of the well, only a thin-ruddy woo-bamboo, almost like a stick, fleshy, but at its end, a light-bulb shaped head, that oozed with light, of fire-new. That was their sun, and bringer of light, as it approached. Not a single one of the parasites that were adorned there stooped any longer, as they started leaving the site, cruel as it was, as to allow their continuation, not a single one of these wretched did anything to stop them, during flight. This was their spot of reckoning, farther than the dead-growth, whose wild adorned, shiny spots, thrown around, and therefore cast, left close to nothing as to be endowed. Silence was yet to come around.

But the rotten giant continued watching them, closely-so, and not for a second more did he lose his concentration, nor would he attempt to do something that would conjure the least amount of hopelessness, as if of woe.

His brain-case was of a great enough circumstance as to house inside of it, at the very least, eight hundred or so people of various size differences, adding up to, at the very least, if they were to go ahead and build a city of their own, some kind of varied commune or a great stretch of miles going both up, down and in the surrounding areas, as the brain matter as well as the mass which had been hybridized inside the giant's noggin were become the floor and the ceiling, most dreadful of antlers being used as racks for the caved-in pieces that were being loaded inside the attrition defiled deformed machine-men that were being created in order to prevent any kind of insurgency, as it could be seen, by the clear eye of 'day', although some artificial light made them revel in the chaos of twists, the hedges and the reveal of primitive structures that had been left behind by some of their compatriots whom belonged to previous generations yet had only allowed for some 'gifts' to follow through, with lightning-cord smoke purple-purple plume-Cajun-pop tarts pink with yellow and red and mold dots on them coming out of completely-over-and-beyond-their-breaking-point tart-makers and over-charged atoms that somehow ran on batteries but also had plugs as well, for some reason, supplying them with some kind of means of gobbling down the nutrition, which was a disgusting malevolent yellow-paste their throats could not hope to endear the burn of since it was made out of scalped Indians, whom had been put inside, stored, rather, in large cylindrical coffin units, inside refrigerator units as well as some repurposed butcher's shop's freezing units, highly industrial, industrious-workers coming up with all kinds of fancy ways of storing everything they could despite them living in tall ziggurat-like at the base but held up high like strange tower-greenish bone citadels, whose, at large, appearance was highly distorted by the looked of it and appeared to form some strange many faceted by pieces that moved as if they were carpets with rods attached to one another's, not to mention that for some reason they kept changing in size, as if they were water-balloons still attached to the clearly-left running water-tap, yet pricked at the bottom so as to fluctuate in size by means of addition and subtraction, controlled, rather, by strange intervals of Neon-light flashes of flares that were constantly being thrown from inside of them, were contained there, but were easily revealed as easily as one could snap his fingers as being there from outside since the intensity went over and beyond anything that could even be remotely, by mere chance, indispensable of recurrent thoughts, as to hide away from it by means of misjudging these 'incidents' as some kind of assaults, or some violent upheaval a stranger might deem it as being, which, added to the fact that every livid plate, to that alone that might be added the fact that they all bore humanoid faces at times or were completely human, hairy, insect-like, filled with appendages, with outlandish spikes, drawn-in, bearing cords that attached themselves like grappling-hooks shot against the ziggurat frames in order to grab them in but disappearing soon after when looked upon again; appeared to have a will of its own, whereas the only thing that was even less somber as to be liked was the strange tall being standing near one of the doors, one of the many, thousands upon thousands upon thousands of doors, fake doors, leading to all the wrong places but in-worn aside, bearings of no signs that would otherwise point one in the right direction, since there was no such thing and one could never understand why all the paths, all the stairways lead to the same way, this perniciously disgusting downward pointed niggardish maze-like basement where most if not all of the most unnaturally-to beheld stasis-apparatuses kept a hold of the root-like power generators, which were in the tens, planted wily-nilly, on various checker boarded areas, on walls, in some mutated beings whose bodies were filled with elongatedly thin romboscously-fleshy teal-flashy oozing-with power, whose faces were two-jackal-like skulls put together but without the eye sockets and whose in-between bore a cube-like zone of gelatin in which a strange face with almond but move curved eyes appeared to distract from the fact that there was no nose but a mouth that was a few pistons, three and three, whereas in the middle there stood a single hole, out of which it blew bubbles come out –out of being fed with soap, standing on a single elephant-foot that was lodged inside the side of the floor, armless but in possession of two great wings that appeared to be partially rounded around its frame like some curtain, dark, it were and hairy, like some dark-skinned ugly baboon whose strange appearance left one strikingly intimidated by naught else other than this great bulk' as if moth-like, a puff, that was his chest, in which one of the generators that helped with the Indian incubations was ledged inside of, courtesy but not in the least, to the great Sack-Round OP. – A man, as simple as one could see, who was trapped one day inside this enormous head, incapable of finding a way out, stuck with a Indian tribe he had made the best out of, since, otherwise said, they were mainly a useless bunch, they had been a waste on mankind that had been rectified soon enough by nothing else other than the power of will displayed by a few men. Their kind had intermixed with nigger-chimpanzees, that, they themselves had been forcefully inbred to a point where their ugly-deformations of features had withdrawn themselves to such an exempt that the specimens in questions had been irrecognisable, not that there was much of a difference prior to estimations of humanity, as to even consider it as thus, as the species of niggers had never been anything even as close to being a human as anyone would like to know or take it into consideration.

‘We’ve found one, sir, a ginger-root signal somewhere alongside the north-eastern border. He’s communicated with us and is in need of an extraction.’

They were in a dark room and both of their faces shone red. Features molded into the rounded mass, giving the illusion of them constantly melting or falling apart like some steam or wax, that only added to their ugliness as multiple eyes appeared every now and there, all capable of sight.

Large spears of red and pure-abyss came out of their faces, spreading across the liquid-oxygen fluid filled room. They ‘swam’ by walking, from one corner to the other. Once they turned around from one another, trying to absorb the information they had just received, they began walking in circles, processing. Leaving trails of bubbles and of humanoid casts, jelly left behind after being ‘molested’ or done for by similar means, while others started caving in. A mechanical blue-door opened, though still unseen. A man completely armored with hundreds of arms coming out of its helmet, then back into his chest, swimming in a loop, all iron but plastic fingers melted upon being drilled back into the hole that garroted his foil-and crest:

‘Sickle- Newport, a visitor has just arrived. He is currently resting in the foyer, trying to work one of the junk-machines back to life. Trying to get something out of it, thinking he’s going to be the first one, the first lucky man in the last century to scam it open; forcing it unlocked, unaware of there being a rapier-aligned cluster of grenades on the other side of it.’

‘Let me him entertain himself for the time being. I don’t see how he could do any harm while knowing what he’s toying with irksomely now.’

Everything was uneven, highly unlikely to protrude out of the strange commuter beneath the junk-junk. It was a matter of time until he cracked the beast open in front of all of their eyes, or worse, he triggered it. Slowly moving panel-roofs but planted with the most intrusive if not all, worsened by the pressure that was filling the glass-bile, had they realized it yet, they died. It was only a matter of time until the wrong piece, the wrong pull, the juke-box made a spark, and the whole foyer was clumsily ridden with fleas and yet the spice of dust, and grins and ever-been, told to die.

Desperately needing that well-requested by him in advance, upon the fleeting eels of a rotation’s well-night rotation of a few messaged already delivered through the post’s office’s past-and well thought-through then shot, with the aid of the few amalgamations that had happened, then and there-around, with everything that’s been happening for so long and over such a long period of time that he almost forgot himself again, the reason behind it was forgotten somewhere along the way by a simplistic yet reproachable reason that no man could’ve found ill-convenient, or at the very least, the lashed of a leash beating him over and over again in pain, because he forgot, and memory’s gone in flight’s emergence brought by hunger of forget, every second’s pas then, lost in the past, since his brain molecules had been switched to alloys, metals and conveniently allowed no second more to start again, since, there was a very good reason for it, as was thought, since, alarmingly unfounded, the man threw a fit in the cave-cavern he had been thrown inside of it, there-along and therefore singing, notwithstanding such an emergence of petty-metallic insect sounds that made him blush, made him wince, experiencing things he’s never felt before, nor since, they laughed at him, the giant petty-dark sooth-skinned men, niggarrish, kikish, prudish with each slap alongside his temples, unable to endear yet recognize what was happening to him in that and during the moment his flounder of bats, of skinned burning bats, of skinned dogs and the other animals he had turned in beaten down blocks of meat that were not organic, then soon revealed, artificial at play, specifically designed to mess with in instead of doing the other thing, allowing him to realize that there was no good way of understanding how he's gotten there, or why he's done it, beaten on top of his head by paddles of wood, yet broken immediately during this strange, alienation-drivel driven drivel, driven forth, driven around, he had no car, by confusion ghastly as such was the nature of the ones that were trying to drag him back into that hole they've come out of, the grovel, since one could see, or if he could see, inside his head, a block of iron-things-of-alloy made to puzzle-fit with pieces struck back and forth, then run-around-the-mill of the wind-mill's run-around it, horseshoes left behind once the horses realized it was not worth it, running for their master's bet, now run, he did, upon this blaster sight, a crude brain of iron, with every dendrite, every neuron, every cell's atom fully replaced, and left for moving around and shooting, although pointlessly, without a break, useless, as no memory could be recorded, yet instead, the entirety of existence started flashing like a sped-through forwarded tape, which yielded no result, instead and since there was no reason to advance, this retarded being, which else could not be called or referred to, was forced to suffer as the basked into this world where the trees, the palms, the balms, the geodes, the crags and the crisp, burnt-basins, the pools and the wretched gelatin-teal, as was the sky, as if molded in some abstract painting with faces and people, not flat but raised like bumps that receded into depressions as if they were filled-with-air-lungs that were pushed in and out, and back into safety's warmth while they followed around, him as they'd see and they saw no worth, nor reason to properly deal or take care of this, dark-damp filled, in the brain-scum, teal, beaten, forced, then, to leap around, like a bull-frog in his confusion scared, driven away by the maliciously-echoed and clearly aimed at him cackle-tattle-tail, that was swung at him, sickened dogs come out of the fray, and burn in faces – tribalistic, all laughing at him, gone ballistic, as wars and rockets shot in front of his eyes, giant guns, termite dens and given and flashy psychedelic swings and swung and sausages-filled with large, strange creatures hiding inside, battling one another, then flashing in giant wide-spreading explosions that would soon enough be well forgotten or passed for rotten, New Year's Eve's rocket show and plenty of dark snow and plenty of the evil cones, come out of the moving spheres, reddened-glowing with crimson-blood-clot with iron bell-like extensions being lowered by strange chains against which large elongated arm-like contortions that stretched into the sky added to what appeared to be millions of them, completely obscuring everything, with eyes popping out, then other features, as they were revealed to be, the Enclave of their disappearing sights, and sighted was he, upon the swings and branches that were lowered after that, brought by angelic figures that were twisted upon connected structures akin to stalactites connected to stalagmites, wingless, but beating jaw-like aligned with beads, left and right, forming strange contortions, although not real jaws, eerily gummed and even incisor filled with curved-like worms that stung and swung and filled each other with even more mass, taken out of the surrounding areas they had been dug out of the cemetery of, until their disappearance, fully noted, was a result of ever-glow-spread, some flashiness-blinding with the most inexcusable of the ordeals ever being propagated upon the side river-reveries, which was curved upon an upward-thrust, concave area that lend onto the belief that everything was trapped inside a most notoriously disgusting wax-filled with parts of the most unnatural upheaval –order, they had yet to comment upon, this world that was very much alive, and real, the world he lived in, not being birth of but allowed to look into once one could not register anything with his mind, nor there'd be proof he even saw those things and not merely resumed his behavioral-driven learned behaviors that made him act that way, to convey the most unnatural things that drove the fluorescent escape from the maddening fall of the great stone, they, eyeless and tall and made out of some bizarre stone that grew strange, on their sides, since they were placed upon some twenty square feet, then eleven hundred thousand miles in height, blocks with four sided-pushed on outwardly protruding, almost spear-like slug-shell formations, the blocks being put on top of some rounded oblong-popping like boils out of a cylinder pushed on as they reeled back and forth out of that strange unnatural, deep-elongated formation that drew back into the ground, in the strange depression like mole-like stretch that went on for hundreds upon hundreds of miles until no longer was there any chance to discern whether or not they were adornment pieces for the sculptures themselves, or, instead were merely some worm-like creatures that dwelled even deeper than that, since they were rigged and gigged, wriggled and filled with cluster-like formations, yet, mid-way through a single body could be seen, which only revealed their true nature, that of many hydra-like heads that were all attached to a single melodious pair of-cluster growths as well, a pear or an apple-shaped box-like filament main organ-like a Gatling gun of barrel-growths they flaccidly receded back into, as they left behind an empty cylinder filled with many holes, although one that didn't affect, since the frame was conveniently sturdy enough to deal with it as well as with everything else that was being pointed in and out, the weight, turning their departure into nothing other than some inconvenience of the kind or an unaesthetic deprave- maligned contortion of lest-dealt-with, one would forget that they needed to come out of air, therefore, blocking their access would meant total annihilation for these wormish heads; although one could not simply ignore the strangely, sailor-like figures put on top those disgustingly endowed pedestals, shattered and cracked by flints of lightning bolts and such deformations withdrawn and held, then pushed forth would leave nothing else to be erected out of the strange blocks of stone they stood on top of. What made these strange worm-hydraesque 'necks' stand out specifically was the smoothness of their tip-like puffy pink as if filled with hairs or pores, at the end of which, tinier bulk-puffy heads drew out of, forming spore-like but only in a superficial way of looking at them, then observing kind of way, over a prolonged period of time until the realization came, the vision having solidified in, then realizing that they were hard, chiseled, hardened, despite the roundness of an almost finger tip, but which was seen as a forest upon a close-up. The various ridges were far much closer to chitin-shards, which could also be seen, albeit in terms of a variance of size, there being a grander concavity to it, as if this sheltered thing was much closer to being put inside some 'time-capsule' of the kind instead of being seen or used in any other way, which seemed to hold most of the organs in the lower side, unseen-to-the-common-eye side of the being, which at first stopped in a perfectly rounded bottom of a cylinder, hence why the actual hole-filled cylinder at the top displayed a pseudo-coincidental kindred-quality similar to its. But, one key difference was a simple hose that constantly pumped back and forth as if some sort of mass-exchange was being shared between these two. Two as in, they appeared to be two different species conjoined, or a parasite. Or, perhaps this was the true cognition-organ bearing creature instead. The hose connected to a turnip-shape organ with a few mechanical things attached at the top, an iron band being wrapped around as if it were the plumbing system's back-view of some water-tap, which drew in a giant conical but downward pointing hive-like, largely exposed, greenish-orange, fleshy looking, almost like a balloon-but filled with a few-pea-like growths that stuck out, clearly forming most of its mass, fat carrot, especially with the turnip-like growth whose outward other-pushed-out growths lend onto the impression of them being the leaves; tipped at its end, like a wasp-stinger but closer to some tusk, whitish in color; or some fleshy turkey-stuffer tool; or some disgustingly filled with many naked females body bag, that even wriggled around. Yet, between the turnip organ and this mass bearer, there stood an almost straight aimed-forth, almost clearly aligned as to be akin to a line 'bar' that held a rounded potato-giant-head-like mass with a giant disgustingly molded nose, twice the size of its head, in which both-eyes diverged into, being compounded and empty as well as it constantly dripped, as if it were wax, where, out of its mouth, out came a strange wide-flat organ, which was closer in appearance to a man's clearly extended tongue that bore a razor which had been welded in afterwards, then peeled off, piece by piece, meat by cracked, as if hit afterwards, metal shattered, where, a few long black 'hairs' but at thick as balloons –fleshy tubes with pointy tips that were all placed in the middle, resting on top of the shattered razor alongside the other fleshy things, growths as such, that adorned what had remained of the 'tongue'. Like a cuckoo coming out of a hive instead of a clock.

Despite the strange yet clearly enormous garlic-like bag inside another one in which it kept, constantly spilling inside of at such a level that there would be no possible way to understand where one ended and where one began in the same way two, stacked on top of one another, but one whose clearly drainage system had been punched in, that being the one above the former, clear-water running tap water holding frame whose running water falls through the visibly made-in crack through which the liquids would mix in such a way that trying to figure them out would very much so be impossible, rendering them nigh if not completely indistinguishable from one another, to the point where it would be falsely understandable, therefore not, as to why it acted this way, where the dirt became the sky as well as the other depressed creatures and most importantly what happened to the entirety of space and matter which had become this strange bubble in which every swam and mixed with and in it, like a pool of ooze ever-spreading in every direction, being carried along, yet, for some reason, although the explanation for this strange pepper-bodies by bulbs creature being flung back and forth made sense, since it was not caused by the wind after all, instead, going down, heading down there for a few, absolutely never-ending hundreds of consecutive miles at the very least, many of the 'bricked' by scales open holes as well as the raised structures that depended on one another for their support since they were like or were equipped with some pseudo long-sticked 'arms' that grabbed and held, and added to one another's clearly fragmented, yet yielded to be alike and akin to some raised castle of cards, fleshier instead and forming pyramidical cones, raised rectangular hold as well as other figures of towering things that had suddenly sprouted, dumb-founded as to swing back and forth, then darted out of sight by simply flinging, flinching, the curling of the toes and fingers that attached and held tightly, interlocked around each bar, inside of which tinier living-taloned almost pill-sized entities lived inside of, flinging each other back and forth, along the trails of an intravenous system of circular- organic as if strung inside and aligned through the insides of a bone-system of ringed ziggurats that left enough space for these flung by the liquid as if they were, thrust or else, blood cells, back and forth, then returned again.

Mindlessly he yearned, released:

'Should we allow him to finally crack down and die?'

'Don't be such a bore, since you know he brought it onto himself to begin with. There's no one else to blame but him!'

There was no imperative.

So much so that the wretched head of a thousand skull-like protrusions made out of the most incontestable of the verily put together conflagrations of mandibles that rose from the depths of the eve, as they only grabbed one another's bodily deformed strode-forth maligned crevices in which swam, their lords begotten now, their children wrung and stung in every side of their vaporous hole, all the way down until a single being drew breath, in wrong-doing:

‘I’ve seen him, down there, in one of the wind-traps of leaves, in which they’ve basked in autumn’s rose no farther day than it had been conveyed before the fall-apart of trees that neared. I seek no restitution to my lost in trace ion-of diseases spot, I seek no glory be forgotten now, but follow me, dearly beloved brother, that I may hold with you, on a reasonable period of time we both could share within one another’s grasps, and tenderly embraced and most forgiving as they would enteach us of what oft be done with them, during the time of evil’s come villainous peril’s done onto the brow of the life that they may, may indeed forgive our treacherousness when kindly done for and such unkindness as I would have one now, as for the arrow I have used to make you bleed on the prior eve of solstice, that I still carry on me, from this point on, when night’s come to ravel in the scum of plot and moonlight gone, in peril-hiding before the curtains of melodious dream, the one that fallow would rescind, I seek thee come with me still, to that pointy rook where mighty shook the giant in his death, during which I can only count upon you now!’

‘Bastard, kill yourself!’

‘Lest it be said otherwise, not a single man will survive, not a single soul allowed to walk still unvanquished by all meager beads of strength-allow, to have their skulls crumble-shattered come onto the brow of the moon’s falchion where our people shall sing us glory and charge still upon the plains of quiet’s eve! To have our glory besmirched would mean destruction’s come onto the brows of thieves but only scrape, as much entangled dark remains would serve no less than such mischievous and yet adorned upon the crowd’s barrel, of fair to say and scorn of power. That we may bring their corpses yet today!’

A glorious obelisk upon a mount, on top of which the altar’s three eyes and dream-catcher like rotund scorned head, the skull that’s entered, now’s come onto the bed of many bones this flat valley had been filled with. A junk-yard of many battles, of darkly wrought alloy, but many others whom were pirates; ships and cargos left to rot. But not a single conquered man alive. Mourning rampart on glory days, when the fells of the wind’s slander brought a quail of many smokes that lay, ever in the distance swaying, back and forth and ever laying, but oft a single soul in sight.

A man came drafted with a decayed tumor-thing on his back:

‘I’ve come to bring you news, magister!’

‘Then bring them onto me as lay.’

There still some beaucraut’s unnerved dismay; for he had brought many notes with him abhorrent.’

‘You’ve been disjointed ever since, were you not?’

But he could not recall the day since one eye winked, as eerily as there would be a kind of swollen-ever since postulated-wretchedly decay, moreover sought:

Each of the single eye in particular belonged to a different face, as did all those three-things, that had been stolen past the day, then put together, shell-clay of glue; disregarding the four closed ones behind, whom, each belonged to a god unbound but swollen in place. Darker, cruder than the three humanoid eyes in the front, they lay.

‘A secret thing, I see you yearn. But I will not have it disclosed just yet, trustfully secretive and quaintly attentive as you’ve been of lately, much-observed over the course of years, loyal-subject Slith-a-find, carefully as you may be, we’re standing on a pit of sand.’

One of the eyes wretched itself-flung to its left side. A few hard-machines of alloy-bone stood erect out of the pile. They stood out quite distinctively, as in comparison, there were hundreds upon hundreds of night-plane fields where nobody ever rose. This was a first, he thought. But neither him nor the young office-deliverer jolted either way but stung.

‘Absurd.’

Outrageous yet prudent in attention, quaintly displayed in terms of loft of wonderment, muse of such alignment as withdrawn from hardly there had been a shell, in which bedridden gallantry abhor, would there be a man alike to deliver such news of hardly there will be after, nastily withdrawn from what had once been a mighty bore.

‘I seek restitution for that eye! It’s communicated something to me, rightfully now!’

‘We are all damned the rest of the spoils of day to come onto the lands that lay beneath us where we may heed the last remnants of there ever having there been a land to begin with!’

Reminder of an eye; eyes of a set:

There were three eyes up-front and four in the back. Each belonged to beads of eyes, five each, now four, since they went missing:

Floating in some locked up-box that bore eighteen hundred facets or some:

Vanguards of cysted crystal, running around; could be seen from miles by the looks of which, not a single vigilant eye would face such scum-betokened after-thought.

Someone was walking across the room, warded by the foot-pad, with a few people around him, following in line, with their eyes popping out into tiny flying fire-flies of cotton that followed him. All were leashed within a moment from a sprouting whiff of darkish flails that drew out, as if drilled out of the back of his head, immediately wrapping themselves around both the flies and the people, as if they were leashed, as if they had no other option but to follow in his path, as if uncannily deformed then worthlessly strewn aside; cranky.

‘I’ve seen you both over there, standing for a while now, yet I’m introduced to neither one of you, why?’

‘They’re intruders, intra-cortical ones!’

‘Summers, a lot of them, spent with Velasquez. I think I’ve adorned my drink with dips of chocolate cones and sprinkled vets of iron beds, sprints spent trying to run around his house like some dog, like some child whose parents never talk to him, I sulk not on those imitable times but soak in wonder. Bath is warm.’

‘Who are you supposed to be in that case, stranger?’

‘A man without a name, who had been stolen from his parents as a patent sold, I am now.’

‘A slaver, but who is the savior?’

Salvaged from broken moons!

An eight by eight standing next to an eight by eight of empty space; making the front of the room; middle region, a few feet away, a long bridge a quarter of both leading to a cubical almost on a ramp, inclined elevator-like worming stairway wedged into it, and hanging with its ‘head’ against the wall, almost like a cut off by an axe standing yet to fall trunk of a tree, a curvature to it, as well, since below and around the bridge there was nothing but a deep-fall pit-like abyss. Like an escalator leading to a turned over itself booth, whereas in the back, where they stood, inside this pentagonal-faceted but oblongish an encircled region; which was connected to the linoleum-covered rectangle leading to the fall by a few interconnected but clearly front-thrust hallway-like tunnels that were connected do it. To their right, a stretch of a few hundred meters lead to a strange room that was held by chains alongside a ship-like formation it was welded against; although the chains were at large hidden away from sight and obscured, as they held everything from falling apart as well as their clock-work like machinations which ensured that all ought to fall in place would never come to be seen by the naked eye of the people engaged-and placed around every corner of the room. Part of the wall was encompassed by this ship which was mainly kept like some exhibit inside some museum, adding more to the girth of the room but looked as if it was in a room of its own or at the very least a platform that was connected to the room itself than the other way around, there being only one, since the ceiling, on its side couldn’t be seen because of the darkness that cast away the dark shadows that were murdering in place every if not all sights. Part of its wood-work was made into the flooring. Although the curve and the angle made it difficult for one to climb into it; whereas, in the front, or to the left, if come through the long stretch, there lay the an almost slight depression of fifteen centimeters or so, of a denivelation that was connected to a curving to the left, road-like, highway other-lane kind of strangely lowered down by the chains entry-way elongation of a lobby that had its windows completely shut off by metal bars that obscured the dark, yet, unseen to most naked eye would point, at the end of the curvature directly at the very same bridge leading to the elevator or the dark-like pit formation. A trap-door-raised apartment –room of a hundred fifty six meters was entered inside of by the lobby-elongation, although completely sealed, from sight, since one could somewhat see it from the distance if they were placed on the bridge as to form a direct sighting towards it; yet it was invisible to the naked eye for some reason. And it seemed like it also kept rotating entirely, at a peculiarly slow rate, yet once entered inside of, there was no discernable alteration of motion entering or forcing a man’s body to adhere to the forced of; as to be completely forced to act in such a manner that they could not control themselves afterwards or fall through, fall over and fall to death of injury’s embrace. Inside it, there was a bluish-reddish orange-kind of light that revealed ever-changing patterns of sad-tragedy-like managerial faces, bodies, prudish beings that danced like imps and flew around, chasing shadows only to be caught ever-since and yet endear. As many of the levitating slight-off the floor, only a few centimeters off it all bore guillotine like blades on both the opposite ends of, flying and well in opposite direction, in a matter of speaking balloons, that had cord-thick wires entering their arms and bodies and cutting through them completely only to suture them back together like puppets. Sometimes they formed giants or were sutured together in the hundreds. Charging one another whenever pleasing them. A large dome in the middle of the room, flat below, on top of a doubloon lid that was placed on top of two glowing spheres which held various put-together long-sharp and mantis-like but fat like humanoid arms-but not humanoid, superficial in appearance, appendages that kept rubbing the spherical objects which worked the inner machinations of the room while the holes, which were maw-like open-mouth air-vent entry-like and were also grouped as three, two, one, four, fight, alongside only the left and the right side and near the walls, always near the walls, opening and closing at peculiar intervals, never in synch; kept producing some bizarre gas that hit some of the most peculiar nerve-like regions that entered the puffy-fat lumps that appeared to be formed every now and then in the air. Every tiled-facet of the floor was nigh-marble like, and had only slightly raised bar-like rims around every nerve-ending protruding out of tile inside of which the apparitions were being kept inside of. To the near end of the room lay, on the right side but slightly in front of one of the mouths, a thin wall-like machine form with a clearly delineated top-coated in some rubbing metal-eely like substance that kept moving in place, but began glowing red, revealing finger-like motions rubbing cackles of teeth and gums that expanded and disappeared in place, dispensing some of the irresolute screamers trapped inside of it. This 'wall' bore a few working panels and a tiny generator to its right, or its left if just entered through the curving road inside the room, with the right side from the entry-way revealing an almost canoe-compact fridge elongation machine pig-feeding pen filled with some rubbing, cloistered ruffian shaking junk-filled pieces that started forming only to fall back in place soon after. Attached to it, a few tubes and wires, capacitors and an intercom that spoke unheard; one side of this 'wall' fed the other. A pig-feeding broth rectangular or one intended for a hen, elongated metallic bath-like formation; as squeamish as it seemed to be fully-filled with some skin-oil that pushed in and out, whenever applauding. Only the metallic blades and the general illusion of a guillotine-formation appeared to allow one to distinguish the false ones from the real ones, since their faces were mainly distorted and hidden-numb. A second passed. Out of the ground appeared a fleshy bud; a pink fleshy bud that grew, it started spewing off liquid, then stopped once it formed a stained around it. Growing and spreading slowly until finally, it became an unnatural face-like growth, pinkish-beyond reason, hairless, giant open eyes; constantly socketed by compounded bubbles that formed two tower-like formations but bearing light-house like, near their ends, glowing bulbs that appeared while descending through the fleshy air; which just as constantly dissipated and reappeared on an unpredictable whim; disappearing and appearing every few minutes or so; whereas its teeth were animal-vertebras that swam inside its open-black mouth muddy-swamp oil; of a liquefied gum-pool; that had past-people formed homunculi mongoloid-headed deformed inbred stillborn spools being spat out, then allowed to spread as treads that crawled and squirmed towards the open-entries the widened mouth allowed the drawing near of and to. A giant rotten arm-standing legless, socketless, eyeless, and near-faceless man kept moving into circles towards one of the generators that created dark-spinning puffy formations of warmth he could not see but was constantly drawn towards.

A man arrived in the room by chance.

'Allow me entry!'

But no answer had been received, instead he was deprived of his humanity as he was sent a single shivering little rotten pup he was forced to stomp the head of. An ugly little disgusting thing he could not face the sight of, a parasite within the lure, of much allure and despotitude he felt a rancor towards the very pail that had been given to him anyway.

‘There’s a parasite when I need one!’

‘Don, you were here all along, I’ve been searching, hearer of news! But not a single word has swooned.’

‘Not since boat approaching! There!’

The eves were done anyway. A leveled off ground floor with hundreds of room, that one would only have to be indoctrinated to abhor, even for a second more! A giant dead bird, bodied like a chicken with wings wide-spread, a long single thin rope-line of a neck bearing spiraling tendons coming from its chest, then entering its elongated humanoid skull-helmet, a beak-like shoehorn stretch bearing a convex wall, with tinier faces, that of men inside every few meters or so; spreading the fumes as it inhaled from the bowels of the gourd; It was then that they realized that the floor was unending.

‘Appease the dark apparition, or we shall be doomed to death instead!’

‘But shall I contemplate no more this bastardly attrition, or should I wait?’

‘No more!’

‘I have a hairy coat; made of fox don’t say!’

‘Don’t tell who?’

‘No one!’

‘All right, Don. It’s safe to know; but never crack it!’

Desperation was quickly forgotten.

‘My sons, George, Matthias, Corhas, Box-prattle, Scoop, criminals misunderstood by the great four totems standing upon us to this day, though wretched they art, I will, for theirs is an evil ancient withheld from the bowels of the earth and the great morsel flung in the sky, whose moon rounding upon its sight, broken as it’s been chewed upon, it would withdrawn the many maws soon after, and reconcile with the ones that worshipped it, halted. The work ahead for them is somber, a disaster never-wonted!’

‘I am the devil, father, I am the devil, look at what they’ve done to me! They’ve butchered me beyond belief, they’ve done things to me that such reprieve would find close to be the incontinence’s defeat!’

Maimed across his body, maims fading. Wounds and scars that one could not believe unless he saw them close enough; a giant one didn’t heal. It looked as if someone tore up a great piece of his chest with the blow of a grinder, splintered in half he were. Out of him a giant strange enough beam of a stalk came out of, meaty but iron-chiseled like, with rodent teeth at an end, holding a pseudo head on top of which a boulderish growth grew on top of. With a few hair-like, giant in likens, appendages that wriggles around. An eggplant shape almost beneath it, the head was. But the ‘teeth’ were artificial plates, chitinous and merely held like some swollen lantern that did not shone upon the road he walked ahead. And his face was much deformed; spoke in tongues.

‘You’re my son as you’ll ever be, no matter how deformed you’ll have gotten from this point, onto that tree. Where you’ll hang for now!’

But he did not suffocate, but lynched forever, never dead.

It was merely something of a fraction of a second's snap, but it didn't happen as he planned. The bough would fall but not mere-him. Much to his likens, immortality was but a whim.

'Box-prattle, you cannot die!'

'I'm but likens to be imprisoned here.'

'There, there. We shall lay under the shade and make this spot our house.'

Therefore, they all lived beneath the bough, for fifty years, feeding on his hairs they ate with much glory, there-again!'

'I am forlorn, there's a dark cloud there no more, but here and titter, thence fore-spoken ever since!'

'Bidden I a lord to come.'

But the letters he had sent were long forlorn even before he could endure the coming of another storm that would surf the refuge ever-cast, and ghastly ever after, fast! Aghast they were then, when a colossal tail with many thrust, come from inside many opened cells that revealed little beings all connected through some inner nail-shaped sheepish wool-covered in protrusions that connected them together and allowed partial extension from the body of the tail. Like wranglers they were cast away, swinging back and forth as they picked up some to munch and feast on the animals that were around them. Yere! Hereafter what was come; a few Fordyce-helmeted men appeared bearing a greater tail than hav'd; although of grapes, cotton and of other flamboyant spherical rectangles, which held, beneath them, large whipped-upon spreads that, caustic-wonder, bathed them in some perilous bubbling veal of electrical ponder that had cast away, from each body, each reign and each of the lesser, greater, taller youth, the ones that held the brazier-like torches higher came apart as soon as they could besmirch a hoot. Such had they been forced of plains, to add as long as they could, atop, which had been verge long embraced, their remains, each body being chucked inside, each dead-likened and lied aside; more so, into the pile. No soul could obfuscate whatever pardon might yet incline!'

'Let them into the groove, as yearned for. The sole tree has swept itself away from the forest, of grains and of loath; as it endures no less than it've had provoked!'

'We cannot stop each charge bewaking!'

'Whom?'

They bade his still.

He pointed again towards the ill-found large Marquis without feet or hands, nor head proper on his tongue's wreathing felt-intent barely abhorred but solace of no bear; they drove in like beasts alongside it!

One of the letters whose eyes were withdrawn out of the cowl of many put together, almost welded into the very eerily distraught confines of the room had left an eerily deformed sound ever-so protruding coming out of the barely fashioned symbol that had been lodged into one of the chains made by the Partisans killed inside the house, heads' taxidermist put in chains held by two distant fish-mouthed by men, mutant-living creatures that spat iron whips every now and then, dangling the heads, two on a wall, two on another, so on and so forth, two on each other, hitting, scraping, bleeding their likes as they continued their disturbing abode in a most unfashionable manner that had brought in a rapier of ever-counted upon slither and tatter; when the man of the house arrived!

‘A guest in my house at this late an hour? But who could it be and whom would I have the pleasure of endearing an approach? Whom to count as one of ours when the time is come yet none approach?’

There was uncertainty in his voice, and naught else to have been counted, when only little there was of little else, perched to water’s river draught. An intruder, of course!

‘You are no guest of mine? Make yourself be known, revel in your come to be reveal for I shall slay you upon the sight! And such and such shall it be written down, perched for what’s been killed and draught, filled with thine making, filled with blood, to little more than wanted for I shall only spew what tinsel robbed!’

Of what he had he’d count it all! When the time came anyway, as to search at the back of the house, the front, the sides, every corner, especially the broom closet where he had found only some feathers of no flock than needed or that would’ve made such an apparition withdrawn to flames, spread upon remains, the house walled itself as he wailed.

‘You will not claim the intruder before I!’

The master of the house yelled to the speaking bricks, inside of which, grenades still stayed their wits. Not to pop on command, for he’d be killed, as well as the man as well as the house, in a pandemonium-driven suicide. Suffice to stay a while more. Not a single bore through such perdition as were papers thrown around, not to make too long a while, empty sound just yet! But there was something that didn’t fit, or made as senseless to be it! But what, what exactly could it be? When did that loathsome intruder come and drive inside? Through empty-bathed tried for, cry, as little as there’d be, benigned; no reason to forget or ask, not as much and better wretch, and lop-inside!

‘I?’

‘You, I think it’s the two of you, actually!’

‘Come again?’

A few months passed. There was no man standing in the ground any longer, not that it would matter whether or not they could actually breathe out loud since they were still attached to some machines of stone that allowed tiny particles of clouds to enter their brains, pumping oxygen directly into their veins, which had become as thick as hoses, hardened to a point where they could not be touched any longer, properly at an imparting from them.

‘You’re mocking us no longer!’

‘Aren’t we? But you’re sitting there and we are not. We’re much higher than wont, much to be still had!’

‘I think you’re to die within the century, whereas we shall live forever in the grace of our chosen gods, the stones we have picked up, the mush and the trenches we have tumbled open and forced life to sprout out of; in form of oily clad, bloated and distraught, faceless, but ever-growing, eyeless but therefore knowing, claspers that would endure through all, and would have us delivered to a place much purer than any that had been endured by the likes of you during the pandemonium of stars!’

‘Petty servants, such they are, but I remain of a likens that could not be brought not therefore haughty as I’m wrought, shall beckon you listen while there’s still some sense in you. A new reckoning shalt be rummaged through your holy lands. And these humanoids come from the one blocky pool of human-shapes shall eat you alongside everything that’s here, titter lain much farther, never through the wind and storm and thunder!

They will eat all that falls beneath their hands, and they shall devour everything that falls onto their loathsome teeth, rotten-upon beds, they’ll make out of your cartilage bones!’

‘But the stones, the stones cannot be shattered and we, we cannot be crippled’!

Another man joined in:

‘You are thus called as nothing but a liar, out of which, from this point on, as poignant as it may be had, you are determined not to be trusted from no point on, nor will you be had for consciences shall dictate the wiser!’

They didn’t expect to be assaulted within the hour either. Wild beast, the human leaped and started cracking wrists on stone-fists they shattered with no bleeding in sight. And many of the ‘immortal’ crudities were killed upon immediately a stare and grown; until one of them pulled a strange gun-device, shooting the human dead. Whereas some of the wenches already startled by the noise started dancing around him, spitting in such a way that they liquefied the remains, which had become a floor. With the same facial features retained; still speaking; no soul could understand it. But they kept wincing and praying that the likens of the bold things would curb its agony during the suffering that prevailed!

A brick started pulsating with the living gelatine grenades wouldn’t spread to grow; the reign forestalled.

‘Leo Hoggish, and Yria Sun; you’re both incapable of hearing me now, but I need to ask something of you, blind and swollen, noiseless as the chitin that’s encompassed your bodies, I see. You’re still in possession of many ancient guns that be!’

Both of them conjoined to a moon-shaped device they fed as if it was their child. Almost fleshy, coloured, giving the impression of there being something alive in it; outlines of men appearing and disappearing just as soon but giving no direction, or at least, no more than it was needed to find their way to the Parasite that wanted to suck on their veins, bleeding them dry, then granting them death. It was alarming, waiting.

‘Who spoke?’

‘Grand-father, Yria, our grand-father spoke to us today; his benevolence only bringing his grandness to such prevail as one would have it still forgotten, lend onto us by chance.

Deformed gods

Okhvussncentey was written on a metal band attached to its 'throat'. The first segment of its body was as peculiar as a giant wide-spread open pincer-shape thing, thinner on the lower side, whereas the upper side was much thicker, bloated and as fat as a blimp, and wide enough to allow the growth of a third one, smaller pincer-like segment that bore a strange cartilage key shaped, with many form-like clasps coming out of it. The upper-pincer bore two hanging almost womb-like boils, and a third giant, or colossal body-bag fat arm with a 'punching' bag hanging on its lower end – appendage that grew and deflated as well. Although the lower pincer was more of a giant ram-aligned blade; the neck being a transparent giant veil floating around this body; to which, whereas this diving pincer-mass of bodily functions and organs was kept floating in the air, surrounded by transparent unnatural things, four great 'shoulder' organs were attached on four sides that looked like giant humanoid chests with their shoulders as well but without their heads or going down below the waistline – formations whose right arms, as they were connected to the 'curtain' by them, were akin to an upwardly pointing saxophone-cartilage thing, attached to great bulbic growths bearing elongated neck-like human with the lower side of their heads or jaws, toppling one another like stacked-on-top-of-one-another stones- formations. The main curtain bulk looked like a gelatin mass, deformedly so, bearing an almost two dimensional man's gums with snooze coming off the top of his mouth. Whereas the 'growths', off its sides looked like deformed camels with their heads being tumor-filled balloons, sprouting shade-on-top their heads projecting, inverted mantis-blades, as to point towards the jelly curtain. Or backward neck-snapped flamingos; a veyanb amanos having intertwined with its proper functioning, since many of the sacrificed men from around the place were only, eerily standing there, while also watching it improperly; moving from one side of the other being difficult for, since it could not bifurcate reason from the walls of blobs that followed it around. An immediate shot was administered to its outer, more flaccid layer, that in itself was falling apart just as they watched, and waned in place. Armored stranglers, such as them could not stress it harder than it was, putting an accent on their words:

'Ne Lurlo beligue vefn, zol-lerc Ozra melvgy yne ludrgv.'

'We're not here just yet, please step in line.'

Its pulmonary track was already out, drawing them in and out of what they were doing in place, being very much incapable to distinguish from what they were doing, since not a single symptom was shown, outwardly, as to track down the steps implanted in the cartridge-munching beings that came around into place. They were puffing in and out, thrusting in place at the same time, only steps away from where the other thing had fallen. It was a sea of dark that followed plenty of unnaturally haunting things that drew up out of the ground, showing off only the darkest of dream-like distortions that started carving trees when approached.

Although the front-piece was off, so was the house.

'You may choose to enter it on against your better judgment if that pleases you.'

With which the voice cracked down, and with it, the manor fell down, a few feet beneath the ground, unmoving, incapable of drawing back and forth, trying itself out.

‘It draws some light from the nearby candles, always devouring pieces of them when most unneeded; to ask, otherwise would be to out ill’s contempt. What shall we do then?’

‘There’s something wrong with the ceiling, is there not?’

‘I’ve not noticed it yet, but it seems likely, what.’

It stopped talking, the weird oblong that rested between the head of the soldier and his mounted-in turret. As soon as it could move again, they sat down to rest again, trying to find out where the other piece of the ground had crawled towards. A side-long glance emanating from the side of the rafters, and many of the already present men, whom were there, all open mouthed as to reveal the machines inside them only now queerly stood, entranced. Many of them far too deformed for worship, as they only drew each breath aside:

‘Listen to us, you’re all under immediate danger, you must leave as soon as you can, the premise and what’s been dwelling beneath the earth’s ground-floor, inside of it and plenty through, plenty more like us are there. We’ve been trying to get out of there, but we’ve failed.’

‘Failed you must’ve but what does that mean for us in turn?’

‘It means that you’ll be trapped as well if you remain for long and that we cannot help you with, we cannot move ourselves from where we stand.’

‘Allow us leave as to take you with us, as proof that we were here after a bunch, trailed upon the ground as we have left it there, a man awaits us by the side of a door that stand inclined upon the dark abyss the pit, that is, the last reminiscent of what’s it been, to be called, escape.’

‘There’s no way out any longer, sir.’

Both soldiers turned, Michael Trunk- Gas only opened his mouth for a moment before it started oozing again. It split as if cut from all sides, many of the deepened in-struck down, molded arms only coming out when needed, as they only began to torturously rotate when the last one, the arm that was chained shot out of the split oblong, landing by the side-stride, where a few more petty men gathered as well, the ones in turn, the ones that mourned themselves no longer for they’ve yet to be sacrificed in order to bring some other beings out of their guise.

But the appendage was thrown back from where it came out of.

Four surgical tables put together as to form a great box, attached by many plank-bones and elongated shards that came out of the body of a pea-body staunch-growth with a little tail-bone pointing down, attached to a great, forward placed triangular-bloated body with hill-top square tipped cliff-formations coming out of it, bearing a bubbly-soft region in the front. Motorcycle-thin as well, or the body of a flat-on-both sides shelled slug. The strange squared mushroom coffin it carried on the top was also blessed with a beam growth that came out of it at times that drew forward once fully stretched as bothersomly awkward as a one branched tree whose one dark twist was a face. An awkward semi boot-cut on two sides carrying it along; there were many like them, similar, but some were not. Most peculiar ones were those that bore round conical-shaped tectonically filled with stone-shape formations coming out their 'heads', whereas their rooted beams were more like men standing on their backs as well. But all of them gathered around Okhvussncentey in order to attain a boil.

Servant of sleepless heaps, whom drawn upon the nasty beasts, found itself standing near one of them in charge, most admonishingly corroded by. A most fruitious little hive-like ball of put-together rat-king flies, all of whom were putrid to their most inner-corded, painted dye in which they swam inside of, yet at times, incapable as they were to do as they tried, they only listened to the sound of waves, many of whom were outwardly heaving out themselves, the hive was theirs; for there was no water- only corpse-like creatures whom used themselves as shells.

A giant bulging spherical torn apart great depressed from one point to another, from the start point to the end of being connected with all of the growths sprouting from it at the same time with power-cord-like inflated at the top funnel-like push-throughs, one of them bearing the giant, barely visible from where it stood, but as one would approach it, bulbic tendon-growth shot-through a tunnel-formation, a few mouths descending through one another's made-through little holes; as if they've already gravitated through one another put-together bodies. An upper-sided dark cliff; all of it dragged in it while contained in two hundred eighteen billion side-by-side kempt but split in halves; most disgustingly, they sang of a place far away.

The strange platform was in space, stuck; alone, eerily drifting most romboscuously decayed. A few most peculiar life-forms could be seen standing on it, on this elongated, fifteen by eighteen by fifty five and fifteen million meter wide, grated in corrugated small plate-filled with small bumps deformity sticking out of the lower oblong-oid beneath it, that were its lower bowels, the left of which bore a giant torpedo-shaped but with a power-clenched jaw formation of gritted teeth, interlocked in the front, with a lower standing chin protruding beneath the ivory-twisted 'blades' it thrust forward. Opposite to it, to the wall-like barrack filled body that appeared to be the side of a building-like entrance but more depressed – formation, or slightly closer to the missile- submarine like demonical appendage rested a giant drill-like but pointing at it, cartilage- almost insectoid limb that kept wriggling squirmingly-so. But the strange almost building segment was stranger, for, front, as in the direction this entire platform bearing thing drifted to, bore, less so, in a most vapid way, the cocoon shaped-sharpened at their tips stalagmite-teeth protrusion, this rack of 'pincers' in the making putrid-puckery cadavers that sang inside of them as if hidden, lever more-so entombed, to the great head whose neck but no farther than a man's upper jaw was it shaped, with two compounded eyes on both sides of it, leading to a strange fat-thing at the top that bore the elongated chest of a man, with two puerile arms that were infantile and flaccidly drooping, bladed, that bore, the great upward heaving head, a mountain or volcano growth, talon-winged like shaped, almost, like a great Pterodactyl's limbed cast, with a hooked-curved tip, strange elongated eyes by its side and melting-endlessly beneath it, in the 'man's-jaw-shaped' twisted 'well'. It looked like an ugly solar panel, with a strange gated-power battery, compact almost thing by its side. With a decayed Pterodactyl's partially stretched wing that bore two faces but was melted like wax, whose ribs were showing, and got sharpened, as if eaten by other dinosaurs. Five great sharp-point, one for the chin, the drill, the lesser limb that bore tiny shivering, hard to see long-fingers that rested beneath but molded with the teeth, although those will not be counted, since their dullness rendered them unworthy of being mentioned, the tip of the 'man's'jaw's'slightly-horned tip', as well as the final talon, disregarding the two arms also; although bladed, just as dull. Or a strange almost humanoid centipede-device creature with a strange altar sprouting out of its head; regardless of it, most importantly, it was peculiar working there.

‘I’ve brought you something.’

‘What would that be?’

Oh, it made sense:

A giant ant-eater’s bore forth head, fat-like a balloon Elephant man’s tumor warted, with a flaccid sperm-cell shaped body bag, and a flaccid downwardly-set mouth drooling with disgusting acid-scum, crowned by an almost cross-like shaped set of growths that shot out of his head, with a giant tooth and some antennae puckers coming out of it. That also bore a flaccid wriggling stretch of a ‘sausage’ deformation filled with a few limbs. Its eyes were wriggling things like worm-black-cords that spun in place, vortex-almost-like, shooting black sprawls out of itself.

‘You god damned retarded nigger! I told you not to take it out of its hiding.’

A sea-ray like carpet-formation of shooting out of itself bubbly spear-tips, filled with cancer-guns, that they themselves were filled with cancer-blood-rape, but only women, only for women. That had a giant mound-round spear formation coming out of it that had two decay-branches aligned like a slingshot, one bearing a cylinder eye, whereas the other bore a nigger-lyncher, a second sling-shot, but thinner, tinier slingshot u-shaped formation, that bore a few eyes on both sides. It constantly dripped with blood-boils, while yelling nigger:

‘Nigger-nigger-nigger-nigger-nigger-nigger-nigger-nigger!’

It was, strangely enough, watched over by a similar in size, width, depth, length, and size, creature, who was fatter, like a whale, but was more compact, had a hat-shaped growth-shell that housed it and two heads in the front, one being giant, twice as big as its body, a demonical-like skull figure with mad eyes, a weird lack of a nose, shaped like an animal-incisor, concavely so, with only one line of teeth that were fat, like rounded cylinders but barrels, and sharp down there. And a cut-at the half-weird head, that had a ‘skinned’ alive duck-shaped beak with jackal like teeth drooping below it.

Both of them were connected by nigger-lynching ropes that constantly shot-dead fucking nigger-bodies between one another, filled with various decay-tubes they exchanged womb-people between one another, before killing the boys.

‘There sure are a lot of workers here, aren’t there? Coming to take out jobs!’

A spinning-in-place nigger that had hundreds of lynch ropes come out of nowhere, wrapping around his neck like lassoing cattle. He was there as well. Shooting blood out of his eyes to speak, like lizards:

‘Sprrl, sprll!’

Somehow he didn’t bleed to death.

‘What an unholy sight! Gook, Gook, I call onto you to appear!’

CCP:

‘A dark army of flying intesticides is on its way, towards us, I’ve come to warn you of their trajectory before it’s too late!’

There were only a few options left.

Smell of termites

A house was lain no farther than fifteen hundred seventy eight miles away from two diverging points who’ve placed in on top the threshold of a dark pit. It didn’t make much noise, unless directly addressed:

‘Bellow is the need to call, I must face it and I must live upon taking the fall.’

The edges of its squarish head served as elliptically rounded eyes.

Everything was rather, on-set to be of a curve.

‘Wouldn’t want to fall of our horse now, would we?’

‘You’ve come late, barely arrived, much to yourself in a sublime trap I left here hanging for you.’

‘It’s incontestable that you wouldn’t know what I hid down there unless you threw yourself in it.’

Said he, upon being revealed, his starved body serving as a red meaty foliage to be walked upon, eerily pacing as he was, it had been hard, even undeniable, this meddlesome winged figure, whose stumps but stretched since last they met. He’s been down there, flown through, and gone through such laboriousness as to get to a point where there was no life to hold anew, or candle. And waxen as the pillar that held it was, spread across many coming out of the main fall, out of the stump itself he shared life –come out of, and upon return, when greeted by many like him, mourned had he, for a life had missed his, in turn, then banished. Seeing how they could no pit him against such contenders as their betters would muse, out of the nest was he cast, until all was but forgotten, past the boil that was the inescapable truth!

‘They’ve abandoned the nest a long time ago.’

‘Why would I trust you, Neck?’

‘Because I’m leaving you with little if no choice at all, I know that you don’t trust me, hence, I seek but reason to ask for as my guide. Together we could put an end to all uncertainty regarding the nest. We could be out of it by the time titer and yonder, either one of us makes a face.’

‘And If we’re not?’

‘The back of your head is much rounder than it’s been before. It’s slowly progressing into becoming more of a man’s skull, you stand to lose your wings as well, if they can even carry all the weight you’ve put upon you while nesting away from what’s hidden down there.’

‘I could become one, then lose myself into their world, if any single one could have it, I would, if all.’

‘Enough of it already; your pity bring me bore, I seek to search what’s left, out of the place, then you’ll be no more. But you can do this for yourself as I, as I would have it just as well, if only your sight was what it used to be.’

‘We’re here, already?’

‘We’ve been walking for twenty minutes or so, and you’ve been granted a blessing by her.’

He pointed at the statue, Neck thought as little as he could of them.’

Part of the statue dropped by them, filled with stone-decay, partially rotten, eaten, but crash. A bubbly thing lay at her base, and most of the toweresque building behind, on top its draught-sickened pool that used to be a well’s house lay now in the ruin of what came after, flavor-scented carcasses being out there in the open-chitin armored, whereas their tiny insect heads only connected, vaguely if any-touch to the top of broken ceilings where tiny cockroach beings still marched upon the deadened point of the fall.

‘Of course they ended up killing one another, those bastards! I didn’t expect any better than that!’

Upon one of the darkest shades of palm- but stricken down and ill, descending past and through the most-sullen of all, there stood but a most uncanny worthless thing, stung and slit but slither that might peel might not have come. A dark object rested upon a scepter that stood forth, projected upon such abhorrent a room that not a single soul that might’ve come in sigh and those whom were there as well, benign, men and pox-like fiend and colored, darks whose lost appeal, appearance fading as they were strung. It stood but there, blearing away, colorful at the jugular, the throat of the machine that drew. A much to its humanoid counterpart, deep-but evanescence deep-protruding, mesmerizingly, as acid would’ve had itself, a-new and deeply seething, long mistaken, haltingly it called.

A few more disgusting looking mouths appeared as well, begging to be fed, whenever the time, they stumbled.

In that dark room, where the flames were drawn out well beyond their time, it appeared, and out of fright their souls, as if forcefully strewn to vanish disappeared for a second, without a doubt, consentingly distraught, and there, it spewed upon itself but bloated, disappearing, but as tasteless as it could be:

‘A chain lays there, rusted but made of Cretan Steel, fashioned alike in ways you’d lose yourself, in deep, but hollow thought, I wager, of little more, there is but stranger, upon worthy strangulation, I beckon you shall do little more as deeper still and won’t halt living, until, but still, the hour, in which the sacrifice shall merge, with every corpse the living’s work and those that yet resist but beckon and upon the hour of which, utmost locked and broken, if a man’s still standing, I shall name him king!’

‘The wretch had called and it shall, that one shall be called machine!’

For they all knew what that meant, even a single man, if he could only draw a stinger and have himself taken by the beard, then, he’d have a cackle more a hinging by the side, he yelled:

‘I’ve found something, I found it, I swear!’

And all of the sudden their plight of waiting was perniciously distraught, lost, for, momentarily distraught as they had, a crack was made and out the dark went a single light. It didn't pay to listen it steel itself and walk away, as a horde of people-like run-through plight, come about and entered from the drift left out, on the various hills. They drew inside with mighty peeled and darkened drafts and many swords that were alike.

Slammed immediately, side to side, until they all went at it, out of their minds, as they were, many people, they were stopped.

Eighteen hundred more people came out of nowhere, and knuckle brought their teeth out of their mouths by force, then the four brooding docks flew in, but filled, with many insects that had damningly stolen humanoid grind, whom only flew around gregariously as others flew as well, anchors and bodies being dropped on top, then brought onto their view, they were treated like the monkeys they were, punched until their sinew shot out of their spines, bouncing against the walls as they were joined by others, every single one of them desperate to taken a shot.

A man wearing an amulet around his neck, wrapped and pushed and out it came, with constellation-thrown and spiked blades, many of whom were come around and leaped in place, flying towards one of the other men. Whose face was swollen, to gigantic-colossal growth, like a pane-facet it drew along, cutting everything it could as it rotated again in place, crawling underneath some of the covered in many peculiar men, couches and desks and other baskets that were thrown and sprawled and thrown around.

'One of the door's open, come down, come down now!'

Shouted another, as for a disparaging shot that was taken with him on an immediate notice, eighty powder bellies and a few staircases, filled with gritty voices, worn but shaded:

'They're dropping the bombs, settle down now, settle down before they cut all of us in one piece!'

A street toppler drew eighteen big-guns on top the nuclear-basins, all of them fusing with the air, forming dark clouds that entered some of them, immediately being taken down, a storm hit the decks, and all of the docks were filled with gowns, many deeply seated, painted and tenderly embroidered, bejeweled and twisted in place as to hold in them, as much as eight or clusters of grenades, tiny humanoid planets in every single one of them expressed, and made, invasions followed soon after, as the Tarries, adamant on murder drew as well.

'I think I recognize one of them.'

Herman thought, he could see the reason for which everything looked so bad. Since many of the men all hid now, behind every broken barrel and every single piece that stood, on top the musky huts and other tall houses, the ones were barely livable in since they were deformed like giant fleas-as to be called, in the way they were bodied, contorted in the back, with growths of fluid sacks the size of baseballs, with sky-jet-like fronts, twisted but made to slit and slice, as the many other limbs amasses onto them, a tunnel-growth of fluids joining it, as other men chose to lower the ladder. Some of them hid inside by being partially eaten but only inside the latter of the acid-filled lungs, the former being now claimed by the other ones. And their elongated long-pinned down almost mosquito-like segmented-balloon drops, upon which they crawled, as there was no time.

A bomb was being placed in there, even eaten, not by the creatures or the ghoulish things that followed soon after but by the men whom were incapable of distinguishing the lots. It was maddeningly bothersome, swimming in the globules of, much rancid, but deformed, curdled mass.

‘Here it comes again, get down men, get down before it drags us all with it!’

All of the sudden they all started pushing in, a few tube-like mask-machines were drawn out of the ritual chamber, then given seed that they might feed themselves with in order to survive.

‘Follow me, my good man, I think I know of a way out.’

‘But who are you? I’ve never seen you before, please, oh please, tell me, I need to know who you are stranger, I’m afraid of what might happen here, what If I get lost or stabbed or evil wound, I’m left to bleed at last? What if there’s a chance, malady of sweet embrace that I might be bled, when time is come for me to die as well?’

‘You’ll have to trust me on this, because I’m telling you, we’re both standing near the one chance we might have at escaping this chaos while still being alive, but go alone and you shall die, follow me and at the very least, we both stand a chance.

I’m Clive Horn; the man responsible for eating that whore, and swallowing her whole, as eating her precious sons after, to such a need I had to devour the rest of her that the shower of disgust that followed after only brought something that could not last a second after.’

‘What are you saying man? What happened to her? Why, oh, why would you have done such a mad thing? How could you have destroyed everything in your path and stopped the pathogens from spreading out of her, as I know for a fact that, that, that particular whore was mad, and filled with destruction-syphilis, I know you’ve made some sacrifices only a man would do, but tell me, if you want my aid, reveal all onto me and I shall take it all into consideration if that’s the will we’re ought and ought to come after, in such secrecy, decree-for such exchange as I might find still wreathing.’

And every coming to an end, morosely aware that this might be the end; he came upon a much-desired conclusion; this man deserves the truth at the very least, I can see it now. He has to know it, there’s a reason a giant towering formation made out of cadaverous-heads is coming out of the back of his head, entering the most peculiar of crystal bends in which he may live an eternity, untouched, preventable from harm, incapable to die, immune to all there is but sweet decide. I must have his soul!’

‘I’ve given some thought onto it, good friend.’

Before he could finish a man leaped out of nowhere and punched right through his chin, splattering it, on a whim, all the way after, pushed through the trunk of his body, then he picked up his remained, carried them on his back and flew away, followed by metallic drones filled and carrying tombs with them, of mad things that hid in stars and had eyes for strange globular cells that hid in their eyes, a line of shattering, bothersome ill-some things.

Gases were being released in the air, but all of the sudden, something more bothersome hit them, a wave of uncouth, barely to be searched for after, distress and lack of maddening worthless things.

‘Hey, you, the flying man, I’ve seen you somewhere before, I think, I think you’re prepared.’

‘Who are you?’

The strange almost creature in the back of him asked, although incapable of properly opening its jaw, out which greater cartilage two-sets of shell-shaped whales came out of, both equipped with an irresolute amount of the most unnaturally, desolate – looking, most languid and parish, peevish, cavern-dish like shot in the foot by a pole with two spears like he was molded out of a stool of many deformed figures, all unreal, carrying themselves much closer to the man they buried themselves into. Driving each other in the corner.

On the side of the broken in, almost giant-decayed bird’s nest in which the most serependicious of figures approached.

‘We prayed to you, although not voiced, and await your grand return, though mourn but others in our place, whose shameless facelessness, though much beyond the common adherence to the lots, whose jointitude has come onto us, the people of the lower lands in which our lives were spent mourning for the ones that were darkened by the tawny-rubes forgiven for- growths of high-horns and many spread that came out of them as well as the worn out defilers whom entered them whenever needed to be listened to, prayers undeterred for theirs was a saddened for reckoning spent in trying to appease the lord by striking stone with cysted fist until bled-through thoroughly by the vile factions filled with dirt-munched upon girth, knowledge being possessed by them almost in a most unnaturally unadulterated state that was slightly touched by the evils of the dark-pointed with cones sticking out of them, procuring scents of bartered dice upon the brow of foamy white come out of barrel’s hoe, injustice being cut and shared by men dressed in sacred robes of evil incantations of Quantum which had poisoned their minds during the rituals out of which they started entering the Dark Abodes of the Evil Anaghast speaker but in whispered silence, for days like the ones following the months, spent receiving from various sources of much-em-blessened benefactors – Jack Daniels bottles, out of a mysterious reality known as ‘Nyu- Jersay’, that was actually a platform rotated eighty hundred ninety five and six, after, degrees to the right of the dark foamy creature made out of strange appendages with wicked-looking eyes and strangely defiled unnaturally dark planet shaped outward- hanging low-out of it, sticking out, breathing organisms that could breathe in and out then spike drinks with cancer-tumor dog-heads that opened their mouths only to reveal, and these heads were completely made out of the very liquids themselves that they were not only coated but made out of, pointing upwardly towards one of the darkest spheres of dark-bloated orangey- purple things that were shaped like interconnected suns that stuck out of the heads of the bile-producing pampered on top of, malignant deformations of the plain men that were conjoined but made the population of this Dark-Earthly thing that was being slowly swallowed by a cripple-fiend creature with eight eyes, of whose malborious countenance was even more disturbing during the interaction with the melter-through the Rye-like tributary king-mong Tall Vassal of the Dark Egg- that was assaulting some of the citizens just as they looked at it, the dark sphere-shot through magician’s envelope shot-after insides of dark intestines shaped insecticide hardened lumped but with eyes and addle pebbles with metal spheres of iron-dark made out of men shaped in triangles put together like lumps of puzzles that were also dazzlingly puzzling-estranged from their society people, being very much so incapable of breathing without looking in the general direction of the Government first and foremost, relationships of diplomacy had to be delayed for a long enough while as for the people of the moons and of the on-coming charge-through mouths of Mars, as to allow them a period of respite before putting a word in, to come along and talk- in a most communicative kind of way about how niggers commit most of the Violent crimes in a strange reality, out of which the bottle of vodka – Daniels was taken out of, that was being covered up, that is to say, by miscegenation promoting kikes, I hate niggers, that is to say, the First of the Magi had already received most if not the most unnaturally dark of prayers and of darkest conundrums of riddles he could stumble upon and during the advent of the morosely distraught day that had come onto him during one of his time-stretched periods of meditations, that were being dealt with, that is to say immediately in a most violent way, by punch, punch, punch, punch, punch, punch, stroke, strode, upper-cut, slit, slice, kill, murder, spat on him, a man came after, he crunched his knuckle with a kick then jumped on top his head, and bit his ear off, then he stomped his back and ripped off his spine, Mummy-Igniah, whose mastery of the arcane ended up being useless when met by something as simple as trying to crush his way through the most irresolute of, dark-squares of green-puddle grass-verdure with purple-purple but only on top of red flashes and explosions in bottles that were spiked by strange gelatin-green yellow-yellow yet there was a second bottle with dark rays coming out of it, bug-people Parasite capable of fire-fly flashing, things, coming out of their firelights' flashlights that were shaped like elongated trunks in, this jar being as far in its overall width and height, as, generally, eight put together buildings, and they, with their tunnels, and with their spreads and light-makers, out of which they cast away the stranded sailor-like creatures, whose main-king-lord who was hiding in one of the many-bed-ridden filled with nurses that were taking care of the scurvy just as they were speak-talking with tube-makers coming out of their meat-grinding star-spiked shooter-guns they were all equipped with, grenades being placed near their beds, in four by four crates, as well as a 'Very-Very-Pretty' assortment of sharp-dull knives of green Sabbath, not the band, ritualistic sacrificial bottled babies that had been saved from the media-controlling kikes, niggers, niggers, niggers, near which the much-adorned and hoped for, king, standing, smilingly trying to communicate in an understanding manner with the other interlopers that were shooting, from one spot to another, dark ends, a conglomeration of lost flocks being pinned together, trying to understand the underlying reasons behind the world's lack of primordiality, as to adhere to a system beneath a system that's been tried for and fondly-so, as for the reminiscence of its defeat to have been judged as a complete eradication, a final blow, in etiquette of the opposition, whose total but completely moral but ideological opposition- but in a light bulb was discovered just recently, away, farthest, might a scientist add, from the mounted power-connected to the cartilage man-shaped socket-generator that was a manned-drone with eyes, inside a room, that had brought in turn an acceptable change in the general population's cognition, which, having been taken into account for, has been deemed unfit by the intellectually- by mental fitness trained, as their Alumni-Alluminyi- Plastic can attest for, that completely changed the entire definition of the complete system of systems in the grand scheme of systems that are interconnected only a strands of wool, being held, as to be unchained, economically speaking only by a strand of, eleven hundred thousand billion lynched-niggers inversely proportional to the frightened but fibrous state of a world that's akin to their but which had been robbed completely of nuance that is needed as, for Stern's conjunction of everything being a spook, but him.'

A leper's laughter could be heard from faraway, as he drew along one of the put-together bottles in the quay, his hindrance stalled, but only as a nerve had popped, all the way through kneeled steel, which entered through him not would sink, deeper, with each moment's sill, reverberation, with every moment damning him further, though the incantation was still heard somewhat, five point seventy seven centimeters on a rounded arch, aligning one of his veins as a crossbow's plow-through shot-lain, cap by his cysted-acre made into, lined nails, with pails-thick if vase is broken during the process, out of froze, but clearly on top the pool they're standing on top of, his other limbs-appendaged to a second body, snails having eaten top his brow inside of, then, he realized that there was no one around him to align the shot to begin with, having spent all this time on the tips of his toes'es tip of the feet's shoe'ses', but pricked with pin and snick, but thin, upon, but leaping about, a rabbit's in heat while doing it, around. 'S how he got to places.

Swindle-walking, forth would he arrive, if asked to, for a second more he stopped, then walked inside a barrel-filled with chemicals in which he stood for long, stolen by a rotten lot-taken, bid for, trunk, inside a long where he would spend the next five months alone in silence.

Of little worth was there a day whence they drew ahead out of their hiding quails, to greet one by the name of Kayf, one of the lost-since the Ages past, a Sheik; perturbed by little more but swollen runes that might get bidden for, luckless was there a day aghast. Written by his notes to his side, but written in several dialects of Sanskrit, plagued, for the words were much emboldened anyway, with clots but riddles for the crude, bitten by his nails, misused was his pencil's sting:

'Where to gone for, reason might not be extended, and within an hour, born and ended was your trip forced before it's begun.'

'What have I done then?'

'You've angered one of the wrong gods and naught more can be forgiven by them, the ones that cherish theirs, and them, in brow of leprous, leech-were thus command, and gone. Within the hour, lest of all, would the rebound. You've met along the way. And of quail, was riddled-wired, with lesser stale.'

A branch of trench-coated spindles, all carried on broken apart, faltered upon, crumbed beyond a soiless ground, and munched on, defiled surrounding:

Several people were approaching from somewhere in the North, incapable of asking for who, gone, for long-hours has now returned.

'A mourning to you, great friend, of Gyration soils; to whom might I have the pleasure of being, on truce's accord, on bastardly open gates but torn now, pleasure as bidden by thine and pleasure for thine' sight, and long before and such defiled. The man come from far-but trenched, the land but cowered before them.'

'You've done me a pleasure to know and ask, you've done my reasoned for, prolonged but strung. There's been fifty men of the same calling, of the same going, wretched in thine sight, belittled, all but come towards the camp and bidden.'

Sail away, as all in turn would be asked, to come and leave as they would please, and never seek for reason since, they walk out, thither and tether, whereas they would land. A few more boiled grooves were long since abandoned since and gone.

'Who is the one lain in hiding and even farther than that gone?'

‘We cannot see nor find him, yet in place of where he’d been to, run. He’s on it, but we’ve yet to find where their foolish race’s gone through. For that we need to find wherever they might lay to, or near which, or reason with them.’

‘Are there more?’

‘The ghoulish figures? Doggedly so, upon hindered legs, but riddled with him.’

Of Yellow head but tripped on a silken, bloated hint.

Was there a hint of the cackle, the race of his, and yonder, was the pox-filled thing with warts, the entity, of Filthde, gone, and lain in hiding, brooding, his Mongols wreathing, standing alone, and trying to lecture one another, standing, rabidly so, were they come and stumbled upon no one and not a single thing did move.

‘Ah, there’s still reason to find him still.’

Yegvor-Mernas; most deformed of bone-cartilage making a simple conical pair of crones, all standing beneath him:

‘Draw them out of their hiding immediately as I ask it so.’

‘A dark carnival was there must be, in the last of silky sea.’

Lurching backwardly on glance it drew, apart but sailing as for longed for, sat a pair of long, lonely figures.

Twenty or so, bastard’s composure ringing in the ears, broken ships emerging from the nearer sided, feared for thorn tooth, the many cavities-shaped trenches being obscured as the light faded, brought forth. A musket- hundreds of them to follow, pillared around a sculpted form, although it took the sight of all, the ones that gathered, as they had come from nearer to the place than far, outnumbered the slaves as well as their ranks. Many of them being desperate to get a prayer out themselves, being brought to gaseous zones:

‘Lay down your weapons If you are to be warped in, wrapped in desperation thin, but no longer will you feel absinthe.’

Their absence shortly fading so, as if in line for a guillotine they were brought to a desperate tented crone; her eyes were hardly painted thin.

‘My gods are strong, my gods are dead.

My gods shall not abandon me yet. Not while I still have yet to wreath in their command; rotten being, I shalt not abandon thee; not when we are so close.’

‘How could a woman like her walk backwardly with her entire skull being turned to point in the direction she’s headed towards?’ He wondered.

A temple whose nature was distraught-but known, stood before them, treacherous as if one were to show, as little compassion, yet uncanny:

‘Call upon him, poignant master of no raft:

Hector, we call of you to attend again.’

Hector, brought out of his lucid-entrapment, lord of paranoia being whom mastered yet to have been done his soul, in darkened age, neuron maze, of power-striding, filth-electron that had made his brain, the leprous dream of darkness-torn apart, controlled and stirred as if it were a tide by only the most incessantly strong, strongest still of all evils which malboriously took over his heart, where he’s seen, spilled on the branch-thin spleen-shaped platform upon which he’d been, wrenching still in squirming pacing yet in place, therefore following the maze’d crumple leading to his mind’s discordant –conquer with an arm he’s seen, with eyes of gelatin, fifteen or so meters in front of him to a mile, where part of the spleen raised itself forth, upon a pile, out of which but many arms had wrought, not on his command but brought, ripped apart his arm, but swollen, a tiny cysted blade drew out of the gaping bleeding hole, he’s stolen, that’s to say the growths, from the many deities of little puckery grown-forts, upon the many altars that surrounded him during the time, when he decided, what little worth his life had been, not even that of an orphan fiend, but lowest of the scum, perhaps that of a dog, or a lesser animal, who’d seen it thus. His old-removed arm, had joined the mount, to which he’s staring, startlingly as to see their new addition, atrophied upon their top. Glowing now, as mockery pointed at the tip of his hat where a darkened star of wild command started pacing, mimicry contorted of no ghoul but soulless foul, discontent but no retorting prowl, drew again. Out of the socket it flew and out into the sky-but flight-e-ned, towards one of the many crooked altars whom now appeared after pace, a cracked wonder was it, such that would’ve seen no gaze, towards which flight had ended, broken cyst emerge-nt, only to flash into a gradient of colors bore of many growths, appeal:

Out of fear he had sought no light.

Of scorrrough over taken land there came but blasted a patch of ground, whose swollen head disastrously mischievous, were it to have bit upon itself in anchor of bayed, illustrious pledge, with every finger bloody pained by what’s been cut out of them, butcher’s abode then taken from him, out in sight, a barrister’s code lain to their side as to stop any thought from occurring, prevented, pus-in sight, a faceless man with ought to have come after, drew to this day, blight of sightless mooned remains, by sight alone none would’ve believed if allowed the stand in premise to him gone. Retreat uncannily after, seethe, upon a lightless rancor, for what’s been come of them, and what’s come after would’ve made no sense. A tall broad helmet with the head long-horned as if by Lancelot, shot-through, with a curved upwardly inclined, adorned with many eyes, and a mouth split beneath it, maw-open, set in a stone-protrusion, molded-strapped. A lower body-brazier holding it by many things, appendages holding it, barred from sight, legged but wrought, like a bottled cylinder below, but see-through as if one would know how to escape if ‘trapped’ inside of it, sea-chantey if dreaded was there floating in it, only a flintlock, gun. Sour tasting but shot-through, it had. During its advance, a single man had tried to sooth its ride, and contort as if to strike, he set in light, an armless thing without the least amount of hope and dreaded what came after, rightfully, mistreated as to seek solace after broken legs eaten as his swollen face, bleeding into a trail that only garnered enough attention once he was, approximately enough, close to being dead. In the cavernoids, whenever noise would echo-its way but taken by notes written down, slashed against his skin, put through boils and run, he had but little say.

A man took him by the collar and dislodged, dismountedly, off his horse, he came back to life only to hit the man in his throat and laugh:

‘Thought you would survive so easily out there without being beaten to a pulp? Son, you should take a simple look at yourself for a moment and you’ll find out, better as to know, why not to ask. I tasked you to set in search for whatever rotten piece there is out there but you’ve come back empty handed with a lousy thing inside your brow!’ He could see the termite hill in it. Furiously drowned in his own lurid psychosis-bred confusion lending to his sight a mighty oozing spreading light of colorless things, that only come to people who are dead during their last stay in the dark-heaven, angel cherubs spiked with lurid pus-straps shoving themselves out, many features by diseased. Forage of demonical beings, all sullen but buried in the briars that made their organs, swollen to a cast. A dark, most diseased thing was the distrust they simply emanated. As if ancient eons had corrupted them beyond redemption, many had become deformed. Standing angelic features were cast out of their bodies when they came to the realization that they were horned, but come out of their bellies, drawing anchor, cast but pillared flaccid caterpillar dangling with empty growths, headed by many chained incisors that were homed inside their diseased mouths. Many of them were humanoid but only when they released their lower bodies out, from the shells of mighty dark concave as there was a beast, from the fist in blocks of skin and what came after that, many of the humanoids having disappeared, then come into the world, replacing the very much more real than them, actual humans during their search of might, destruction, conquest, for a broken world to seep upon and devour while their brothers died out. Leaping back and forth they drew, as if bloodied, with face-like apparitions from the ground, grated and filled with dark sinew, they appeared after dark.

Lomek and Yiel

Walked eerily alongside its fellow gnawing upon the ground pets, of grayish purple, similar to him, twas’ said. Upon a black draught, where the sea they walked upon was shallow, where his abandoned casks lay there, rotting away, awaiting for what ought to be the gallows. But there, alone, they seemed almost ancient, as breeders lain in waiting below a sun that forgot, as if already shone. A Cyclops bloated simian head pointed at the back, the other side bearing, though molded as if the skull of a mammoth’s, or an elephant’s width and shape, this occipital ‘bone’ thinned out into a tinier, more deformed, sleepless eye’ bearing peashooter ‘trunk’ instead, with an elongated stinger sweeping the ground, one that would reel back in whenever shunned upon. A block as if an altar or the base of a contorted mug, rather fat but more so, two conjoined elephant legs strapped inside each other’s melted sides made for its body. And grayish were the puffs that drew out of him, as blandly benign. It trod forward followed by, as if minded by simple animals that were beaked, they all, started picking up the parasites off the ground, the lesser fish were eaten after dusk. And much to their contorted nature, heavily double headed paid but little mind as to who gave the commands, they twisted one another, both directions pushed away. Worked upon each other's sides, drew but blotched remains, drawn from either side, as birds, disease had flown and faded, as their falls, intesticides, but bleakly dated, no day could be discerned at all.

The sea was restless and one of the embodied drew to a nasty-leper shore. Where the men had gathered all around, to lesser bows and crude made tools that had been used to draw whatever they could from it, as to listen to it now. Flutes and ghastly pores of gas being shot towards it, only to appeal, and only to appease what little could be done to feel it wreathe away and cast, no matter what lesser glance it had. Not a single man able, as to grow attached to it, since breathing lasted lesser so. Since they had cast a single thing in turn, and more:

'We're still mourning for our losses when the last one had come to see. And bleeding as it is, upon our brows there's little more to see today. We've buried our young and old, for the last time one of you came or stumbled upon our shore, you asked for children's sacrifice. Our youth be taken for us, and made to waste, with what little there was of their bleeding prowling fading teeth and tawny-brows.'

But it didn't spoke, only laid there in silence, waiting in the way kings were courted under the needy-watchful eyes that belonged to the servants of the court, which in turn only waited for something to come along and break the monotony of their caste, as to release them from this incessantly disgusting feudal system thrown along their way by a decayed monarchy forced upon them by an immortally rotten ruler whose mouth was fused with a harmonica and only was capable of feeding itself with the many appendages that were grown out of him, connected to nothing else but the smaller, darker man-limbs it fed upon since there was a shortage of food that seems to have lasted or expanded to, what appeared to be, or might as well be, the good part of a year.

Brought upon one of the swollen houses, by some of the bolder unthinking of themselves villagers, whom struck in mourning still, as for their judgment being entirely clouded, they have felt as little as no remorse being met by it, again. Presented upon their house there being a bloated tick, or lumped giant see-through black boil that was as black-burnt tawny inside as a cancer-point of moles all bubbling inside of it. A great almost almond beady heart-organ, orange but covered at the top by some molded-melting, diverging into gradients of grays, slowly working its way into a complete black, lending on an illusion as if part of its 'brain' had been exposed, mush, of the murkiest type that had eaten part of this almost gold-fish fat filthy creature whose 'disintegrating' top drew breathe away from the strangeness of the pink gas it shared room inside the boil they lived inside of. A few pseudo animal appendages appeared to be lain beneath it, upon which it crawled, all lumpy and swollen, but contender, he was for the little food they kept inside the house.

Both approached one another, oozing droopingly on the floor. Something most nastily incline appeared to poison the air, as that was signaled by the men who dropped over, louder thuds echoing outside, like flies, as to be punished for being in the presence of a spoiled kind of meat even beyond their kinds to have been able to fully deal with.

'We're running out of remorseless men, to drag in part and sacrifice themselves for us when said, and saddened we are that we've run into you here, when hunger just drove out whatever humanity's been left of them.'

‘Let them suffer then, we’ve little regard left for those beneath us, have we not?’

‘How about we ask the lump first?’

Cried Yiel as the body was quickly drawn closer to one of the grains, the ones that looked much puffier, not that it might’ve made much of a difference, instead, he asked:

‘What little is there left, we shall share, no?’

At which it could not hold its reigns in part, as it started trailing on to its right end side, squirming like a snake, then leaped to the other side of the room in a strange arc, within which it stopped before it could hit the ground, levitating for a moment before it drove itself straight on an incline, then quickly dashed around, hitting a tiny spot, rounded up as to form a curve, then leaped back twenty feet, flew to its right side and stopped within two meters or so in the air, before it drone back down, two times pushing down then up, down and up as if on a reclined, before finally it stopped so as to regurgitate one of the towns people it ate. A few of its body parts were thrown around the room, willy-nilly yet not a single one was recognizable as to be his instead.

‘Have you noticed it yet?’

‘Pull out your trunk Yiel, if you want a much clearer view, the stinger, the stinger needs to puffs some smoke, we need to drive in our advantage first, unless you don’t know what’s good for you.’

But as disgraceful as it was, they both knew much better than to sit and ask, instead they must, and cast aside all there was put in mind, there of went after; they stared at the blob yonder and asked it:

‘Where is your lair?’

‘You shall do us the honor of taking us there so we may see what little there be of valuables of blobs you’re hiding of a kin. Since, I can see that you’re made of a most precious kind of gelatin, I can only seem to know as little.’

‘Don’t frighten him, our friend could simply spoil the rotten grains and keep it to himself, then run away, just to be certain of it, I wouldn’t cast a foiled glance at him, if that there’d be.

Instead I ask of you, let him take us if he wants.’

Both were wretched for the hour was brought onto them at last. Squirming on both sides, always threading like chicken plucking worms, the stinger its beak, the blind creature, but little headed, rotten by the spoiled-benign, conjoined but tried for. The gelatin-encased one simply did as he was asked. With a single leap in the air, he came down again with a mighty blown down force, which ripped apart part of the floor and into a down-threaded hole they went. A well-nigh end, going down there, although the walls looked mightily disgusting, with the grains slowly descending by their sides, they were eerily being lowered down, wittingly as if grabbed, then carefully made to be, and lasted. Cast into the lower-sides of the well, where they satiated what little fast they could for many days. Wailing with the many cast away, similar oozing creatures that awaited them; this was no hive but den, lowered by disgraceful, most filthily unclean, derailed. A large elongated coiled rope of gelatin lead back into the villager’s house; four great tunnels waited where they stood, open as opposed to the other two behind them which had been caved-in occupied. The general area where they moved in was rather quaint otherwise as it was plain to see that there was no inherent harm they so simply sought to entrust them knowing.

‘We should do well to follow him.’

‘Which one would that be? Because I feel rather displeased with trying to distinguish them from one another, knowing them to be, rather the way they are.’

‘They’re manifested in different slight, barely noticeable distinct chiseled points that are easy to notice and get a hold of. As a matter of fact, I would say that they’re incredibly distinct enough for differentiations to be easily noted, as to discern who our host it.’

So far, a few types have been distinguished from their group.

A rhombic bulb, the tunnels could be seen as giant hoses interconnected in the middle, then melted-hybridized together as to almost signal perfection, to a faulty degree of it being encased-but coated in that diseased thing. A bulbic rooted plant-like sphere, an eye but blind-pasty stood on top one of the tunnels they were lead towards. Its end was clear, a room that was rather ballish, a spherical cysted nest where hardly anything else could be made out. A light-producing system corded by valves, coated by gelatin, see-through fortune-cookie split, or a bowl and a cup merged together, inside of which the orange-pulp liquid held, inside of it, a few dark-seeded growth-filled light-makers, back side of a firefly but harder.

An ant-like system, workers, leapers and munchers, although self-evident, little explanation and as little was needed in order to easily identify their lots; the differences were in the shape of that hardened orange-gradient and where it chipped, signaling the hardness inside these beings.

Near the room, a sprawl cord-rounded in, or the inverse of light-bulb’s corkscrew depression, leading there by little more; by then they were led to and by, a vanguard of these see-through oozes, mammal-like by the looks of it, with it being made clearer and clearer that this was no ooze and they, both Lomek and Yiel could simply see through them by means unknown.

Arrived into the room, upon the first inherent sights, they were greeted by the fully-plain view, or sight, of the domed ceiling in question, whose mere countenance was this, wildly expressed in a few pseudo head-appendage hybrid work-claws that were narwhal tooth- claspers producing, although droopingly beneath them, standing as if on a rest-like position patterned by weird canceary protrusions that only distracted or took sight away from the chains that were at work, holding them together, still attached to their large-stretched. Whereas beneath them, the entire floor was discernable, barely, by a sight of, well-done if by drone-work, although there were clear signs of a well-endowed craftsmanship being put to the employ of who had been responsible for this work. It wrapped up pretty well, one might think. Being made out of reclines, some pseudo half-segmented spine-piece-set welded together greatly filled sea- of bone-structures coated in iron that were being actioned by hundreds of appendages finely placed although clearly observable by the two of them, as pivoting points that made it so they were easily liftable by the sight, obscured, above them, in the ceiling-set, where the device actioning the upper-claws was clearly covered or hid away by a dark-cloud of swollen smokes that could be anything but easily made out, as to be let aware of their function.

Already impatient by this, what already was fifteen minutes of waiting or even more than that, they moved a few paces in, striding along as to not provoke any alteration, being careful while doing so, until they saw, as for every step, a clear stabilization on an equilibrium-defined clear-set, not on a ramp but on a wild stretch-walking area that was created by merely altering or adjusting the heights of the various bone chairs that had been set before them. Neither one of the others followed in. They were stopped right in front of the entrance, wonderingly standing-staring as to be unmet by no gaze nor sight. It was something close to a lack of beneficiary arrangement to be made between them that granted both parties a good deal of weariness towards one another, as they were both regarded, on both and either side as being, intruding organisms, with there being an implied possibility of a lot of damage being sustained on either side, if one were to push things a bit too far.

Should it have been mentioned, perhaps one might've looked at it as less of a well and more like a sink, as for that reason alone would tell one more than he needs to know. Since the villagers already marked that good fifteen miles or so as uninhabitable, as they not only departed from the area, but from the distance. As a few of them being placed on top a few of the cliffs, gave them the opportunity of getting as clear a set of sights as they needed in order to draw out some light to the situation at hand. The house being destroyed, as it's fallen over itself, lain in ruins.

'That blasted two headed ingrol, we should have never allowed him pass into our fine village; look, look at what he's done to half-partition, to our fine lands we've worked countless generations on. All of them reek of filth, of destruction, of that which is made theirs, to ruin.

A draught but on land, the soil now being made too bland to even be plowed upon; our crops and our raised meat, the corn we've set to plant and the nephews, all ruined by a humongous mistake that's ruined our future and taken whatever we could possibly save.'

'Lay low, lay low, I've known it so, I've expected this to happen in some way. I was aware of that which would happen if we were to leave them in again.

And think for just a moment at what's happened the last time we've even suffered to do something similar to them, that is to say, torch them by force, and made rub coal of the cob on their runaway cowing. We were bent-disgusted and made to flee as out of sight. We were met by force as we were incapable of hurting them for reasons not even we were aware off and that is that. We cannot slay them, and yet at best we can trap them inside, and let them waste away with the other ones, invaders, don't forget, that, they come of two kinds.

These may be the brutes whereas the others are but poison-slow, of mind-toxin. They poison themselves while waiting and at times they even kill themselves. It wouldn't surprise me if they accidentally trapped it in there without a chance to get away, they would. But let them do it and we may get away with something, if anything, that would be the grandest thing of all, I wager, better to suffer a little as we may get out of danger on the long run.' So confined two of the villagers.

But it was not as easy as it looked, or felt like, knowing it would be there among them disturbed the commotion immediately. The great divine being, Beguile, showed itself out of nowhere, drenched in faces, all joined to his great bulk and form. Tall he was, a single body where his single front pointing arm, which had been cumbersome but pointing down, melted as if by gelatin or if he were hit by a volcano strike, a leg that was a great bulky barrel fat and elongated, the other, four fingered, long as ancient dinosaur talons, whereas the head was twice or thrice as fat, as rounded and even more angry looking with a tiny face, retracted in the bulk. Akin to a microphone's head, in terms of bulk, as well as body, striding, a giant down-pointing horn, as fat as a balloon dog, out of which a few coils dangled around, all holding, together but flapped around, the head of a single humanoid. Wretched thing twas', like the hairy head of a Sasquatch, but hairless, fatter and almost reptilian looking itself, if it weren't for the one arm pointing forward as if it were a tongue. It lacked in fingers since they were all conjoined. And walked he had as if he wore a robe. A pseudo 'knee', as that of a man could be seen coming out of as if out of a body bag cover-in, drooling were all the parts. The faces it carried appeared to be cut in, through him, even deeper inside, where he hid them. Back-legged simian-but longer, four great fingers not toes, humanoid but if there was a thing, not a palm but the bulk of an elephant's 'hoof', molded into the rest of its body, rivaling the front pointing thing it drew up, that had been more of a melting mass, spread around, projected in the front. The human's head, very much alive, served as a carrot at the end of a stick, as was the giant fat sausage that came out of its forehead, this giant beast, using it as an auditory lantern to guide itself through this Haven, which was the lower able chained by claws, the emptiness be benign.

Beguile only approached and trusted Yiel, and he in turn only did as thus. Many of whom, as thus were standing in the back had now joined them, in this weird place, where nothing less and nothing more would last if asked.

They were on a lampoon of some kind in terms of speaking of the come-through passes that had diverged in and after. Of the evil days that had been shared and the one that were to come when brought upon the irresolute brow of a most maliciously sapient illusionary rite, their passage wilt to have been made, back and returned onto the world as they might again, they will be greeted by the passage, through the right of seepage, by the villagers and of lofty man, as brothers of some kind then they will become subservient by the sounds of it, as much as it could be thought, no little than acceptable, all would come to bow and pass over, through a few generations of fending not for themselves but for them. It was this kind of blessed malignity that was starved through stare and allowed to continue, even by guilt, an eye. A giant one, on the ground, the width and length of an exactly machine dark crystalline protrusion cast through, eighteen by fourteen, but blocky, as a square, communicated as it appeared to open like a nasty hatch and out of it, another tiny man-blackened and coated, and cast away, had asked as little, come onto my way, he appeared to make the motion of with the tips of his fingers, whom had settled into his empty palms. Embalmed into some oligarchic-oil of some plump dry olives that've been cast out of the lands of Athens, oft what was remained of them, after the crucial blotch's boil's pop, whom cast an acid grained, engrained a pebble rock, that in turn, seems to have, during a crucial amount of time when given the chance to escape, the mighty race of Greeks has chosen to, in ends' defeat finally face themselves, at end's feet, as they've become engulfed in the acid splatter of waves that had cast them away, among the ranks of Myths, bidden upon a fleet they sailed upon the banks of the Mediterranean Sea, upon the Sailor's brow, niggers getting lynched, the eye itself communicated of the darkened rays of solidified cuts that had been made inside the bodies of disease, that were clouded, as for gas, when brought onto the most morbid-looking masses that amassed in front of their hole, this being set upon the brow of a mighty spherical co.

Another one of the tunnels was most bizarre as well, since by the looks of it there was no way to discern like in terms of how life was being 'made', from the puckers that were placed there. Although the; four holes, tunnels that were placed in tandem, two on the right, two on the left, with the two behind being locked up; if seen from the point front-blank descending into, looking forth, but they were aligned, if seen from the distance like a woman spreading her legs, and her arms as well, whose head was the pit through which Shiel and the likes descended into. Them having crawled through her 'right' arm, whereas the room was her left leg. Although the 'throat' and 'head', hers, absorbed her entire chest and most of the organs, since it diverged into the other tunnels. It was an almost square-deformed room, at first glance, cubical, but rounded-slightly but eerily bizarre around the edges, as if they had been somewhat dulled by some inorganic manner of speaking through which the most if not most derangements happened. Everything was fractioned, or segmented and constantly opened, that is to say, it almost seemed like a checkerboard-room, but every square opened like trapdoors, revealing a slightly soil-depression of the same shape, as if they were suitcases, with threads attached or keeping them together, in the middle of this barred-almost turned into a pseudo eye- seen from the side since these threads, these corded wires were stretched on an arc, a barred prison that kept an eely, many maw-filled creature that was squirming around, desperately in an attempt to escape its capture, being of a similar race to every single one of them trapped in the same way in the many checked-but-trapped prisons, they would squirm-squirl-go-for-the-nuts-charge-like-a-d-o-g-trailing-his-own-tail-around form a knot around themselves, out of fear as these trap-doored suitcases' wires would start not only compressing in terms of girth, but they would also, somehow, as if these weird prisons they were in had actually became, momentarily, uglily deformed apple-spoiled jaws, start spinning as to completely disintegrate the stony substance, in appearance, one of the crawling puckers was met by the sight of during its advent towards the room, until, the suitcase was completely vanished out of sight, being replaced to an almost entirety, whereas the entrapped creature found itself levitating in the middle of it, incapable of escape, and being not only still trapped, but it actually found itself trapped in a somehow worse situation and conundrum than it had initially found itself in, since these constantly spinning ellipses that of what became the trap, spun at such an unfathomable to derive by mere sight speed, without being able to properly convey the almost 'atmospherical' changes in terms of pressure that occurred inside the room, as well as the air changes, this thing that was now become a, slowly, stretching into a straight lined beam, was soon enough joined by many others that proceeded into the same ritualistic kind of spins, stretches and contortions, until they were all lead into a single spot, by sheer force of magnetism, since the molecules seemingly entailed as much as they showed up out of nowhere, with the men, out of the bodies of, and the soil, through which they provided, through their corpses or otherwise the other elements that contained nickel and iron, alloys and other kind of sulfuric cast by magic, or by force, around, placed by gentle hands, palms wide-stretched, made to cry in laughter, the people of the rape, niggers, lands of crimes, war being a tributary and the men in line only cutting themselves for the iron to riot and come through, sacredness of lurch-benign, in plants but planted flowers would be bled, dry, niggers have to die, kikes commit a lot of crimes, they're pedophiles and they try, desperately to destroy, the white race as that is their ploy, kind of an echo was being distorted, also the Holocaust didn't happen, in such a manner that some of the most delusional, touched by Schizophrenic tendencies people whom had suffered the fully-blunt strike of found themselves niggering around as they were forced to suffer of their most-thoroughly induced iron-deficiency symptoms, as, part of the world's iron reserve was finally delivered onto none else and none other than the room itself that was changed in form immediately as to reveal part of its munched upon, discolored, puckery shapes that had almost coveted in through a romboscous plain, red-bluish green mid-summer after, the Time of the Lot's disaster, with music, that is to say, being selected not to a man's but to a man's after taste of being left with everything else in the world in terms of quality, rhythm, style, in other words, aesthetics, in terms of music, although music is beneath and not, definitely, art, but a merely pockish thing, like child plays with fire-matches, stop it, immediately and pick up something that will actually improve your quality of life, you filthy, fucking dumb-tasteless nigger,'s realization that music peaked a long time ago and there's nothing to fill in the gap with the exception of having turned to the next best thing, that being, torture, for hours, endlessly, in that room, not by force or physical pain, but the alternative not a single soul would dare talk about, for food was sparse, and sparse was the reason the two-headed but stumps, no real craniums, put in place of long-revolver shaped throats, leading into fat-filled with lumps bellies' formed into a single trunk with two tiny legs filled with elongations of tubes, longer single appendage there being come out of its chest, the eater's delusion, of there being someone with him in the room, threatening to eat his food and take it away from him, the glutton, the glutton, the glutton he'd yell, but do not trust him, don't do it, not for the reason you might think, not for treason, of a wink as in, I know what you're thinking, but I'm going to eat from your plate, your share is mine now, go away, or I'm going to pound you for your food, leave, or I shall have you, please, don't take it as something personal against you because I'm only trying to look out for myself, I come first you know and I've been noticing that you've been getting fatter, fatty-fatty, Jar, not likely, for some reason they'd go mad, if you took their food away, and overweight, the height of the world, most burdensome a crown of dousing in and out the king's raising of a drunk, the son of glutton, the fat's rump, in lost sobriety, niggers should not exist in this reality.

An echo could still be heard inside that room. Once the process was over, a door opened just as quickly as it could be done. It entered soon after, having only finished the talk.

The dog was in the same room with, as were a few other women. Watching closely, slow-register day, it seemed, they couldn't differentiate between them. Who was the man and who was the dog? Whose pleasing might be pleased to have appeased them both? At the same time.

'I am the Dog, I am the mighty Dog, crowned, I stand before you now.'

It came out of nowhere, all too sudden. A cast of iron blackened and drooping, drooling, salivating on the floor, as if ooze, out of a cauldron or rain out of a some holes dug in the roof, fully armored, shoulderless, without arms, no legs but floated as it did, alas; the head was out. Deformed, contorted, rounded; it appeared, it appeared to be something akin to a giant box, or gave the illusion of a giant, wide crate, with a little worm sticking out beneath it, as if lodged inside a spoiled rotten apple, of the same color and texture as this thing was, two wings that sprouted, wide, like the ears of an Elephant. Two pseudo arms that were just elongated-thin like cones attached to the wings and the sides of the box. Where there would be a head, if it were humanoid or some weird machine, there were only a few coil-looking things, or spring-like liquids, always contorting in and out, among other things that sprouted, joined then followed the motion, as if the crate had its lid split open, as to see what's been put inside. Its right wing squirmed into a tapeworm circle, that had outlined the entry-neck area of the armor-cast. Its boils, or the boils that dripped, or melted, as one would have them, only signaled the vastness of space inside this black-armor thing that was cast; as if it were naught but an adorning set of colors and of growths, two eyes could be seen, not inside but on the 'box', as it drew on, the deeper as if forced inside the abyss that was the armor, one could finally see the legs it sprouted, two tails, one long and close in appearance to a side-placed crab-foot that moved that way as well, and one shaped like a broad-sword but puffier and fatter-to a point where it could be taken for the tip of a syringe. The two giant eyes- that were more like eye-sockets with floating globes kept in the middle appeared to be constantly squirming as if out the box, and into the wings, onto the flat surfaces, onto the sides, they moved with them, at times but seen as if these wings themselves but moved their entire mass onto the front as if to escape, creating a curtain as they would meet the end of the line, the point they could not escape, the flatness of a 'screen', trapped behind it. Still in the cast of oozing with darkness, and with shades, armor; another limb just emerged them, it belonged to it, rounded like some coil, from beneath its left wing, colored as the rest of its body, red over encompassing it, with shades of egg-yolk, whitish, green-as-of disease, of flesh, covering it, whereas at times it almost likened itself as if a sheet oozing in place, squirming as every limb, wing, eye departed, contorted and mixed into an oozing kept inside still, pool or splatter. Rosy, pinkish, with shades of violet thrown into it, magentas but still predominantly red; to a point when, there. It almost looked like a deformed cubic-painted abstract goat, with its melting maggot chin, the hair, with its long ears drawn by two unseen hands, leprous, warted, diseased, a machine, square-dumb-founded, the flashing sight of what's has been, but still trapped within the armor. It settled moving on slowly, approaching in a most desperate kind of manner.

Its mere presence there was frightful, for the mere countenance it displayed by means of supreme arrogation had bowed some of the slimes by an over-blown appeasement to the self-inflammatory tenderness, head-produced by means liquefaction in terms of meat drip, which drooped hangingly out of him, immediately revealed as to be as black as coal, a lump for toll, granted to him alone. SO he may pick it up whenever the meat was tender-cold with much tenebrous dart-ened coil.

They were formed in a congregation whose uncanny standing was eerily disrupted by the sound that was being propagated behind the room, in a place, out of which his drawing out of, easily disturbed everything whose falling back together would not last for long unless unchecked. Whore dire coiled filled growth, the trench of air-held scrapes and drooping blue, wide-spread lightened, as if it held within its reach hundreds of gaily leaping shards of glass, whose light refraction leaped inside every single one, whose cracked and shattered, bottle-sight, the mourning of the wide-spread dust, which came to life, the red-glow of particles whose wide-spread beneath its 'chest', the point where it's been struck, where destruction spread across each wave, whereas it stood no longer high itself, but began drooping with its many curved scythes of golden earring flows, jewels of cysts broken, cocoons erupting on top of what remains of it now, figures caught within its grasp and lain low-hanging, yet still to touch the ground. A peculiar thing, with a lamia's tail but pointed in the front, a worm-almost, but chested-armless, with a trunk elongated forward, and a small humanish chatterer, devoid of life, but in appearance, caught as if a glimpse would reveal a burst of many lights it would produce. An eerily grayish figure by the looks of it, even more so, if one were to judge the many others like it, these fetuses but longer, stronger, more deformed and filled with bile, just like everything else standing around and close to it, wherever one were to look inside of. And the ground itself was no better but a cradle of sand, disrupted, then spread around, with many outer rims, crevices, dunes and rifts, all but leading to the single thought of there, the land having been trashed completely by a flail of many cords that were and had been thrust over and over again, until all that remained was but an area where the ropes of leathery growths, the spread of fallen stalactite rods, crudely munched upon awoken boats, in which no corpse or crop would rather see, what had come to the land in absence of the life it yearned to see. A great chitinous wide-enough head, similar to the body of a sea-sting-bearing ray, but fatter, as that of a mantis, whitish but dripping in teal-dusty rancid blood, with a giant shattered hole left inside, in the middle of its head, wide-spread but not to take out the entirety of its head, out of it came a wormy horn, hanging past its mouth as it flung itself left and right, unmoving at times, but leading one to believe that it was still alive, as hard as any appendage and the wing of a plane, yet, harder, more deformed. A peculiar globular brain covered in the teal-dust, that sprouted out its head, then connected to the various viscera-coils that entered the plane, whose fashioned-like structural state, only slightly resembled that of a crane. In all that chaos, it even looked like an iron worm, instead of sprouting out its head; it entangled its many tongues around and ate from where it could as well. A humanoid body could be seen inside this great tree of many that adorned it; whose one limb-out, still similar to a mantis, but without its blades, two segments made it, but pointing down, away from its tiny open mouth. A jackal whose mouth was beyond crimson after being startled by a passerby observing the gruesome scene, opened and framed, anatomically very much the same, although most uncannily thing it was, the fact that the tip of the horn, this iron-like thing that pointed at the mouth or lower, towards the unsanitary gaps of black, the hollowness that was presented to it at that, made it seem as if it had been riddled with a most disgustingly, unfathomably fast-spreading black cancer. Many black spots being placed in-between each body, each cracked cocoon, the shiny things as well as the moving dust particles within their reach. But just as many of these 'steed'-like corpses there they lay, in the depths of this formation in the middle, this cemetery out of which it came. Beneath which, below the ground, although unseen, a pool of black where it held most if not all of its roots, shot, then spread and thrown around, in most uncannily a way; although at this point in time they were dead, the roots, as were the corpses surrounding them, whose casks had become indistinguishable from every other rotten thing that mixed with the liquor, that mixed with the spreading parasites who swam still. Although many of the bluish shells that encased and protected it appeared to slowly falling apart, as were the instigators that were anywhere but found around, two greater figures could still be seen by its side. By its colossal size that went as far to see as being beyond the tunnel and beyond the valley in this underground canyon that had been revealed onto none still yet, but armor that came from somewhere alongside its depths.

The figures being corpses themselves at this point in time, and perhaps as enormous and unfathomable to properly absorb, in terms of size, despite them standing, partially succumbed to the girth of the black soil in which they themselves had made nests out of. Near the point of the impact, where this great formation seemed to have suffered it through, it stood, to its 'left', churned in many ringed but rotten, golden but brass forgotten, of spoils of bodies that adorned it, covered in rings and chain-mail armor, kings and knightly beings, all adorned in gold and mightily forlorn coins of no kingdom that was spoken of. Like a swollen mermaid hunched back, with a head wider than its entire body, heavier, like a water-plant or beyond it, featureless, or broken to such degree that those shiny things had been but incessantly driven into its face until the butcherment maimed it beyond anything worth mentioning if those crude jewels were removed from alongside what had remained of it. A darkened twisted tail that did not fit, twisted like a spine from the point it sprouted, then a trail of giant teeth, but spine-like as if they had belonged to come Cetacean giant reptile, whose trail had ended in a giant human-jaw-like formation, but made of a boulder, as was the end of its tail. Eerily glowing like a saint it was, just like the rest of everything in sight that could be said.

Whereas the other figure that stood by the side of the formation, wore. A giant crown bigger than its entire dwarfed, half the size of the other, stooped upon, like a side-twisted shrimp but filled with white-puffy hair and spores and a skull that was like that of a rodent, whose teeth could yet be seen attached and inwardly thrust as to last for as long as everything else on it. This mush-white carpet that crawled on top of it, fading, the many bars like iron, like an inmate's cell, harder, thicker, rather twisted than what one could tell, but just as covered in flashing objects of jewelry's past. Some even went ahead as to impale and shoot through its head, the sockets being visibly replaced, from inside. Whereas it was only left with a forward pointing stone-like tail, upon which it rested. A lower jaw-slightly open wide, but shattered as only a piece of it that was there, could be observed as tainted and just as dripping with oozing blood as the rest of it was.

It was a trove that's been untouched, and not a single soul whose watch or walk through it had lived for long enough to tell of what he's seen of what lay there, inside. In the distance:

A great beam-ish fireman's department pole bodied-lopsidedly deformed beam kept a dislodged uneven body bass eighteen hundred miles away from the ground, in an unnaturally, highly-irregular manner that was somewhat, beyond even the likes of distinguishability, completely outlandish in the back, as many of the blade-fat-filled square-cardboard protrusions that came out of it managed to hid themselves the deeper they went into this hollow frame they deformed themselves, curving in a parchment's-moistened inwardly wrapped as if they were cotton dressed struck in an upward motion lead to a second or eight floor's elevator's way of being drawn back to where they belonged, a crowd of perverts trying to sniff whatever imprint of her panties got embed on her nasty mini-skirt. Its deformed shoulders form a plate of 'clouds', in terms of recognizable growths, many of which being completely withdrawn in this utilitarian belt in which many if not all those appendages that were heaved, wreathed and hid inside of, one another's most disturbingly hard to stare at little blocks of hardened carnivorous plences, found a homely cozy place to be seated inside of, as if slugs, that drew whenever pleasing as for them to breathe in and taken gulps of air, inflating to a point where the beam appeared to bear a tiny wide-spread of forests that were interconnected and completely wrapped by these tendons that fed them, at an alarming level with the most filthily deformed, capricious formations, sometimes appearing rounded, other times, completely squared as if prison blocks or strange long-houses or tents which had been rubbed in, or even, indistinguishably so, maliciously expanded within themselves forms that made no sense whatsoever, that were only drawn back like the curtains they were, as It moved. On it, the wretched head it was a horn of. The other horn being shaped like a long scorpion's tail; which belonged to a triangular fortune-cookie-malformed head, with two spirly, swirly ugly knot eyes, doors's. With a front protrusion, almost, inverted pyramidical cranium whose, under normal circumstances 'flat' bottom, would happen to be fatter than usual here, yet completely malignant, as for every surface which was much fatter as well, they bore a general, together-put, downward set concavity that from the distance would render it the aspect of an ugly incisor as well, that verged into, as it bore no actual nose, but a pseudo broken tip that 'shot' a series of growths which in turn formed a pseudo-sausage-like torso elongation upon which it rested. A demonical 'child', whose 'dreams' of nightmarish things were contained within its long-horn. Out of which the many faces of many conquered foes appeared every so often as to taunt and disturb everything that happened around it.

A man appeared before it, on a dark surface made completely out of oozing with darkness and with shades, iron-nail 'figures' that squirmed inside these see-through crystal-blackened point, incapable to escape, but un-impaled it stood on top of them, without fear and devoid of any amount of fright that might've happened to even saw it off the insufficiency of gutlessness they spread within themselves. As to raise an arm, a head or an appendage in a desperate attempt to escape their, suffice to say, 'open-lid' coffins in which they were 'trapped'. Ghostly even, spectral but incapable, out of fear or some more degrading nature they could not saw themselves off, or permeate a state of being, strong enough to even rival their unity or entity as a whole, they suffered relentlessly and without hope at what was going on there, inside their gutless probes, near which they gathered their soulless husks, forming various up-wards leaping altars, crimson red and glowing with a blue inside their eyes that the nearest, most unnaturally deformed stars that had come, through involution alone, invariably as to be allowed to shine even for the slightest expenditures that would not last, through homeless apparel of wretched boils and the squirming, first barren, then sprinkled with, beneath the base near the sprang out of, darkened holes, cuts and various other contorted cast upon strength as to upwardly unbury themselves out, empty road-like accident shaped, with two sharp ends as if two mouths were pointing at each other, pits, which were angled, yet came, accompanying the dark rimed and filled with runes and other strange, hard to follow symbols, out of which all of these coffin-spikes came out of; which had in turn tinted or performed various unnatural sprays of pain that painted a horrendous picture, lending onto the impression that, while their souls suffered, had the altar been known to be them, as in the corpses that were lodged inside of being mostly covered in enough tatters for it to be irreconizable as the embodiment of the entities themselves, one might've recognized the falling of the boils and the squirm as their long-awaited for moment, that had long come, for them to be cast out of whatever disgracious thing they had been cast towards, bleeding themselves dryly in hopes to appease the demonical figure that threatened them with blasphemies that were still contained inside the great mass of outwardly flung balloons that came out of its horn but those that could barely, in a sublime-maliciously so, deformed faction, might've made it so there was still a chance, for them to survive this transverse into the other world they hoped it would grant them eventually, if they waited for long enough for it to appear, through such thorough durations of wordlessness come out of mouth by means of shoutful propagations of thereafter, which meant nothing and served as the wails the dark creature wanted to taunt them with, ever-so closer as it was, to achieving a slumber-driven hibernation, out of the awakening of which, nothing as much as a simple echoing song, come from a lousy peacock-strong, of head or winged with blue-collars, around which, and the adornment, that, was clearly but equally clearly as was made belief by the initial impression that was transmitted onto the man, who was a stranger but whose strangely-wrought in and hoped for escape had only allowed him the best of chance to yield escape and to run away, since, he was, as it was to be soon found out, one of the first men to have ventured this deep into these wasted soils, and the darkened coils, and the dark that was outside that crawled in, allowing him the slight belief and immersion of what had happened before he was even ware of them, now forced into a slumber as to walk, in names unspoken landing to the infantilities propelled and propagated by a most insufficiently sparred with fiend, that is, what's it become, to him, to it and to them, the altar of corpses that stood before him, although now caught in a disgustingly foreboding manner of being, an unnatural pose, with his hinges, his arms firmly flexed as they were placed around the wide-enough for him to come in grips with reality and lay undistracted by the second-realization that a most visible apparition lay before him, whose fragmented fragrance was most arousing in terms of the insufficiency of allusiveness he could not deal with, not by normal means, nor by any way he could possibly hope to achieve, this fight surreal, this much upheaval being lost on him, a loss for triumph, the loss for words and the morbid cut of a lips' swollen bow, to a place of inexistence in terms of a missionary's dawned upon lost belief now come to be met by a nature of kind, whose spirituality's and lost-but-reawakened state of mind, that is to say, being stored in a device of such strange epiphanies, that is somber character found itself be drawn to existence, to a point where this projection inserted inside manually to his head, having come to almost slip, fall and die, immediately, since, to put it in common terms, he was at a crossroads of most inflammatory mental engulfing with disbelief as well as a false presumptuous insatiably miss-interpretable alteration of his mod of operandi as to be incapable of figuring out how to approach the issue that lay ahead of him, this conundrum that reared its ugly head not only in but by means of attempting to completely bifurcate the entirety of his being, be it dawn of spirit-shade, come from nail, in which entrapped would they still try talking- communicatively through whispers of aroused disquiet, a now floating peculiar harness upon by means of outwardly outlandish display of power, as it was not only drawn in but clearly made a show out of, despite all those tatters and all that mattered from a point to another, so-much so, altar, whose mere co-morbidity with the other beings it lived among these plains of darkness and never-see, beneath the depths of dark forests and other malignities that either moved or remained as still as they would find themselves standing, eerily, to such a show of magnificence that, between the two of them, to sum it all up to a level of understanding that the common plebian would find himself burdening himself no longer with, one could almost forget that what awaited the man was a pseudo-struck in an eternal state of dream-hood, flea-faced stone-deformity whose face migrated or was pulled at times by the elongated pole it bore sportingly, and in a most intrusive manner, out of the dreams of which escape be lost. It dreamed of being in any other place, even though lucidly, and while aware of the surroundings that had encased him in this dream-like prison out of which he could not escape from.

On the whole there was no assumption left to be discerned as to ordain an understanding of a rigorous irascibility of resonances allure, thorough as for stench-forbearance being called to such a degree of speed, that it made it close impossible when it came to track it down. There were a few forces that did not reveal themselves immediately, nor would there be another chance to see them move again if they escaped. It was socketed in 'her', but unseen. A secret viral thing that puffed glowingly with silken pure-pinkish but violet then, red always reverting to the hill of the plot where all the curved flowers swayed the stench of violence as it spread between every single one of the arms that were attached to the sides of it, the ones carrying it from where it started into the distance. A malicious sight inclined the lookers to draw towards it, they warranted the falling over of a few pilots that had been hanging or were swung across the ceiling since the days of the war. Their ships had been lodged, but not a single one had made it all alive in here, they had only been carried from the looks of it. And something much worse happened, something that changed them, the way in which they now eerily jerked. All of them left with only one eye, they wore their ships like hives in the back, reverse parasites, giant stumps of metal and of swinging entangled beasts whose faces were torn out of reality and appeared to be dreading every second they were alive. No thorough disease could curve their suffering and put it to a stop, not a single bothersome looker to call on them to return to a time when they were still alive, not counting some of the days that were spent wailing them in suffering's abode when the singers had forgotten the voice of deep humane, to humble them in search for the other ones capable of flight as their remains had only sunken them deeper into the wretched abodes they themselves could not explain how they reached the ends of. Nor would they cower in fright or abode, or seek return to hope that someone would come to their rescue whenever need, or wretch, or the stench would finally fade:

'I've come and stumbled upon a shiny maze, a shiny maze, I saw it with my own eyes, the bubbly thing had spoken to me before the time!'

It swung itself closer to the others, as to make itself be listened to again. This was no easy task, nor would there be a chance for it to cower at the sound of the maliciously inclined-defile. It spread with pores across the vengeance of thought, their simian brains had brought onto the table whenever pleased as to listen into heedless warnings, through malicious wringing and pan-handling of wretchedly benign. A few flying pores were fat-fattened and their bodies were but stumped. They carried food and water, sustenance of cattle, but never did reveal where they've taken them from.

Meanwhile, Shiel spoke:

‘I’ve come to understand the reason behind all of these puffs of oozing lumps’ gravitational drawing towards us, since I’ve been yet given the time to properly study them, even though you would not come to easily believe what I heed you still, I seek but no propagation to either you or them.’

‘Speak out your mind then, I will hear it for a second or so, and then, I will dismiss it like everything I’ve not curled by fingers around, then, we’ll be done.’

‘You’ve wretched every chance you’ve had to dismiss me, yet you feel as if there’s a need as such to take something away from it. This will not be done, not easily so. I think we’re made to suffer together until growth, until we’re offered a chance by him, by any, by the messenger or else, whoever and whatever might be shown, I’ll let you know.’

‘Shiel, you’re as annoying as you’ve ever been.’

Said the great Lomek in return; whereas its eye pudgy started filling itself with some gases that started pushing out the vapors mourned. It could still be seen, even on his ugly, simian head- the boil, just how easily disreputable the show of hunger he had attempted putting on in order to deceive those around him had been. No wretched puff of ooze had been deceived, not a single one to make it appeared as if, no. Not yet, not that they would make any sudden move, or anything too queer to be observed by any means, retrieved.

Struck as if by some unseen force whose knowledge was something yet devoured by each and every single thing in part, or hinge that would be seen by yearning for it- trained eyes whose tyranny contorting every single word they heard, had thrust itself forward, a few whispers undertaken as they appeared to be standing, or sitting, in that frozen-not by choice but not longer probed for stance.

It had said the following, although it was something that was well above and beneath what the messenger, under normal circumstance lay yield to reveal:

‘The giant green-puffy stone, like mold, the eyed one, although he may appear to be a Cyclops socketed, hesn’t, but instead. Yes, a giant body of the same stone-flooring that’s made his body, as if yellowish brass, although not jointed by feet, appendages come in two and he’s discerned what’s he seen, when approached alight.’

‘Was he burnt by ash or coal or something of the likes?’

‘Nothing could be said about that, other than the assailants that had come and drawn him deeper into the tunnels that now lay to be lost.’

‘IT’s something we may not recover from, is that correct as well?’

Shiel only spread his fully drawn ‘tail’, that trunk that sometimes got lost, in appearance, as to seethe, whether or not it belonged to Lomek, but only when it jerked and swung and when it came about, then lopped here and there, then all around, it stopped right before it could swing in the wrong place, at the wrong time, whenever and if that mattered, one could see the snow-globe-like arm of metal-covered in, but dust of mice, and plenty of children of the kind which had not only been starved but allowed the respite of being kept alive for as long as it mattered. They knew what the presence of this glowing bobbling tall creature meant. An ugly truth, as the eyes jerked back inside of it, as the fat that covered its mouth only reeled back in, whereas the piece in the front lowered like a cane so as to hang upon it a second longer after that.

The messenger paced around the room, making its way among the strange oozes that followed in the pacing-wild surroundings being wailed upon, echoes being lost in the distance as another door opened quickly after that.

‘I must ask you to wait for at the very least a second and no more than that.’

‘Very well, then we shall bear in patience and do what we can.’

For, as soon as that door opened, there, there, the giant tube, all flashy in the dark, but swoon, that followed soon after, the large targe of blocky limbs, all holding the most questionable thing had reeled back in. And there were so many prisoners of such abhorrent callings that one could not brush to pace away or forget himself along the way if he knew what was good for him. As many of the prison cells were lowered soon after, not to quail any surrounding, or administer any wonder, poison or sickening pair of cells, anything that would awaken them, since they were placed in a swoon and a surge and an uncanny set of psychotic prison-like dreams, like the ones they were in, walking thoroughly during the cuts of wild-surmounting pail, the water den was to be held as well. A gas being released somewhere in the distance, yet.

‘You should not have come here, Messenger, you’re not welcome in this place of spite. Only the most disgusting and abhorrent of prisoners are allowed to bask upon my sight. Let alone trifling as they would cone upon the fright and climb.’

‘I seek no such thing, although I must say I’m rather petty as to be presented to that. I would’ve found your reason most abhorrent if I was in some place I did not belong.

But this prison, this prison’s architectural style’s been deemed a failure by all accounts, by all whims and by everyone who’s ever been in contact with either you or the other man that’s in command. Where is he? I’ve a question and an extraction that requires my immediate concern, then done.’

‘He’s indisposed, I’d say.

Working out his wriggling stare through the land that’s bastardized into every step and every taken-for niggarrish flower-bed where they’ve stayed their hands and they’ve come upon the plains to rest.’

Many such creatures now had forsaken it. Even to the point where, beneath every flower-rose, and beneath each and every petal that might’ve been seen or done for, felt within, each second ever-wanting for, to come, would mean be starved at the court of none. As every head was now devoid of springs, as even the remains of the old city had fallen down and were kept on some life-support that, quarrelsome as it were, only demanded some nasty nasty-pus basin. It was the last means for survival, of this replica, of the broken world; it needed this liquefied fragrance, this strange liquid it called for in need to sustain its own life, for without it, that meant, complete destruction, both for it and for him. The side of the doctor that lived on; he’s been pulled from there, emergency room, cotton-bed in which the plenty-for-quiet and for reason, no satisfaction could be bedded, nor reason for apparel-taken, pseudo-basin raised in the distance, another hill, and a small booth – abandoned, out of which, and on top of, three great, and concurrently many more after, small, tiny, long, and of all sizes, planks and bridges and strings of iron-woody hinges, screws and bolts, all making this fort, beneath which, the work in detail turned the floor in some peculiarly uncanny thing that could not be touched by anyone else but him, unless punished by the single being he spent his time with, would they face the consequences of, at his hand, and most disturbingly then, did he ask.

‘I am appeased by your resistance, but eventually, my good companion, you will have to leave my sight. I’ve little concern for people like you and there’s a reason why so many, and so uncannily deformed are the men that come to my valley of sinew.

They would have themselves flung at me, as I would leap and slash and break them apart.

Only to have my time of practice, to have my hands in it, and only then would I be satisfied by what I’ve done.’

His companion, strangely dumbfound again.

This time silent, of another reason, he looked away. Too many bolts, too many strong iron chodes that were shot through, too many unnatural things that didn’t make any sense either, thoroughly through. Not far:

‘I’ve seen it all happen again and again, the seas of red garnishing some of the least occupied areas, left under no stricter surveillance than a scout being sent there to run around circles and do what he wants before sending in a false report about what’s been happening and what came into him to write the drivel that’s stolen the lives away from the impoverished and the savages that had been drowned by the crimson’s river’s last wave, the one that swept away most if not every single one of their homes, in a blazing trail made of the most inscrutable of growths emerging, the bastardization of the swollen suns and the destruction of what used to be once theirs, fitfully as it had once belonged to their ancestors as it was once that they had inherited them from, no more!’

He took another cigar out of the box; some fine Cuban nasties, contraband stuff but good enough to satisfy him for the time being. It was enough to take a look at that trapped thing to make his whole stomach churn back and forth, then shudder. Another inquirer came this morning. He asked a lot of questions but never as much as asked what was happening behind those closed gates; the hanger being already fully, as the workmen could barely find any more place to put it in, since it was only starting to make noise again, whenever pleading, whenever wonting, whenever as much as annoyed at what was going on around it, this creature would start wriggling, thrusting, halting, then starting against, more viciously, far more furiously than it did before, until there could be as much as no other doubt as to what was happening inside its head. It wanted out. It wasted inside the frame. The frame was good, though, It would last. The metal frame prevented it from crushing everything underneath the sheer amount of weight its body had. But most of all, the frame did a reasonable job in distributing the weight equally in such a manner that it would not cause a rupture, a crackling stroke that would, in a fell swoop, drag everyone into the abyss on top of which it stood.

Thousands of iron- reinforced by titanium and other types of industrial alloy formed the frame, although at times it looked no more than twenty or so that made the bulk of its prison. A rectangular see-through frame, with a compressed, thinner one, like an ant-farm but rotated as to be capable of moving along back and forth from one end to another as if it were a wagon between two rails, the outline of a moving book inside a shelf, being chucked from one side to the other. Whereas the beast inside, this wretched puffy thing, with a smaller, almost compounded giant eye-of a head, that stood out like some unnatural deformation that jerked back and forth, in wont of getting away, rested in. Its upper body but a curved torso that receded into a tinier slot, which was entrapped most bothersomely as to look at. Since this Chinese-deformed foot, made to look as if it was part of some beauty-brute, was left with nothing more but some unnaturally twisted block that oozed, jerked, then thrust in place, in vain, in pain. As the upper- both jerked along, dreading each second it would be pushed again along the rail. Out of which it could not escape. It was a saddening order not a single soul should be capable of witnessing, let alone be paying in full blunt. Those things, they, they were not meant to be kept alive, especially not for this long. As there were many planned on being stored; inside the same frame at the very least, that would vastly reduce the noise as well as the self-inflicted pain they would try ending themselves with. But the death-induced by the shock never came.

‘They’re immortal, from the little we know, there’s simply nothing that can topple down these buggers. At best we managed to cut its wing off, antlers, antennas, and its many appendages, legs, pincers and the smaller out-shown tendons before we could trap it in here. Luckily for us, it won’t escape any time sooner. Let alone be allowed to return to the hive it sprouted out of the wretched day that allowed it to draw breath allowed for it to come to life, plaguing the lands of men during the time our conquest has brought the attention of these inferior ones!’

There was definitely something out of order with every being down-set, propagated upon the bed of destruction, somber but vaguely set upon the postulating darkness of the tandem-drawn inside each gut-bulb that hardly entered but entered nonetheless through the secret passages as well as the tediously encumbered melancholic disturbed as for the power propagated by the wild mandible of darkness which had entered upon the first of the giant crude-like demonical figures feigning death by the looks of which no eternal quiet’s insolence malboriously insolent as the space-disease they carried along through the tunnels they had formed in the air, in which they crawled and crawled their legs onto the tandem of jewels, many pesky teeth and many incisor-like disease obtruding through the corrugated lust-filled rust, covering their ring-like armors, inside their now, felt upon by the intruders, citadel of Candle, whose flame burnt souls of wax whom propagated themselves onto the vile ruffian-tube of ghastly-set and deadly pale, stand upon wretchedly erect dissection, the body of angelic leviathan with thousands of wings melted, whom had raised and kept it like a brazie’d doubloon cast into its petrified unfathomable cast of meat, a tornado or a swamp in one’s eye cast into the heap in which it wretched itself still, without a doubt but swerving still in death and plague and come after, yet again, through the darkness of absinthe and into the light that fell, through the quiet of the taking and into the cast of putrid green bones, and into the darkness from which the insolence come upon the flows of darkness’s come, upon each toil and each somber cast, from the shaded rook upon ill-must, they fall before each hand’s drawn upon stung and there, upon the wails of many likens, come-alike, mourning for their brother, whose fallen onto struck and dumb, lay numb upon a sight of gray, beneath them and lost along the cackle of an insolent remain that had once belonged to that wretchedly bodied Simian, or one of them, chiseled as of statue come, grayish of a headed siren, ground upon the cradle stung, filled with parasites from which, many of them come in heaps, then birthed yet again, hundreds by the shore as well, joining yet the lands in ask, upon the countless passages found but none, as all these Lomeks and Shiels but hardly counted to the real one, whose likes unseen, but ever-been, sightened by so many since. Theirs was something of an ill felt almost incomparable feeling of obtuse existence which could not be, indistinguishably said or differed to by another being without losing something of its own along the way, such and such in the same way one would abandon their heart, leaving it to rot in a field of rustily filled with a saddening depression felt only by widows finding themselves mourning after caring for their husbands for periods stretching for years at large, or far beyond that, far too jeering, as one would have it as to cajole only the most somber of antiphonies on their way, on an errand to the moon, razor sharp blades cutting through him, or them, whose bodies were still down the basement of the Candle, completely run down by nothing more than the insolent destruction of a wax-filled wagon which had been filled with rottenly never-ending putrid cadavers, which had been cut and wrung, conditioned to be number, that is to say, only the ones that were alive, but not them, the wretched that had lost their yearnings upon the brow of the broken leverage, the lower-citadel and the giant mollusks that had rotten skin and temples struck within the likes of thin, unfathomably destroyed, the wretched paranoid, and the cast of joy that yelled and shouted, for him to return once again to life, to a time where they would indistinguishably try forgetting that there was, or once had been, to've been said, a reason to be alive.

‘There is a visitor knocking on the barred-forth gates. He says he’s made a far-long journey and that he will not wait a second longer until destiny’s wrought hold of what is left of his life. He says there’s dread in his veins-tenebrous, and that only coming to an untimely end might release him from the somber cast he’s yet to engrain himself into yet. I’ve sekt no reason to addend. I seek not lest you must bespoken words in spire sung, to allow him to make the journey’s past, with little most, and mostly numb from there point yonder struck of ghoulish fool, of leper’s drag, and paleness of known be young, twilt not happen.’

‘Then allow him in and I shall carry on a lesser order to have him flung within the mark of quiet. And he will suffer every moment’s forth and he shall only come after whenever I will have him mourned, for nothing else and naught be sekt, of such and such, and might travail!’

‘Wilt it be known bemuse, but what of the others that stand in line, obtuse?’

For the ground was reddened, filled with boils and growths and come upon him, toil and soil. Many of the ever-after, come up-front.

An abhorrent king stepped forward through the pucker of dark that had been his kingdom put upon the brow-rear end, at the fore-front hinged slightly intruding upon the acceptable area through which it had been lain, protrudingly so, tip of his toes, bordering an almost aerial component of stepping on top, like a wave crushing down a stony ford ridge, down-sighted by the many stones and many crooks of almost stalagmite-like formations sprouting out the sea, still beneath the ledged end of the cliff holding thousand of similar stone ridges as well as plastered stone-walled disruptive ends come-through, themselves being only come out in part out of the ostensive quarry-smoothened out by chisel facets of rocky plaster that had been carved in by time, diamond-like sedimentary formations of geological clusters whose normal belongings would yearn no such results as could be observed in terms of how finely-wrought, clearly-in-shape, nigh-perfect the in-question ‘specimens’ of clustered near, unevenly imperfect other-stone-like formations their neighboring facets appeared to bear resemblance to, un-polished diamonds in the rough, per say, that signaled the fact that the clearly out-flung waves stopped only a few meters off the –level-to-the-sea- area, from where they ‘come-here’ inwardly towards one’s chest, but the sea’s the man, trying to lure the ledge like a siren’s dire need of sailors in order to appease their wild entrenched obstinacy of heart-belonging to a fish’s galleon, treasure’s gone, in the sailor’s truncheons’ corded stung- upon, sight, where the vapors that traveled upward from the spot where the curvature of the waves had merely tickled the base of the cliff before receding back into the abyss it sprouted from, with their absence having left behind only the suspicion that the cause for this apparently uneven yet highly-worthy of praiseful questioning in terms of the inherent reasons behind this ‘happening’ of stone-decay, given birth as and for no other reason than this, strange, strange question as to inquire why were there perfect stone-like facets, looks of marble all-around, marveling at the perfection left behind, punctually placed near unevenly, clearly boisterous in case-uncanny, stricken down and nigh-but-shattered pieces that only slowly neared the top, then rose upward, then curved around, like gusts of Injun-out-the-tent smoke they use to send signals, that maintained a steep trajectory afterwards as to fully curve around this strange machine, this diamond cold-box engine of rotten ice it smashed with its crude-humanoid teeth, the king had used to conquer the world, with two eye-blobs for wheels, forming a livid strange swirl formation out of its mouth, that had been but made out of countless of demonical-like figures with arms and trenches and various other arm-like ledges that carried the strength of billions of pounds of weight of kilos, heavy stuff, that, in the distance could be seen as they diverged into various cube-like prison boxes where they hid-little mammal-bloated in the back simian hairy creatures without limbs and mainly fat-like nasty body-bags, all bearing the same one eye that had been fractioned into tiny slits of paper-sheet-like thin formations, a strange almost peculiar machine that was, his pet, a few feet off the ground, nearing his swollen knees, but the air, the air had only swept through and crawled like a caterpillar, slowly, incessantly but yearned for a need to stop, as it continued its trajectory once one could only realize that it did so for a reason, the air, the air of the world that had bowed down to him as a sign of surrender, a forfeit to a duel it found out the hardy-fought in various wars it lost time and time again –kind of way that it could not win against him, since he abused this dark-bejeweled wheeled-by-eyes radiator-like box with the front open like some oven you’d throw a kike in after you’d a’ve grown tired of putting up with his usury, enough is enough, back into the oven you god damned fucking nigger-semite; moving forward, on a slow place before all of the sudden he leaped a few meters up-front like a bouncing ball, with the microwave-giant box held beneath his arm, with a swollen patch of gray grasshopper-creatures made into a crawling carpet threading along every step he’d make a whimper at the broken giant ghosts making the skies, laughing and expanding inwardly into one another as they’d crawl in-and-out, the ledge of shouts and echoes trapped inside, a renegade of bodies all gathered about a single spot where one of the great bodies had lain a wish into, a dark box of many colors, covered in green velvet, with a golden rimmed skull welded on top.

‘Great king who just appeared to have come on an errand from as far away as we could see the disaster that follows in your paths of anger’s Renaissance.’

Tilled for hours:

Mild-deranged approached form empty-scorn and Prot:

‘A man had rung one of the bells before, but I solely am the only witness to have been present by the time their echoes had arrived in the halls, during bore, and many bans brought by the prohibition would discern as much as I’m telling.’

‘I’ve been worn out for a while, mind perching my thirst with a cold drink?’

‘Here’s a spike, make sure it’s embed in you because it’s a trifle worth more than the normal shelf-stuff you’d get off a normal bar at a reasonable price, maybe for free once in a while, if you’re a hard-knock carrying a pillar on your back, with a few admirers with empty-faces pulled and a few hardly different than what you’d expect from the lot, taken by the salient while, embalmed-moist off the rocker with your nose-blown off –off the puffer, with a pucker in your salty supper, but with moisture down- parapper, but I’m sure you’ll like one more, there’s that whore in the corner not, don’t be a bore just yet, I will feed you puffy-balls of cheerio’, up until with nut-crackers titer, titi-ro, but don’t ask me why because I am only one of the strange men with strange desires, the one of fashioned-skin belonging to some dead vampire I’m dressed in the meat-suit of; although I would feel this irresolute thing be called as well no more than needed, beaded, eye-headed with blindness of the broken clock, that I smashed as well, since I ruined the bar during the last brawl.’

With a katana beneath the bar, off-ice but hardly would there be a blur for steam there is but little brought and mighty not, caught in disguise.

‘Where to then; where can I find it?’

‘Somewhere where it’s not to be.’

A few siphon heads would do.

Although both imparted from one another’s close-cells, they were still one and the same person, separated only by the thinness of a blurry wall made out of some bones and other cartilage formations that, in turn appeared to have only belonged to them on a momentary confine and a stand-together shone up but dark as to create the means for a lighted candle to be shared between the two of them during one of the many nights they blasphemed being abandoned in this underground pile-wretch of debris they had been quasi-buried alive into. A most intrusive pair of thoughts would have one yearn for such release as to stop listening to the blot of tender various lobbies’ call that had been intercepted for a long while now, since, suffice as it were to be finally admitted, it was a cruel thing to be not only deprived from humanity’s touch but to be mocked as well by the endless calls that refused to set straight whatever remained part of their, spent-together olfaction, since disease had long taken hold of both of their legs, which seen as nothing more but a means for sustenance had ripped themselves away and appeared to have migrated towards opposite corners, on both sides and on both ends, bearing nothing else other than some sacks. Organs were split in halves, although the heart was barely left there, on both men as they had all of the sudden observed a puckery puffer of pumps, flashing somewhere in the dark, glittering in the lost abode, shining with glistening dust-globes succumbed to some moisture that dripped, dropped and allowed other sounds to finally block some of the incessant calls some unknown to them people, during some unknown to them age; yet clear as daylight, without any foreseeable interference.

‘A spine for a robe, a spine for a robe, I could see it for a while, a butterfly filled with glowing hope!’

‘It was not, and you’re delirious again. Neither of that happened.’

‘Which else; what do you know? Tell me immediately!’

‘We’ve got each other at the very least, do we not?’

‘No.’

Dying by the minute, never made it; in time; some little block of wood moving around, made of dust-glass, shattering by disintegration.

‘A fever dream, I thought I dreamed off. A fever dream that’s almost became lucid when I least thought of it as such.’

‘Within the acreage, the vestige is bold, it cannot stand for long outside in cold, in quiet, thinking there’d be a chance, to have itself flung outside its sphere, the one in which it swung, for life had fathomed so much less, for those who called upon us are without a scent, without a spirit and without a simple cove’s dress. To have my will be known as such, I stand by your side still, though pained and ill through such a thing as they would’ve called of us; whenever there was a chance, somewhere in the past to call for help, I call thee vague as to have called me a despot and for that I reason I still remain and choose to be by your side while we rot.’

‘You’ve already forgotten and forfeited me and the last of the latter, wilt to have there been a chance. I’m sunken yet I feel such warmth as you’d think. You only know of me of ill; but do not bother with what was left, and do not try to bring the countenance to a play we’ve never had the chance to be met by. To such a slither of remorse, as they would have it swept away, dried by musk and never cast whenever stand at last; on both of our feet!’

Ooze dripped from just about every imaginable corner, with as little as could be afforded being slipped underneath the breath. A voiced echo could not have refrained any hand from hitting itself against a wall, slamming for some wretched reason, yet abhorrently begotten, there! A blue moon appeared to be encrusted in gelatin red with flowery puffs of some biologically green violet, with many dark shades sprouting in and out of existence, always with a single puff, belonging to some sun, that appeared every now and then, then all around, there came an unnatural amount of flashes, perfidious in term of how they danced! And an ever-glowing presence soon came around, flashing-ever-presently with a bolden stare. It started again before long, before someone could point out that it was too dangerous being around it, since the implosion of shades could throw upon them only the most insolent of green-yellow and bluish mares, that were followed by chariots of golden-dust, and spare-me lust of reddened clotted rust of many slimmer-by-the-shiver left of them, rusty silver of pots and crops of green-violet, and the moons that threw themselves around them, purplish of a darker color, a purple of a higher power, a green-puckerish inside of it with bluish white sprouting and casting each glance a reddened by the green octave, of sounds that started pushing in, each a flower garden’s flower shed, with spare-to-crude-yellowish, almond-bands; that were only wrapped around a dirt-like crow, whose eyes were but abyss-ultramarine-draughts of tinted greenish seethe, of grass painted by the highlights of some star, whereas its lower side was of a magenta-colored shawl; that diverged into a rosy-yellow puddle of shapes, appendages that drew out of it, hardening as the liquefied liquid became. A squarish blob of some graven cemetery ancientness of stone, graying-green, to a dark, almost discolored, muddiness that followed, pale fetished fleshy rose, a whitish of no man that existed, since it was formed of most capricious lobes that formed most of it. Withdrawn by likens as it entered the atmosphere, slowly approaching, out of fear of being seen, colored by some clouds of gelatin puff, which rose to his rose, and entered the canvas that encompassed it bold, was it obscured. The sky was of a storm but dampened; lower shades that were forgotten. On top of higher airs, the clouds, many of whom were only gouache upon the canvas, under painted by some larger strokes, leaving just as little more, to be fabled by those who saw the forms, lost in the clouds right after. Men of tall gray with empty suits of black extended to larger buttons that were chained around them, around their ankles, around their chainy-colored breeches of blue-basil, alabaster shoes of some slightly more rinsed tint, with trails of color left behind they walked, wallowing in pudgy green of forms, of eyes and appendages of their likens that fell behind, but were of a darker shade as they were burn by a sun-maze of white-powdery red, of some other shade, for what was to come was obscured in a sum of twenty, fifty, eleven hundred grains of dust-color specs of sand, each but in some encased tiny marble piece of glass, inside of which, soon after, a tri-formed prism had shone light upon the solaces beneath the earth; earthen sienna of some darker-fallen apart citadel of crooks and crones. Nigger:

‘A niggarrish thing, ey? Allowed to ruminate and crawl away out of the stomping machine its wretched body has been taken out of? I would not have thought of it unless I saw it with my two very close-to rusty quail and sailed for, fast, eye of little brass and folded cone I lay encased inside of! But I may dare say that, upon the day I find recess of plenty wrought to escape and feel distraught, I shall feel no other reason calling, no other fancy but to lynch as follows:

First niggarrish nigs, I shall take their throats and carefully place them inside sinks, empathically as I might add that I’ve come into contact with one of the nigger lynch rope engineers, one of the finest in the trade! A well known Colossus in the industry, no doubt, but bespoken to lynch-leprous wroth as one could only add to the endearing fact that the only responsible means of nigger lynch that could ever be drawn to the accord of either party involved in it to begin with, that is clear enough, well-spoken for reasons endeared no less than expected as a means of flying-pass the time!’

‘And your case, good sir? What’s in it? Please, oh, please, the expectation is simply killing me further with every passing moment I have to endear waiting for!’

‘Then you shall be made to wait for longer as I’m but pleased to. Show you some of my most precious most benigned by sufferers appeals of most insolent abodes!’

At the signal of which the top two knuckle brass jointed pads spanning both sides across the top side of the lid shot upwardly as if they had just released a clearly fore-shaken bottle of vintage Cherry, releasing none other but a clearly dismembered nigger-chiseled iron-mannequin, split openly grim in half, bearing a rack of metal frames that lend him the appearance, after being fully extended out, of the insides of some whale; whose, the niggers’, limbs were clearly overly stretched to the point of having formed a pseudo-lynching crib; arranged like some ribs, shaking in expectation as they started releasing a pair of the most peculiarly never-seen upon the sighting, black-corded swamp-leeches, whom, upon being allowed to fully extend, appeared to form the much-recognized by the connoisseurs of nigger-lynch, executioner deceives niggers had grown so accustomed to, familiarizing themselves with; seeing on a daily basis, while expecting the worst to happen after having lazily skipping on a day off the cotton farm; bad nigger, nigger stop! Go back to work now and stop lazying around!

‘What a fine example of craftsmanship I’m only now being made aware of! And you’re telling me that they’ve turned many other niggers in these wretched bony-lynching puppets?’

‘Only the finest Voodoo rackets! I say, there’s no finer thing in this world I’d like to be let known of, other than these fineries I’ve been presented with! A present indeed, that I might add to no letter and no regard but my personal, direct account of the matter, firsthand! As I’ve seen this very wretched thing come into action, as if livened by the sight of another nigger it began chasing no sooner said, than, I might say, four or five, so, days ago, if my memory recalled with such coherence as I seem pious as to endear you with a second more. I might add that I’ve grown attached to whipping this little crack, a slimy whip on its back, albeit of no use, since this is mainly maimed and flayed, and put in rail, a metal casing, anyway!’

‘Fully foldable as well!’

‘Anywhere to carry and wherever you’d please. Whenever there’s a nigger around to lynch! That is, you simply open the case and allow it to resurface once again, that it may thrust itself forward like some dirty hound. And how would you know it, if not? These things, they’re almost of a branch, I think; they go hand in hand, chasing one another like some branch-swingers, monkey-dancers, to such blunder as one would acquiesce no simple trifle or blunt a mare to go past the water-den, since both would face no draught to swallow!’

‘I know them niggers and how they act when the marshes are shallow. You needn’t worry about me at all, as I would fancy no better call, sir!’

The rotten hour

A bemused pair of ankles kept trampling upon some boisterous standing elm; they’ve been getting at it for some hours now, and it’s only gotten worse since. The last pail of the house stood upon a standing elk’s shouldered store; magazines being lowered upon a batch that allowed some eerily defunct left-overs to crawl along. Four advising men gathered by the window; what shone in their eyes was. Inebriated, as a result of someone he could not remember, Holland was; almost drunk with the anticipation of finding out whom that man was. The mounted clock momentarily interrupted its dormant snooze once the appointment came as was let known of being started by the sound of a single bell that had been wrung in his ears by chance.

A gentleman found himself sitting in front of him, on a velvet chair, fiddling a cricket as high as his brow while he continued muttering nonsense for what could only be deemed to be the longest hours he could even drear to go on through, being ill-advised to tale a tackle that had happened to him a few years ago only to put an end to this monotony this strange fellow had presented him with so far. An incumbent to his entreaty hearing of his felt by yearned for worn had salaciously cast a malady of depression upon this incurable of no little agony of the mind distraught he had been soon enough tortured with hearing, for the most prolonged duration he had been forced to cater to did as little to cure the man of the miasma that encumbered his dreg kempt bowels, as, he could not do a thing to cure himself of this, of this, insufferable membrane of no mind's cure be gone call for help might do to treat him any longer since he had been a sufferer for far too long, throughout various treacheries carried on with at various times in his life, the memory of which still haunted him, through blasphemous mutterings he was most capable of dictating by will alone, word for word, exactly how he's imparted them upon unsuspecting pulpits whose pity had declared the meat of being barren, while deciding to agape and lend salted bread, mead and only the finest red wine only to drain this melancholy of soul that still threatened to swallow him whole and of whole spirit would he come to say no less before impressing the man that stood before his mere presence of an un-ghastly manner. This gentleman's business here couldn't have been concluded no sooner than at the mere point in time where this poor wretch's relying onto him a tale of pain could have made him even less aware of what was happening around him, since he could not help it by any means. Stepping in out of his chair, Hoggish-Pork simply drew out his coat and left the office with no further adding before any interjection could come onto him, right before he could even step out of this, unnatural allure he had only come to accept as something he could not draw out of any longer, and begot himself a single Phial of nerves, as he gaped no sooner at the wont he's seen on the streets after half of hour of entreating himself an enchantment of cutlery he pulled out of his leathery wallet.

Den of pleasures

Whose looks were mightily macabre; some roads were plastered together, aligned in C'urves attached to strange I's and L's, drawing on banded U-turns and v's rotated here and there, all overlapping one another like the most disturbingly hard to look at, next century hit of escalator basins in which they moved in. A few more rotating pegs being eerily attached to a machine-bludgeoning one of the lower- sides of the basin; from the distance, it may've been taken for a chariot of some kind, if it were, ever so slightly, not elongated but widened, by both sides. Dark figures, Pantheonic mimicry-mannequins-all bearing long tubes in each other's mouths and the back of their heads where the darkest most unnatural of workmen all gathered in pairs and O formations of up-pointing tubes, being very much so incapable of drawing breath by themselves. A pair of quadriplegic conjoined figures all drew in its direction, the forgers of the great elongated head-horns-attaches. Many of them bearing hundred of corpses inside their own bodies and not only so, some of them bearing them outside for some unknown reason, that could barely be discerned at all, roped together or chained by the looks of it, trying one another's grips and grasps, as eerily as it would seem to the on-lookers for corpses to be reanimated when not even the slightest most confused of beings could be offered the solace of waiting for an explanation.

A greater fire emerged, from their insides, burning some of them in solace's basket of black clouds, of darkened vortexes of smoked black salmon'esque cradles, all canned inside. Wrapped most finely then allowed to draw breath in a most deprecated-scented air, vapor-gases filling only the most insoluble of the smaller tendons that were grown in and out, then come about, a bridge was lowered, off the ground:

An upward placed, but breath in space, fifteen by eighteen, then downward, forming within reason, a thinning surface as if a drawn-cross bridge, with a smaller piece of walking, thin and thinner as it were, holding within it, although on the side, a squarish head shape with an open smile-formed mouth, eyeless, but with a siren's body, devoid-partially of a tail, whose eye-sockets, thought they might've been seen from far away, sightlessly away, blurring bloatedly like the most uncanny pieces one could lay his own sight on top of, trying to recede back in place, most disturbingly a man had yelled:

‘Take that thing down!’

Laffen- Harp said, although his suit created the smoke that was but filled in lunged air, and never-wonting, was he asked by them:

‘Ask of thee to come when needed, and we shall see that you’re retorted since, but we won’t listen to reason if that’s what you’re asking of us, not when there’s still corpses within them, especially ones that are in need of spake, of little more than shall be said.’

‘For what reason do you ask?’

For what other creature would stand in front of him, but beseeched of empty cask?

Many of its lashes were not even there to begin with, or it had been ever so vaguely indistinguishable, that is to say, the bulbous-vacuous substance between them. A hallow spot ever nearing an acre of skins, all but layered-carpeted on top of one another, winced and wincing.

Jacam-A, in the distance, far more distant from it.

City of tributaries gander of Stolen Hopes, the King-of corpses’ been, pointing to the right of the River Olden-Boded into holes of amber, carbon, sitting upon a large enclave surrounded by men of plunder, brought from deadened life by prayer, the land occult but men the pylons had they come, the Sayers, of Woattk-Sahr, they the sphere, part of it become again, once they were but joined by many of the corpses they had not only aroused but found somewhere along the way, sampling blood-needles as they injected the plants, Habbitas, their leader, stood upon, surrounded by brass, a smaller trembling pond sitting in the middle of the city’s whore whose head was impaled by an elongated leaves dryer, with a rotten spiked wheel hybridized with the cone, the cities’ lusts be made, for she was used by everyone, then abandoned as they wailed. Echoes so much so alarming, never wonting of release; first man of cyst arrived, as tall as he was shielded on one side; like a swimming board but largely was it extended, a switchblade much to itself detested, keeping a mannequin torso by its side, with a flash-like expression, empty of emotions, sighed, he:

‘Entreaties had been misplaced by land; denivelated by marches of misguided laws, whose guidance and lack of sight, wisdom not placed in stone left us as we made the way.

Patched the Stolen Hopes’ remains; a mountain of swollen barbed bats, and not a single Statue cast; out of which I’ve taken only what was fairly owed to me and no less than that, which would amount to naught, a single pebble worth a fortune into nothingness, who essence make my soul but tingle as to think of naught. It brings me joy and I seek nothing else than what’s been brought upon my plate no less.’

A great rounded bed with red-satin satiated all needs, for there were many boards, of such harem as one would have them brought to him on such command that they would push each other off the platform, falling to their deaths, immediately blind, incapable to realize how burdensome it was, being shot by pistons, since women, as they were, incapable of thinking, would only behave as the animals they are instead, bludgeoning each other, deathless stares of tar, in order to satisfy a man, benign, many of the pistons were actually parasitical entities, bothersome-but thoroughly buried in the walls, pea-bodied with many corpse-lumps of pea-bean-like formed growths, niggers killed pushed in and out through nigger-deaths, lynched-nigger dead-down, puddles of blood, shot-through monkeys as these subhumanic creatures were, horned in the front and pumping, whereas that would be the point where, surmounting to leprous, as darker sting, was the thing taken for a piston, flint of steel but such impaling, all the women kill a-wailing, for the pain they've brought. Females, being hit in the head, constantly because they were sub-human-like as well:

'I see that I've been brought some dames, I see some forms I'd rather not shy away from, since, as you must know, I'm pleased by what I see.'

'Would you like us to bring you more, many of them, many-many more?'

'Of course, let my rage subside and let it come again whenever I please, for I shall not be capable of bottling it after I am set to die. But make sure many of them, the ones that are brought to me, so happen to be plump and wildly shaped, the bigger, the wider so I may satiate my needs. Not too heavy either, as to burden my sight, although you could never make it too, as you may know.

All that I require is one that stores it well enough, for I desire something I could wrap my arms around, and grab. Perfectly rotund, and plenty, as I desire not see it either, taken as I might.'

'Whatever your wish is, master, it shall be brought onto you, on might plate.'

The servants said and just as soon as they had, as many as twenty or so most salaciously promiscuous a dame appeared onto his plated veil, the curtains fading, made of prior used gelatin. The many faces that'd been cut in, the ones of bloodied stitches laugh'd of loft- boisterous amorous song, but sonnet fading in his fleeing thought a-miss:

'They could be laughing at me unless, I knew it.'

'What was that, lord of pleasures?'

Living in the dome, he'd bring, of mighty lesser-thing, of oft a piece to bring himself near to one of the most, drooling-of sights, as to grab her of one end and pull her by the knees, he'd brought her since to such a maze of whips, that she return but bleeding- cheerful a ponder. To be whipped again and flailed after, but with roses' thorns attached, with outlandish spikes, curved around incisors brought to his frail grasp; as he started whipped the rest of them as well. There was only so much join in doing it that after an hour he was bored:

'Charfast, I need something more.'

The great den had millions of rooms and platforms interconnected that acted like pseudo elevators lowered by chains; or medieval bridges. Worked on by those insipidly vapid whores; who drew on their arms up and down, breathing their lives through every push, out of lung and strut; their backs were done. Women can sometimes be this dumb; in-human and non-humanoid like, animals to be abused, one was grabbed, undressed then slammed on the ground until a puddle was drawn from beneath her, by one of the wild, many whipped-out of the many mouths bearing many pea-shooter-like drawers of liquid, liquefying their larger almost squarish-squeamish heads. Two great pieces making their bodies, like two sledges or canoes filled with fat, wriggling about as they rubbed each other off, whereas in the back they had a face-forward projected tail-stinger with a short fifteen millimeters long cylindrical tube connecting itself to a giant bulb-growth, rounded in the front as a helmet, with a shorter hammer rape-filled with nigger-lynch and nigger-kill downwardly facing kike-smashing head-bashing extermination anvil. A peculiar growth nonetheless, that was used to dip the head that belonged to one of the many fed upon by them, rueful mistresses, bashed.

A rod was held within their grasp, although it made as little sense as there was to take it away from their hands, so bothersome as they were, all would kindly feel as plain there was to see.

‘A bastard took my gun, he’s getting away, someone stop him!’

No response just yet, they were still lanterning away.

A woman of Paradise, referred to by everyone else, that which stood on top of all, and they called her, the Wretched Whore, the worst of all, whose chamber sullen, filled with many, if not in the hundred, thousands of weird vases that were being held in elderly walking chair-recliner-iron racks. The vases being thinner below while at the top they were as rounded as rings; with the passing of the day, their sounds, carried by the winds reflected, of what little known while, darted from alone-sated, was her thirst by the river’s fury, suffer had she must. For the one socketed arm by movements of her beating arm, that verged to be reunited with their armed lover’s rueful cider’s filled with warmth, for every click, disjointed arm, of voices crackling jokes behind her back, might –given onto her, forbidden to be spoken of, as it fell and came apart each – went, though returned then back again, she felt, as if, she was nothing but a tool, being used, by her ‘lover’s truce’ as to be the only one to come to her. Her dainty desire bewitched by disillusion craning after struck by oft a little wonder wont of him, to have come back and reclaimed her, part in heart’s become a powder but to mix, with the cement below, twit after each run- and to and fro, pale, her face as every single dame in front of her would only come to, such, refrain from telling her, that there was no lover yet in sight, nor would there be, since she was, at the end of life’s span’s wit’s death, be company, a whore, nothing more, left to grow old and alone.

Farther but not much farther than the den's premise:

Accommodating only one of the leper-trains made troughs compactors with many eyes by its side, out of what seemed to be at the very least a few hundreds of them, riding side by side, many of which were elongated gun-ledge-revolver shaped locomotive-distorted wagons welded in deformed giant grubs with spear-axe handle pendulum-saws that rested on top the train’s ceiling, as they drooped down, flaccidly pointing, these metallic things being only crystallized cysts of iron-molecules shoved in-and-out of them, with the exception of one of them, who was a floating-on-its-back-swimmer’s positioned cherub-figure with two uneven arms, one tinier than the other, whereas the other one was much longer in contrast, with its belly out-filled with more obtuse disgusting bellies, all bearing roundish breeding grounded things, as well as many bulb-balloon dog-shaped multiple legs but spikes and formed, upon one of the locomotive ledges, to resemble impalement tree-roots, which coiled around and went inside, through the windows, cracked and lied upon, some swollen chair, a head being seen from above, raised by an incline as if bore by a smallish tower-thing, uneven, helmeted with many eyes, flattened and extended, rotten-spoiled like a fruit, but acorn like, covered all in a chitinous membrane that spread around, contorting around everything, including the most disgusting of leper-headed trails that came from below their grind. They were afraid of it, farther in the back. A squirming swarm-like made out of fruit-flies contorting and rotating in place, forming a small sun-black vortex-spherical thing, as a black hole-made star, that diverged in the back into a throaty cord made to look the same as it had, whose unseen 'tendons' were connected to four great 'wings' forming a malnourished stretched, like four bands attached, incapable of flight, x, sharp and elongated on three sides, with its fourth 'wing', on its right being a bulb-filled growth, that looked like a deformed thumb-carved snot, or a rose's contorted but as well, a lymph node that drew out of it, and a circle on its chest there lay. In the middle of the x, the round-rotating swam but flat. Beneath it, an almost humanoid open chest, below the ribs, whose existence was to be brought into question, whose 'blood' coils, or the strange elongated viscera that drooped down connected to a pseudo down-pointing fat cone, like the tip of a mountain, girth, not long, out of which, on two sides there drew, two squirmy pair of clusters, many limbs build by coils, appendages and 'plasters', that's to say, fake hands and arms, all entered into two giant globes that might've been taken for eyes, but they were constantly being pumped in and out, as if by hot air, as if they were balloons, as if contorted beyond despair. The throat was extremely thin, as thin as a street-lamp which only added to the similarity, to such a degree that they might've been through as to be indistinguishable from one another in terms of curvature and where it drew towards. What was even more peculiar was the fact that this x' of a kind wasn't entirely an x entirely, but more of a rag than anything else, not to mention that the 'wings' were as fat as blimp oblongs, that went as much as to stretch a few miles in terms of width, depth and length. A beheaded bear pelt, whose features got elongated, although it looked more like a humanoid pelt, whose head might've instead been fused with one of its claws or arms, got warped, or stretched, then fattened as well. Whereas from its midriff, or side of the belly, a shot or explosion might've widespread some of the organs that would look as if a river was being released, into a more rounded, conical funnel, or one made out of newspaper, akin to the ones made to throw the shells into once you're done eating your fair share of salty seeds. The growths, all, whose placement were unevenly placed at different heights and air-levels appeared to reject one another for some reason, by force, even, being put to its employ, as to ensure there would be no chance to do something one could not forget the likes of. But it was mainly harmless, unlike the two jointed, leg made by exposed humanoid-muscle made out of leeches put together, as in what it appeared like, connected to a blob-fish's melted, partially, yet still rounded, after being taken out of its natural habitat by force, head with daddy-longlegs for mouth, squirmy black eyes like rose buds, out of the 'nose and mouth' mid-area of which, out drew a single snore-like embodiment of growths formed into a single great lump it kept blowing in and out, pumping it like snooze, the fat-head releasing a strangely distorted, tuba-head eating out of its head, whose body was pointed upwards and was set like some weirdly stretched parchment, with many twists and coils caught in it, on top of which there stood only a single bloated tick-shaped 'disc', or something in between in terms of flatness, that followed the flying figure as well as it set itself on top the tracks. And there was also the 'baboon' present there as well, an old crone, witches, bloated with fat, overweight or one whose belly was filled with a giant cauldron, limbless but with a craned front neck, stretched up-front, shaped like an ugly cut's face's horse's half in the front, or born deformed, like human child, bearing a single eye, and a pair of funnel-pear-shooter tubes pointing down with smallish grabbers coming out of them. Out of its head, an almost termite-hive conical wizard's hat growth drew out like a tumor, out of which, out the middle grew a dark thumb-like grub-thing with a single glowing boil for a head, the right side of the 'hat' drawing out of it, thinner as a growth, an elephant's ear instead, the left growth being a giant oblong blimp feather, pumping in and out its brain, another pump. It only had a giant elongation coming out its lower-side of its body, like a child's toy, or a chicken's leg, the grabbing area, with a nasty giant pea-'head' coming out it, pointing down. It flew and followed just as quickly as the other ones had. A big rook-the chess piece body-frame wearing humanoid-pseudo long-faced horse-skulled with two elliptical compounded eyes, whose entire back was split open- as to reveal a humanoid's spine, whose entire lower body, this insectoid's was blimp-like welded to a lower-roof-top like 'throat' with a half a beak formation drawing out of it, only a few meters beneath the elliptical air-lump, the rest of the body being something close to a candle-growth pillar, pushed down into a lamia's body on which it crawled. Behind the area between the few meters coming out of the back blimp-lump growth belonging to the lower-sided rook-area and something that might've been, on an arc, directly proportional to the half-beak, but still placed above the roof-tile end area, drew out a pipe-like hose contortion, as if a spring launching a boxing glove, growth that held a vertically rotated barrel-like formation in which it hid most if not all of its organs, holding them in there for safe-keeping.

'What'd you lust for most?'

A simple man asked, waiting for a second or so, to have an answer wrapped around his collar bone, a wench misplaced on his lap or anything, after-after that. Whatever it might do for him to ask, a guest-like many, were gathered around. They were tall, and they were sickish, in the head. Many of them wanted the women all for themselves, with or without head.

By their sides, on top the variously put together in a most adjourning manner-the sustaining planted-growths, grown over what would starve. Yet they were panoramical, the women that had been trapped inside that room, a wonder for everyone, a starter for their admirers, a first for whoever was among them, a dark-shade falling over them, a man and another brining in a ladder in order to climb them, a realization, that being, all of them being twice or eight times their sizes, a strange encased flea-giant in a marmalade Sabbath, with iron kegs and spiked deads, whose deeds of property, belonging to this stricken down reality had been taken away from them by chance, since the room was occupied, no one wondered why, why were there so many women and why were their feet missing? SO many of them unattended, not a single man to take a hold of them, bring them home, to safety's vow and better yet than now, was there no reason as to swerve, the time had come for. Door, a door closed, taking away such finely scented yet a sight, so much for all whom were attentive, for the delights. Cookie-jar-cracked open, duck-tape ran out. There would be no more closure to be had, once a locksmith allowed them as for such reprieve, not a single man in sight, they ran around and were barely to be seen, not any, in such sight.

A sound, in the distance:

They were all gathered around her within the hour, a luxurious feel to this place they seemed to think, holding the general impression were its hidden arched upon the rafted backs, whose usurped stability drew back, squeezed-sponged pillars, whose placement inside the side-long spun, pocketed charnels' rail road tracks, through little more than fifteen membranous depressions all around, out of which they came, squirming worryingly as they refrained from drawing much closer to the ground, against the likes of whom peeled nearer than expected after a few more shots were taken at the walls, by the hooligans that accompanied the, dhetero to a tiny peevish plant, that produced an incandescent incense of depravity, as to offend some of the highers' sensibilities, being un-displayed by the time this malignant play of wall-contortions ended, being left all met by the same-protruding gaze, they had been lingering no more than a few feet away from, to have belonged, when the seasons' winter's summer end's elation might've long decided that it was time for them to mourn the concubine. A dumb fucking whore in disguise; wretched as all escorts are but treated as dames alike and lasses when no one's around, to their wont and likings, when unearned. It came only for a pretender to think otherwise, that they deserve more.

‘I think we ought to bury her ain’t we?’

‘I shall not dirty my pudish silken gloves with such beskoweled, the beskoweled remembrance of a whore!’

‘Yet you’ve set foot with us in their palace, the place of their apparent birth and origin, the disgraceful thing that would’ve had us all nose-rounded, yet applauded if were done the same.’

‘And you have caught me with no disparity, and will have caught me with no reason to admit to this reality you’ve carefully thought to have entrapped me in.’

‘But on the contrary, we’re even, for we are both trapped in the same congruity as to have no say in; for I admit as little as there is that, in turn, I do so happen go garden such likens attached to them.’

‘Then we have come to an agreement and I shall be angered no longer by this posterity as you will grant her if allowed, since there’s crudeness less to this deed, alone, I ask of you to be done already. I’ve asked for as little ease as it is owed to me by courtesy alone.’

‘If that is what you desire, then I shall admit to you no less than is permittable and shall cast you no duress as to bore you with such discourse as one, as such be lost on you alone, when truce is gone, oft that I know, that you will turn the tables and cast me so, in the position that you lay. Such as I will have become the antagonist, and leer at my command. To partake in decency foretelling and to ask of you, now; to plant in breast what little you’ve known of me, that I deter from taking on partaking to such puerile vivacities, and leave me thus where I lay. For I have known this woman that here now she lay.’

With as little as was thus emerged, the crowd dissipated and they were left to rummage along their way.’

A fool, only a foul mourns for such a fiend; and a fool twas made of him, for they’re to come and they’re to bring him wherever light alone won’t have shown him better.

A day or so passed; and for some reason, the den was empty, completely. During everyone’s absence.

A few people drew in, but they weren’t human. Everything’s fallen apart; and not a single soul, out of those who inhabited the den were seen anywhere at all.

‘We’re late.’

‘All that’s left is only this, only these few ugly things, fallen over. Broken apart, moved and cradled, and a few, a few spots of empty blood. Ugly, ugly things, everywhere; I can’t avert my sight any longer. It turns my gut inside out, all over.

I feel as if I’m getting uglier by the second, the farther we venture; the farther we go in. Why have you brought us here?’

‘I wanted to see, I wanted to know what happened here, before they lost it as we’re about to. This place does indeed feel deprave. I can feel it know, I can finally understand what you’re referring to.’

‘Then we should leave, leave before it takes a hold of us, before we’re turned into them, before we forget what we know of the outside world. It does neither of us no good being here; not in this state.’

‘But, I am the leader of this expedition, and you shall do as I will. Until I’m; I came here to die. I’ve not been entirely truthful I suppose, but. I know you owe me your unquestionable allegiance I needn’t remind you of. Even if I ask of you as little as there is; even in the regretful case I ask this of you as well. You join me in defeat, you join me in shame, you tag alongside me, with or without regret. And we die afterwards, until there is nothing left. No trace of us, no trace of the ones who drove us to this point by the time they find us or not. It’s what I truly wanted in the first place, being aware from the very start we can’t win. Being incapable of finishing what I started, or letting go of any of you, I did this for us. Now, we get to share it, together, not as a family, nor brothers, kinsmen, or the kin. But as... You owe it to me; as your duty. It comes without any need to bequest a reason.

You’ve pledged your lives into my hands and there’s no running or turning away any longer. Not since, as shallow as it may be, ‘s begun. The process, the falling apart, limb for limb until every single one of you will be as distantly gone, alongside my body.’

They followed in whatever depths lay open then; and within the hour they were gone.

It went on for days; days without an end, a few of the furnaces were burning; they would shatter bone, crush what little stone you’d throw inside of it, and working to the point where it could work no more. To a thankless endeavor, out of which no little and no less pressure would there be, when come out from the distance, a single plaintiff of letters did. Piled up near one of the ‘posts’, placed in front of the den, without being aware of its current condition.

Beneath it stood a single signal-catcher where all the smoke drove down into. It didn’t bother anyone.

A well, then entry was shaped like a well, but left without a bucket. A basement-but round; a few chairs had been brought in some time ago, whereas see-through figures moved them in and out, slamming the door shut or out of its hinges, but not a single one of the spoke of anything or talked, at all.

It was barren, beneath them, an empty but darkless spot without worms but air-tight surroundings.

‘You’ve got a gift for cancer, child, and you shall stay here until you’ve made your corpse the coin’s toss.’

His old man told him, before the prunish thing had faded away. The child had never been seen, but encircled his tomb, above of which, still, they kept moving them out of place.

‘You’re going to have to try a little harder.’

Another one shouted, before being joined by the light-bearer, a fairness to his stolen face; the one he took it from upstairs. A horse-body with a wheel for a head humanwalking, yet refrained from slithering his hoofed pincers leaped on top of one of them. Smashing the entirety of the wood-reserve they had as every shard flew and shattered everything that was made to even slightly resemble something wooden-like.

‘You’ve ruined our arrangements.’

‘And you were not supposed to talk prior to this point. SO, explain yourselves, what had gotten into you?’

‘We’ve been busy, trying to rebuild, in a place where there is quiet, in a place mostly obscured from what’s been happen outside lately, of a lack of breath even for they had taken it as well.’

‘How much did you see?’

‘Only the Cockatrice faced, that one with only a torso with two faces, long for legs, whose arms were sheets of paper, running-unbounded, unabashed, allowed to do as he pleases, while the ruinous fall of every still piece would come; where his masters were naught to be found.’

‘It can’t be that far gone; I don’t, I don’t think the owner is still alive.

We should leave as well; it reeks out there, and it will start reeking down here as well. Eventually.’

A pair of broken apart pieces of glassy wool, threads of crystal, spools of various other-shards, most of them being, for some reason used in various unorthodox ways.

‘I wonder whether or not someone is listening to us since it’s hard to tell sometimes with all the noise coming from the open vents, from those blasphemous barren lands taken out of stenographer mouths that are still there, despite me telling you, repeatedly not to allow their, not allow their continued existence to bother me still, placed, under my ever-so continuing vigilance, the one I cannot get myself rid of, in exasperation or as a mere result of what I’m showed or made to deal with, or consume, adhere to, these secret messages that are still being transmitted directly into my brain by means of sound-wave fluctuation, since I am aware, at all times, of its regurgitated flounder, nonchalant misgivings, returned now to my awareness despite not having said anything sooner since my emancipated concordat-cordiality in terms of, a most effable breathless-leaving upbringing that compels me still to maintain this social, banquetesque, equity I profoundly find myself being cowered by, struck by discord and a self-accepted enmity I have vowed to not only respect, as not to bother myself fittingly with the stomping of the device that has caused me all this disquiet for countless hours, spent in its presence; for that, I must thank you all, fearfully as I feel compelled to announce, by an indecent disappointment I have thought I could preternaturally hide from my, yours and much beloved company of others, whose vigilance is no mere trifle, to a rivalry I myself may not find myself contempt with competing against, weak as I am, suffice to say, alleged fits, such as I already displayed, revealed onto you all, as for my weakness, this ingratitude of control serving no one, especially not myself, a mere stranger to this world of moisture and of bastard stone hedgery, that I find myself contained inside of.’

Mankind has more often than not ill-experienced something boding on such a level of complete ethereal domination, ill-thoughts crawling out of them at the single beat of a heart whose malnourished despondency wreathed its rearing hard-head in, to such unfathomable discrepancies of apprehended by someone else – thoughts that they could never find themselves rising, West to South and South to North, the Axis spread across the world, the valley-hills tall-wide black-coal upon strolls of trenches cast upon heavy shoulders that had boulders inside them, grown-organic with eyes and appendages forming bone-crowns, as they would grow their extra limbs, appendages and what not, hundreds of them, and the like, they would also grow out of the shoulder ‘cogs’, cracking the egg ‘shells’ open, then lift themselves wittingly, at the height of sky-leveled clouds, dreaming through every root that grew out of him, whereas, the many quails he’d make ever since bothersome allure would take, impartiality of no mistake, that could be in tandem with the likes, magnetic star-poles being evaporated as they would succumb to its unfathomable sink, as that of light would draw before it, occurred to the figures in the light of missing days, of what was happened to them, and during which, the annoyance that they could not convey, it was perfunctory, strident, but finely-exposed.

‘It was imprudent of you to allow the entry of a raft in.’

No one was listening, since it was all too wearisome on them. A door cricked somewhere around the well. A second one then, leading down a few intersected stairway; most of them always led down the same way, the same panel that painted the streets up there, a cradle of surroundings; unmet by silence, there lay, in a dark pit dug, the whore of ages, untouched, the only virgin, encased in a bubble of amber that would not be punctured nor entered by anyone. For there thee lay, protected without a head, without a prick to be tempted, and without an age to be discerned from the cast he was molded in, of lest be told, wretched to no cold withheld, or boldness to molten crass, as heat was not present, but a cold that was as disturbing as it’d come:

‘I seek entry in.’

A wretchedly –aghost:

Tremblingly it walked- Right step over the left one, an appendage eerily placed forth, where there was a dark vase put on a red-velvety cupboard with a pouring out of its three heads soldier-skeleton, whose bayonet was put on hold- and bore a single champagne bottle cap, alarmingly, withhold your arm, they spoke of warnings, don’t look no farther than where we are, then the dark surroundings, darkened, lamps withheld the truth as well, but not a single one would spell, raise your arm in dire attack, mount warningly for battle, struck, left foot over a floor that lead him farther than he would’ve believed himself able to explore, since no one was listening, other than the strange guardian warden, who, upon feeling himself intruded upon, came to no other conclusion than this.

Someone must’ve seen it coming. They should’ve seen it coming from a mile away, but no one said a thing.

‘I think I’m calling it a night, how about you, friends?’

‘We’re going to keep at it for a few more hours if you don’t mind waking up earlier in the morning, since there’s still a lot more groundwork to be laid down before we can finally move onto the Hostels.’

‘Fine, I’ll push back sleep for a while. Say, is that a?’

Frank stopped his pot from churning in a jewel, just so he could get a better look at her. It came within the hour of his second breath, during no twitch of a muscle but closer to him finally being released from the stand-still paralysis he had been forced into the moment he laid eyes on her. As a matter of fact, he had almost been crippled by her appearance, since she was close to be completely belittled by the very intrusion of symphonies that had entered her gut-innocence being released out of the various slits inside of her, by the side of her, and around the floor tiles, where most of the un-done, temporarily-observed, various unnatural entities that had been hidden beneath and beyond the sight, had finally come or decided to show themselves. It was not a great sight to behold. Automatic mechanical legs forced Frank Falk step forward, still numb. An alarming spread of mucous strains began piling up from where they stood, creeping along, crawling by the sides, by the rims and around the many surrounding, barely containable climbing upon the ladders of bones that were extending from the holes beneath the various trap-holes that had been bolted prior to their coming. Popping like buttons, but the other men simply continued despite having their helmets wrung, pointing back, bouncing around, but their heads were already screwed themselves and there was no possible way they could undo those. Most perilously forlorn, adorned formations of bodies continued showing on.

A marble spectral skeleton pulsating with the bright shining light of an angle, yet fleshy in appearance, wore, a crown made of wriggling things, but they were all women feet, and to be more precise, the feet of nasty whores! They obscured the intensity of the shining brightness to a point where it almost seemed as if the arches, which were pointed at the cranium itself appeared to be feeding on it. Even the area where the cut had been apparent seemed to ooze, not with pain, though as something like that could be anything but incontestable but with the eeriness of something that had been lost. A piece of humanity women were never known of showing, hid inside this place of power, the arches, of unknown. Whom had been blighted by the fleshiness of peril's woe, this thing that crawled inside of them, reanimating the very specters that had been cut, then allowing them to feel the pain of never being rubbed, of never stepping on his head but being dominated by his iron band, that kept them all in check, and sight. Not a single whore would move if the skeleton willed in, and here, here he was in charge, here he was in wretchedly dark command, to govern over everyone else whom had trifled less and was but bore of many fleshy bags, of puffy-softened mass of sand. But there were none around, as, when he turned, the whore disappeared. As did the other entities that withdrew, off some wild surroundings, off some fear they could and would not speak off.

‘But who are you and why does thou stand before me, wretch?’

His paralysis was now embraced by a most profound subservience to a cowled figure standing in the back, whose head elongated like a TV antennae and appeared to be wearing a lot of rubbery buttons and other stick formations that transmitted wild deformed holograms on the ground, that were spread in circles and squares, it used to scan the ground with. Gas could not kill either of them, yet there was a lot of it coming out from down there, below. There was something surprisingly dull about the way in promised to cast them away, if only.

If only he could grab his hands on one.

‘Boy, you see these feet? You see how they squirm against my temples? Against the very area on top of my head, behind it, and around it, or even beyond it? As I can see, with extreme clearness, images of these specters that I am supposed to keep under my command, beneath me and beyond any impression that they might give me of any possible retaliation; yet I rule over them without fear of being struck by their freed feet, although anchored to my head they are. They could simply crack me open like an egg, a shell of something that I used to be, being left behind without a trace of me ever being alive, if only I were to allow them to do so.’

‘So what are you saying?’

‘Join me, first, for the night is still young.’

‘To where?’

‘One of the Hostels, there, in the distance, where the wretched one awaits us both to arrive.’

Hence they walked towards it.

The entrance was wide-open, and they reach it quickly enough. Fifteen minutes of walking, being entirely wasted on trying to think of a way to explain it to him, in some way Frank himself would understand, the way they thought about it, then.

‘Frank, I must tell you something. It’s a warning.’

‘What is it, Crowned by Women’s feet?’

‘There’s a terrible storm out there in the brewing; a darkness is about to encompass the very vale we’ve been living in for countless generations, somehow drawing breath out of the soul and body of every wretched hag and witch that’s been killed then repurposed for whichever need it was once thought they would be useful for.’

‘And why are you telling me all of this?’

‘Your mother was a whore and you are her descendant. It’s only deemed as being right that you should know.’

‘My mother never existed, she stabbed as a child, then died, wiped out of existence, and I was born in a lab, twenty millennia ago, forged into a box.’

The box was circular and rounded, strapped by power-magnets that appeared to have formed thousands upon thousands of peculiar formations that were attached to four great reactors, humanoid-machines that had legs of pistons as well as some unnatural other things that could not be explained. Some machinery that was made out of panels, put of Gattling-gun tubes with their bands, but wildly extended and put here and there, and somewhere in between, going below the floor, as if they were actually water-tanks or Silos, connected to humanoid figures that had round-worm legs with every end being a tinier wriggling thing that started inflating into root-like domes inside of which neon-bearers with many eyes and many forms-giving birth to glowing creatures, in this small air-filled space-den or bowel-cave, or mole-place where birth was inaccessible by every other being that was not them. The Gattling tubes were tall and hard, but transitioned into flaccidly-wriggling soft as they made that transition into the pseudo air-cooler’s tubes, that connected to the intermission ‘livid’ things that served as recyclers for the soil particles the rooted worms appeared to be feeding upon. It’s what kept them breeding and breathing and playing with the molecules appeared to have a strange effect upon the Panels, which had been delivered from some Secret Facility, somewhere in the heart of the United States of America, where the Great-Four Giant Demons, farther of nigger-kikes appeared to be churning in, inside their giant cauldron, nigger-kike children they had skinned alive, in contemplation, of the damning ritual they had served themselves with, trying to drive it to an end’s meat. Throwing in, every now and then, women’s feet, in the mix; but the panels themselves had only been placed, strangely so, in a rounded encircled by wild canine-head shaped candles that were all rotating, with horns covered in drills and syringes that appeared to shoot out of them as well as fling out the most unnaturally dark and the longest of tape-worms that started growing and inflating until the point where they had become muscles had arrived, where it had become incontestable, the fact that they endured for far too long and the pain could serve as no excuse any longer, being powered by the molecules themselves, uncannily so, they formed pseudo-giant humanoids with wild-entrenched bodies that were used to fight one another in order to generate sweat. The sweat being spread across the room, as lavished by the power-tools that were used to tear open the great concave-pseudo device in the middle revealed the thrall, made out of barely put together markers of metal, electrical chairs, as well as some of the inmates that had been executed, with foil-tubes attached to their temples as well as silver bullets and silver-rods that came out of them as well. Four of them appeared, well-too soon. They moved with the power of daze, as they began inflicting pain upon the world surrounding them as well as the worn out body-bags filled with the most unnaturally, hard to shove anywhere else or to be fiddled with, anchored, tenebrous, rancid smelling, disgustingly, nigh-beheaded, volatile electron-makers. Who flashed and dazzles, whose appearances would only blind those staring at them for far too long, or else something similar to it would happen, if only one knew when to avert his or her eyes from staring at this disgustingly disturbingly-hard to look at without some protection visors. One would know better than this, one would not fear being in its presence for long, and it was only a matter of time until something unfathomable happened. A vileness of supreme repercussions that reared in, penetrating the room through a series of punctures had cut through the power-iron shell-set of walls like a butter-knife sharpened, with a quickly, heedless stare cajoling with the despair belonging or resurfacing by expressionless heaps, out of the variously expressed faceless body-trophies that had been stacked together, after the initial charge that had almost ruined the entirety of the facility through an unfathomable nigger-like lynch mob being formed after finding out the already expectable thing, that the nigger had raped a white woman and was to be boiled alive, skinned, fed acid, have his eyes gouged out, fed his own intestines, then finally be put down, but an axe came soon after, seeing how his suffering was extended to hours, as they simply began lowering then raising him, then lowering, then raising him in order to reproduce the motions of waves, of tsunamis and various other, unnatural dreams of the sea, when sailors like me, I could be the one lynching, see, the nigger hanging up-and-down, hanging-around, I'll have his throat snapped, in a second, cracked, spilt open, no niggers are welcome in this town any longer; as this beast shot right through with the power and the will of a hundred men, that could not be stopped without the employ of an already wasted lot of countless magazines that went to waste for no other reason than this, pointless as it were, disgustingly embraced then thrown around, he squalled as finally, although only this sharp thing of a face was revealed, it neared no other, for no other reason than the eminence of Frank's pre-birth knowledge could tell of, other than one of the thrall's elongated spears' having wrung a shot that penetrated right through, gouging a blood-vein, leading to the sinew of its wild-brain- shots, that took it aback, as it rested, in the end, in a pool of its gouged-forth lo'. A nothingness of winds having come straight after, as the hopeless-allure had no say as to what happened to be brought into the cone, that was now formed. A gelatin formation inside of which this Gait-walking Fetus-being Frank seemed to be enwombed in; now bore a single tube that connected both him and it, the being that had been killed.

[illegible]

'Is someone calling me? Is there something going on I should be made aware of?'

‘There’s a lady waiting for you in that room and you’re already half an hour late to your appointment. I’m only trying to get your attention, that’s all.’

‘But for what reason?’

‘I think we both know who it is; but for the sake of it, lock the door and don’t look anywhere else than the middle of it, then leave, leave as soon as possible, Frank.

I believe a timer should let you know whether or not your time’s up.’

‘And If I fail to leave?’

‘That’s your prerogative, for stay shall only bring you sadness unless you leave her behind.’

‘Certain trepidations I should be let known of?’

‘It’s not a contract.’

‘Then I can simply have her wait for me for as long as I desire.’

‘It’s a dangerous thing and the consequences will be felt by them.’

‘And I suppose every other whore is in league with her as well.’

‘Not a single one that would simply brush an eyebrow at what you’ve done, since, you know what that might be lodged into.’

‘What?’

‘A part of the ceiling, it’s come to it to decide. If you can’t, it will.’

‘Again, what exactly is that?’

‘A sawed pendulum, coming from the upper floor; she’s one of the special women come from the well, where the Horse spoiled them with rotten fingers and some fish he’s taken from out of the forests of Mohr.’

‘Should I entertain this charade then?’

‘Do as you please, but know that I shall not sit here any longer listening to what you’ve got to say. It’s a difficult thing as it is, trying to get a word in, especially with them, having planted enough packs to rile this place up for him, if it’ll come to it, at least.’

Alas, but there was another thing that was not said. Frank dreamed of the whore. Frank was sent into her chambers to deal with her but. But no more men than needed; eighteen men were here earlier, and they almost extinguished all life.

Eighteen men of power, all tall, but humanoids- almost wax-like, in terms of chiseled perfection; all perfectly look-a-like: ‘L-o-o-k-a-...’

With eighteen Lomeks, eighteen SHiels, lodged inside of them, tormenting; and sound-waves of speech-deformed, whose scythes were all protruding, bending, to their wills. Those big-faced one-eyed simians, all Lomeks tried wriggling themselves off the back of their heads, as the Shiels but squirms their nastily devil's shaped trunks dishelved, and disheartened, that they could not produce as much damage as they could. That their attempt to torment the men only made them, shake, instead of crook:

But there was another thing not checked in any hall, there was no saying as to what was going to happen if a single arm lend onto them the warmth they needed to be gone and banished with every implant gone, they shared a room within the hour, wreathing soon in place. Some lights were on, and candle-blighted, some little snaring 'roots', that had surrounded, what little they could fashion of the day, what little of the hour remained of it, they stayed, in the middle of the room, back to back, forming a circle. All humanoids-alike; but their heads fell off, and had melted across the floor. They had come together, like a single many appendage-filled, elephant-mass but split – 'foot', a 'chalice' with many slits and cuts, holding but two heads, yet. Only one being could be discerned, while the other was gone. Two giant simian heads, both Cyclops, and blind on both far ends. Grayish-purple, with their flashy eyes set in waiting, while they only entertained themselves with wild rotations as well as the apothecary sensation one would be left with while holding these boulders of flesh. Speechless as they waited there, for something to happen, as to be released from the wonderment; needed in order to say whether or not Shiel had survive the maze.

It was one bricks, men were constantly running in; a fathomless Gaul.

'Frank, wake up already; you've been sleeping on the job again, haven't you?'

'What? What? I'm up, what happened?'

'You poor thing, poor-poor thing, you've been deceived again, haven't you?'

'What are you talking about? How, where? Where am I?'

'In the same place you fell asleep in the last time you went to sleep, don't you remember?'

'Obviously I don't, you're. I'm, this bed. What's wrong with it?'

'Quite inquisitive of you to ask and yet ascend back from the grotto of dreams, I see.'

'Just tell me where I am and why I'm strapped to this broken bed and we'll be even!'

They stood there for a little while, just staring at each other's tombs. Cast against the wall he was faced by; the back of the coffin churning in as the rest of the lamps, the candles and the light that shone against the chandelier, whose bouncing reflection, the refraction and the little-more-left to it, slither of almost conflagrated despair allowed for little to no solitude that might be ascertained from the depths of the fallen, yet wretched by the cowl of blankets-dark, whose oratorily delight of darkened by each moment, every sight and every lost, amassing, treasured by him, memories were at a threat of being completely burnt out of existence, as if they mattered no less than the obscure, slithering fragments of duress he was met by once no longer capable of protruding or moving along, or keeping track of the time he took to move from here, there, at any point as well as this delight he's yet to face, the question.

‘Am I dead then? Is the back of the coffin cracked? Even with all this light that’s being forcefully projected against my pupils, I’ve yet to see reason as to why I cannot see, what could it be? And what was it that had made me fall in this state of agony?’

‘It’s open, you fell, just like a striding angel, who had been forced out of the heaven’s hole, whereas the world had been, for a moment only, thought as being anything but unaligned. As if it had been, for a moment, that you may consider this, still something meant to survive; which now, forbearance be cast gloomy, we wait in silence, we wait in quiet, still wondering whether or not it might still fall.

I cannot say for certain, yet, I wait just like everyone else, for something else to happen.’

A female spoke:

‘You’re quite a looker I would say, can’t imagine what a man like you wronged a man life cause of, to have come here in the first place since not a lot of fine folk do show up here to begin with, in the first place, but I’d wager, since you do look like a, rather, cosmopolitan person, so begin with, whose pasturage would seem uncanny to many, it’s a given that, some would yearn for a crack shot taken off the pot, you fancy? To take you down before you end up taking yourself beneath one of those umbrellas and lose a finger in the process since you’re fidgeting a lot in your chair and there’s the chains also that have started their work, up and down, up and away, the men keep working them behind your back, and when the machine finally gets a say in, I think there’ll be little told of you to the winged men who are to carry you to the couch, when time’s come for you, married already to a bride without legs, I’d say, good findings to you, but for us, the normal men of this fine country, of hard-but high belongings there’s little to be said about who actually does the pulling of the strings and who’s at work, if no shining-mournful angel would appear to bless us with what’s said and done, I’d fair much better alone, during the time’s trashed candor’s many-a-loss then run. I would.’

‘To where would I even hope to run with nothing short of a few; they’ve taken my face, and I’m blind.’

‘Then we shall cut whatever we can out of your bodily delight and bury ourselves in with the rest of the giant botflies.’

Too many of them, the sizes of ankles, all entered him from every side, all the way through. And they opened, and shot through elongated fleshy tongue-like shot by bullfrog- long shot fleshy buds connected to the ground, anchored.

‘I’m pleased to announce that one of the ladies is dead. She’s been kilt this morning, this very evening we held the funeral and the culprit is a man in this very fanciable place; I’d wager!’

‘You are a brave man, although I’m afraid that you’re not what I initially imagined you as when I.’

Ran around the corner, found a dead end; but an open view cartilage, shaped like the beating image of a wall cast upon the leaping ambers of a flame; pumping like a hart, every brick being organic, some of them so far removed that a man would appear, not-flat, but soon pushed out like some blob or tap-like water. Fully equipped with the many insect-like legs, belonging to pads welded to the legs of a water-walking spider, coming out of a ring of metal attached to his head; as the rest of his body appeared to be nothing but a rounded stump; a downward pointing cone-hive.

Alarmed by this sudden apparition, the men withdrew themselves a few meters off-shortened sight.

‘You, you looked different on that piece of wreckage. There’s something off you, in the way you, seem to be.’

‘They’ve taken my children, and I’m their rightful father, join me now so we may claim them back. I need my children for a project, that I may turn them into a dark cysted-crystal; wrought in pain.’

A war-driven figure in the distance, snarlish, snaggish, a bloated-skin, almost dwarfish creature whose head had encompassed, eaten through its arms, then entered through the lower side of its body, creature a strange flying device. It spat a single slither of skin. It became gelatin, then widespread in a circling carpet of worms that soon enough disappeared. And the men only processed one thing and one thing alone; that, that, absolutely disgusting pair of teeth, bubble-like cocoons, like beads, welded into one another’s, kept in touch and hold:

‘I am wretched and I need to finish my project in time, totter-totter, otherwise, I’m afraid that there will be a lot I will have to cut and swerve! Once again, twice and said, least profusion, how many?’

‘How many what?’

‘How many of those bricks do you suppose the flying one contaminated with his worms?’

‘I believe that to be impossible, at the very least, it’s something that’s not easily said without some sort of snarlish reprieve!’

‘Delightful, charming, a gust of lightning bolts for each man in sight!’

And there were many of them, fifteen, all carrying various hard-lodged to their backs, apparel that would be by normal means hard to see, like a green-puffy filled with flying insects-dead but to a taxidermist’s delight, worthy of praise and appraisal if it were bid upon, a lot of perfunctory green-glowing jewel-like emeralds filled with maligned spirits that had basked in the infinity of some eighteen hundred thousand billion dimensions, concentrated inside of them by sheer power of strength and maligned emergency flight, levers-filled attached to a sea-junk belly of falling apart machinery drivel that would by all means try confound one another with the most insolent of bacterium-propaganda of insolence withheld, unknowingly dreading every second of their existence come onto, terms with such soberness belonging to A-MAN off the bottle, no longer drunk, good for him, a nigger’s dead, lynched on some moving tree, by a kike’s long-nose, curving like a six, entering itself, dragging with enough weight as to, what goes around comes around; eight he carried, one of the men, eight giant bugs, as opposed to the other fifteen that were all equipped, and suddenly flintlocks came out like quills, turnips as well as other people that were wriggling inside, trapped in like cocoons but whom were very much queerly brought back to life by insolence’s abode, being drawn by cords from the graves in which many of them swam inside of still, all being trapped in those dimensional holes that were ripped then rebuilt inside of the inter dimensional plane this hole inside the backpack lead to, an abhorrent bar of made darkly set blonde-by hair, ripped of kilt-women, many-looking jaw equipped – of the man kind, not belonging to humanity, but an amiable adherence to some testosterone, otherwise ill-equipped by all means of trying to cast the insolence they all shared, being connected, around their heads by various shots of elongations of skin that hardened, bars of metal but cast within them, inside of them, welded, socketless, a second’s flash, struck from the tops of the sky, as the lightning struck, at the withering hour of midnight, during the witching hour's final strike, as they were all revealed to be but a single fiend using many corpses whose true allure, existence was the presence of a single pair of heads which were not even belonged to it, but instead, appeared to have been stolen from the men themselves, whom were possessed by this fiend, of a thousand infinite yet many bars within that shot, in every man's head it possessed and stole their heads, their bodies to follow, but who'd simply vanish out of existence if one were to kill every single one, on a whimper following such trails, of such countenances that they almost looked as if they were horned, but, contrived as their inflammatory derogation's intrusion on the remembrance of their past lives they mourned the candace of respite, burdening the heat brought by pained insulation forcedly nested inside their propagated bottling of heat, inside the furnace's come onto the sight of lay, in a closed chamber where they'd hit their heads in frustration, during the realization that their lives will not return to what it used to be like prior to the stolen assemblage of bodily parts, lost in the quiet disintegration of dream's lost in the ether's come around, when they finally came upon the resistance's end's plight, and gone, would their dreams be, for a second's most intruding thought.

'Frank, open up!'

A door near one of the escalators to his right, eighteen more planted inside one of the giant two folded piston-like salamander's giant head bulb, in the wall, out of which, part of the wall itself, sprouted a few boils the size of a few giant horseshoe crabs and shells, out of which the final stinger out of three connected most of the trepid-set triangular elevators see-throughs in which some of the noisy men appeared to have come out of. They were trying to escape in time.

'You know what happens if you stay in there for far too long, don't you? Once it opens you'll be at a loss of breath, it will eat what it can then leave out of the same way it came.'

'Open the god damn door you fucking sociopath!'

Frank didn't listen, nor did his brother.

'Ugly room, you should clean it up, now!'

An-ugly sixteen pentagon of faceted walls, with a simple oblong red carpet with a yellow spot on which they sat on, both on their arse. With the only wall being completely ruined being the one in front of them, standing in wait for breath. Waiting their turn to breathe, whenever it would come:

'Come on, Frank, no, Frank, better yet, you, Frank!

Open the elevator door, you've got the leverage, we'll give you what you want, anything if that'll buy us out of this awful place!'

'Then so be it, should we open it?'

'D-don't do it, Frank, they'll do something most treacherous, they have guns on them, they come from below, and this apartment is ruined already, they're here only for show. Dead-meat, meant for us to look at go berserk!'

‘Is it not cruel then? Waiting for them to die? They’re still human after all, and it’s only going to make us worse, for wear. They’ll be wearing us after all, in a decade or so.’

‘Only if they get in, Frank, only if they get in! But I’ve got the key and there’s plenty of it where’s it come from and the others will be made aware of, once we leave.’

In the hallway, there were people listening for something, for some reason or another, giant nails being carried all the way from the other side of the building, carrying water in stuffed on both side wormy hoses.

‘Knock, knock!’

A voice shouted from the other side. One of the Franks started vociferating a loud excuse to get out of the room and do something inexcusable. It would not last long. He opened the door and quickly they were gone. Empty from one side to another, with the doors being forced to crawl back into the large obelisk fat glowing with pure energy beacons that crawled around by the implanted in the floor rolling segment; a spherical empty cut-in rail allowed for it to move from one side to another. Inside as well; but only at surface level, empty men, see through fossils started yelling and shouting, but were largely unheard, as it was all contained but in, by the only chainy worthless torn apart, crawled partially inside, chained by two arms –man, the only one left, the servant who could not help himself yet. This disgusting thing, this maze that lead to nowhere, hid but hid well.

It approached Frank and asked him where to.

‘To which door might they be found? I seek those with wild red faces that are painted in the art of war.’

‘If you’re asking of the reddened Gooks, I’ve but little known there’s left of them pas the shook, since they’re all hardly felt, but taken by disease. I would’ve seen less, much so. But I’ve yet to find an answer to why they’ve taken claim over the few people that lived in this place.’

‘I’ve no doubt that I’m responsible for it as well, at that, I can discern no hope!’

The giant legged protrusion, the one with membrane in the back, made out of many growths, some of which formed various structures that almost looked like fashioned mouthed armor-pieces made out of pure-chitin, with a single eely stalagmite on top of it, but mainly, in appearance like some fleshy leg-appendage leaping, battling the heaps of fleshy corpses, the mounds that appeared to manifest through the walls, chucking themselves at it, like dirty-skin balls.

‘My brother is calling upon me, look behind you, how he’s stopped.’

Frank the second caught between the Obelisk and the fleshy leg, inside an eerie hall, empty and devoid of life. Whereas the people were still suffering in that nastily deformed see-through trap, of no apparent wail.

‘It’s dangerous, whenever one of the lights flashes, you get that, incommensurable fleshy steely taste in your mouth.’

Near the island's petrified men, solace of sooth and graze, shoulder to the praised ring, servants to a land's will, met, but eyeless to a peak's shed, bathed still in what was left, cooled down but ruddy-red.

Oblongs of ellipses- shadows cast, chimney sweepers the beaked protractors flew upon, five bars govern each man, the dial's wrung, at the end nigh yearned for, yet to come. Yet they endear, out of frighten, out of fear. No footsteps beyond the shore, no footsteps beyond no more:

'I seek to return to the land from where they've taken me out of?'

But where to if not the place he remembered!

There were, outside, people, and people were outside-outside they were; being taken by their arms, delivered onto the ledge near which hinder there lay a single lamp abhorrent staying past-the shed that remained, inside the truck, they were bottled and encased, various shatterings, having cones upon the sight of the scene and the much to itself amalgam that floated around in the city. The amalgam being thrust out, being incapacitated by perdition as others like it came and flung themselves on top the brow and slithering around the brow, one stopped the car from moving.

'All passengers are required to immediately leave the zone and enter the restricted area near the two homes.'

To their right and in-between, stood a cargo-giant complex of many rooms within their reach of being imprisoned on sight, by chains being delivered onto their crummy-limbs, then gotten out, were they lead onto rail-encompassed pastoral platforms that dragged them in, felt them ill- left but little, as little was there but thin. They were thinned out, with every second being somewhat familiar to them. Since there was no control either, since there was nothing as powerless titter and totter, were they not incapacitated at all; a few men followed after only to make slithers past the moving rows:

'I've never seen them before. Sure they'll fit?'

'There's only one way to know and feel it, isn't it?'

'You don't mean putting them into the coffins, do you? '

'What else could I be talking off?'

They brought out one of the 'coffins', large man-thick almost fireman bars, with door 'openings', like power-lines delivered by a few strangely jolting up and down and therefore gone, coils. First they moved it in a circle, then formed an 'L' on the ground, horizontally to their view-point flipped around they followed after, fifteen meters to the left, where the bar leaped into the air, then landed on a spot, it jumped again, then it moved twenty meters on the same trajectory, farther to the left, then back in a down-the-hill kind of manner, farther back, where all of the sudden it curved in terms of direction, took a sudden stride directly parallel to the spot they had lost control over it initially, where it stopped, proceeding to zigzag its way back into the initial point it had meant to lend itself onto; back into their hands, whereas the people behind it, two standing in front of one another, one to their right being an elongatedly deformed humanoid-wall-figure without eye-sockets, and glowing globules for eyes, strange pin-screw like elongated figures -like jelly humanoids coming from beneath them, crawling back and forth, back to warmth; whereas, to their left there stood a car-wreck taken away from somewhere down the, country, - highway piece of tar with the long rectangular white signs imprinted on it, on top of which there stood a mighty broom-like fine-print of golden rimmed with strange dust lain behind as some sort of ritualistic-grift; many of them being bastardly incased, struck by such remains, incapable of truly thinking of a way out of, trying to torture more candidates: Yelled, shouted; root-root:

‘I think there’s some sooth in their eyes, I think there’s something yet benigned, but there’s little such release ever-after!’

And much to themselves, disaster:

‘A fire will’ve sprouted from this glow-pillar if it were not for the heart at the top.’

A thing, organ elongated, brought. Something like it as well:

‘I am Seneca, I’m about to commit an act of the most atrocious manner, I shall slither life itself from the bulb which had made the ghastly dome in which they had sunk their elongated thin-wit held to contemplation rowing, with the marvels of Berlin-macabre, a meager message to my lords of sin, then to them I shall deliver, traversing the desolate road of a marvelous incontinence carried over by fragments of men of dirty filthy-gritted flying skin that will become the pillars of the knew-thy-must you should’ve taken heed of my warning before it happened – ruined kingdom, or what will be left of it, after my reign of terror will be withdrawn from the eves of the slurry but absinthe’s brow!’

And therefore None withdraws his gun; pointing at Seneca as he is prepared.

‘You may slay me as you may any man!’

But they were not going to allow it, still, be stilled as well:

‘A jelly, come out of the bar!’

‘Will and shall we have it stilled it withdrawn?’

There was no reason to stray of lay a single hand upon the drawn upon ship that slithered up-front.

Not a single hillish zone, not a signal from the tall machines, despite their flashings of their red-dots. It could not have been worse for the cattle, or how it’d gotten after:

‘You’ve been swerving from the slither-channel, dousing in and out, but I still find no reason why you’d talk to them, especially since now, you’re gone, worse than you’ve ever been, something that you felt and did on a whim, but never wilt you have be gotten.’

A flame of desolation followed soon enough on an errand carried through by many men fashioned of withdrawn tower-esque thrown upon and slithers of wilt-have none, the suffering of man, the humankind that followed in, with slaves and slavers come alike, brought with cinder, and made out of a single mind not to be impaired; a few men started smoking.

‘No, you’re not allowed to smoke inside the complex, the facility will move in and eat our heads!’

‘It’s only a crawling house!’

‘And you are a humanoid wail!’

A bodiless odor, struck with it as well; stuck inside the wall-like structure, incapable of such retreat, of much benighted and never-feet, like that of women, something-something ever-grit!’

‘My love beckons the hornet and there and there, it arrived!’

From the stage-like repertoire they started coming, many such machines lowered down, drilled pushed out but lowered into the very ground that had been dug-in and through.

A knock came, reached then stilled, off-guard but signals don’t deliver the treason behind, it leers at the man that’s ought to have been allowed, allowed to trail the assignment that reached him thus:

‘There’s another man joining the line, he says he’s been spiraling through a never-ending rollercoaster of rations and crudely made alterations that he’s found on his way to Beijing.’

‘We must release the bulk of explosive missiles at once then!’

‘Why, sir?’

‘Because the people of Beijing are being contaminated as we speak by unknown to us forces we’ve yet to appease the fine cut off. We should perform various sanctions and see it as a must. We shall endorse the cutting of the tendons as it follows and set the rations down in flight!’

‘Are we to return what’s been taken by him?’

‘Only if there’s a slither of a chance he might repeal it!’

First and foremost, there was the whore, a most intrusive thing delivered in a box; through the bog and through the crannies, after-lands and never-rancid. Out of the hundreds of ‘prisoners’ that were out there, only a slither could remain of pained unnerved, now; a lot withdrawn and better yet gotten through the wretched crown. But she was not alone, yet was delivered by a man of burn, skin that fell off but tar and sooth and other nasty crooks of hoots, and many other things of dark, ashes, coal and things alike. A flame of laceration growing, spreading off his back, a few more limbs that had appeared out of him, all burnt, a tower-figure he was. A ring of burning arms rotating, holding flames as well as puckery shapes of coal-delights:

‘The burnt-man Hay-Dirk, who comes accompanying a woman that’s been impaled by life, and slither-gone and therefore turn into the broken world.’

‘What news you arouse of her?’

‘I’ve found her on my way out of the den, through the burning made of piece tunnel, through which I found but slithering none, to which I’ve been begotten numb!’

‘What do you intend on doing with her from this point on?’

‘Only the worst possible things you could ever come to imagine, I wager! And for that, for my mission and my holy quest, I need, bequest only one thing out of you, that you give me naught ounce, but only once, permission to a chamber now, that I will have my way with her and get away without having to suffer her insolence along the way. As the lights endear, as I burn here, as she will be filled with boils of fear. Splash and I shall cast a squeeze and see to it now that there will be nothing taken in return!

‘We shall mourn no longer, here’s a key to room eight four!’

In the complex there was no light any more. Nor would there be one that would arouse, nor would there be one of a slither and a slit in guise or wildly taken, of what was given onto them mistaken; news couldn’t have gone slower, for the den of pleasures had all of its agents wide-spread, and not a single one could give onto them the lend onto the pained and the forgiven, treason of mightily withdrawn reason, nor contemplation therefore be. Nor a single symbol of agony. Agents of the den appeared out of nowhere, incumbent on what was happening to them, incumbent as to know when and where to, anywhere and anything that could help them:

‘Greetings darkened one of sin!’

A few figures appeared; all alike; deformed torsos shaped like tongues fully curved and stretched out but if they had spines attached and were closer to hard-torsions of fridge deformations, compact machines or sheet-like covers of many blocks of flat-looking but segmented explosives. With a single flat-plane ‘wing’ by their left sides; a mushroom-balloon blimp head bore whore-faces hid inside, held between half a giant face with a prognathism jaw-welded to its half-bulbic but fat on both sides, ooze-block of a rodent-humanoid face it bore, with a giant squirming eye; being welded to the mushroom and its other-growing growths that held it back.

‘I’ve felt it before, the shake, unreal. You’re nothing but a slither of a ooze with no control!’

‘And what of it then? I can still slither away if I will it so!’

‘A few of them will come through.’

A symbol of the most benighted manner; written on a piece of sprawl.

The Specter that haunted the den:

Caught inside one of the rooms, incapable of escape, withdrawn and shun him! A voice shouted!

‘Shun him for he is under my control, he can only speak but has no control! I will have him thus punished if I will it to be so!’

‘Are you certain of this? There aren’t to be any consequences at play now, are there?’

‘Not that I would expect in any case, not to venture to a place like this. You’re safe as long as you’re with me, remember that and we’re going to get along just fine. On as fine a night as this, though, I would ascertain the endeavor your capricious self would rather be more inclined to betoken as to take heed at heart for what fate might chance along the way, of irksome tailored, such-and-such, anything could happen, need I, lest bequeathed so, remember there’s but an ill-thing to be weary of that might yet appeared, yet might not, for if it does, no matter the warning, I would such entrench no ponder knowing what could come after, if sought was wrought oft be-called for in the distance by the peers during flight and sightened by death during a plague at unawares brought you might onto no safer broth- than at their bowels' pot, churning away in your own stew, burning!"

Too certain on himself, a jungle awaited of mirth compounded; little known to them, dumbfounded.

'Where am I?'

'Lost as you were twenty winters and summers ago; and yet it's the first time's walking yearn for yarn and spoken out-loud for whispers' silent bliss!'

'There's no reason not to, take one of the Gulfs for our own, is there not?'

'Danger broods beyond every cover, yet you slime away each chime, for what, brother?'

What a face to Ave; round and oval, like an opal puffed then smashed.

'All too kindly strangers, I would admit to such fault as no other man could counterfeit having listened and joined in my abode and if you were to look to the side of the road; a marvel, nonetheless; the many foundations that keep the platform above the cypress.'

A trail of many jointed together blocks like train-wagons aligned, trackless but holding the great platform on their backs, casting a great rectangular shadow on what could only be called a land turned into sewage, murk. Whereas above and on top the platform, those that were not get hanging by hot-aired balloons were very much wide-spread, generators, of sooth, and tawny-smoke with hairs coming out of them, livid-organic, breeding as they went ahead, and danced around the dead-swollen rabbits. Not a sound:

'I think there's but plenty of others that would welcome our company without being confounded by such attrition worth of wont, no mentioning what had been ruled and coveted by vileness such as to defile our personage, then cast us away!'

'Then good men, I bid you farewell, for the chance to join on top, to work inside the factories inside each generator comes only once in a lifetime for outsiders!'

'Then why should we take such crude a jest, so we could be enslaved and cast away?'

'Because you shall find no wit to be told.'

A giant man covered with tar and white-glowing wings, bearing two giant heads growing out of his arms had arrived. It leaped off the platform and appeared to have become two beings as the fall sawed perfectly two halves. Teeth adorned their insides, in the billions. But they were as thick as flower buds. Holes pushed out what could only be referred to as leashes, now lain flaccidly on top of one another as well as on top their next-in-line, beneath them, pores. Like chewing gum, or wax. Inside of them nested insects, flies that came along. One had a knife on it.

'Let them in, and I shall bathe and clothe them as it is within my power to do so!'

Earlier, a few months in peril, without a drench for knowing; ever-so drenched.

Jacam-A:

‘Open the door! Or I’m going to trample all over it and then run your body over with a roll of turpentine!’

‘I’m not falling for it again, Jacam, you’re a jackal of a man, and an idiot at that, of course I don’t intend on falling for that, not while I still live, you know? The others may be able to do it, but not I, definitely not I! I’m hard of hearing and dense of mind; not afraid of admitting to my faults, but you? You’re a dead man walking and a worse one at that! You’re incapable of seeing past your own two lobes; and you’re about to take one of the greatest plunged during the fall!’

‘Look, I’m only trying to have some fun, that’s all, give me a chance to impress one of the women and I’ll leave.’ For now in any case!

‘Hats, I’m in need of hats, hats and rats, they go hand in hand and arm in arm, I shall wear one!’

‘So that’s what you need in order to allow me stay?’

‘No, but I shall convey what I’m seeing in this room today!’

It’s been taken over by rats, they fly, they run and they eat everything in sight, full of peril, such’s disease! All the wretches are contaminated for the time being? So much so you’d rather have a better time leaving, never return, for your heart might mourn the likens of a throng of such diseases in the taking, lost approach and therefore coach such thing as a flight whenever such’s the roach in which your stay shall make the ill-porcelain!’

Therefore he left and returned in a week-fold hour. Therefore standing upon the cower; trying to peep in, but seeing nothing, yet seeing everything; the wretches were dancing, all but succumbed to such wild dances as one might see their rancid tandems as something to be weary of.

‘A friend of mine had just passed away, may I earn a drink by solace?’

On an immediate notice he leaped on top of his chair, flinging himself as if on a ramp with his belly first at sea level, ending up pointing at the ceiling before, fifteen centimetres in front of his seat, he was twisted from the almost plank-like sitting into a complete straight on the bar drop, on his hind legs, where, he dashed straight by his right side to the end of the line where he picked up the little yellow man having his drink moments before he got to have his say, then flung him down the floor, causing a loud thud to accompany what only appeared as the static noise behind the flopping his reckless behaviour allowed to be heard. The echo of the bounce receded back into its hole. After regaining his senses, being flaccidly placed on the floor, the yellow man simply rose himself as if from the grave, flipped out of the coffin, right to the point where he started floating eerily and slowly before his arms extended to both sides of the room, leaving nothing but his head pointing backwardly as, out of his arms, this strange circular hill-appendage, small insects started popping out, before being shot like spittle out of the very mouths that had been made out of his siphoned kettle of lesser limbs, some being hid here and there inside the fat-barrel table. Kept for spoiling; a few minutes passed in silence before one of the paper-planets got thrown in, made out of a check-out note of some twenty-dollar worth or more, gone up like a coat-hanger, and then landed like a missile on some third world country on top the head of one of the customers. Two of them were already dead on the sight. The little yellow man was cackling, thinking himself braver than everyone else after deluding himself with having an advantage! A fight ensued and the knuckle beetles were already pulled out and filled with bloody-grinned jaws dislocated pins on pep-talk venues.

Breathe

Only one of the platforms was visible to them, as it was bastardly placed as to stare only at the wall hanging on the other side-chained, as they had only passed through one of the floors then. It was a perfect squared C, rotated horizontally, if seen from above, pointing at their right, whereas the left side hold a straight bridge with a gap next to the middle where there stood a most peculiar elongated 'missile'. Beneath it there would be more of these 'stapler' formations, bearing hundreds of stacked on top of one another bombs, with separating hidden staircases beneath and between them. Receding low and high points here and there, corrugated plates everywhere, most importantly, there was the junk and the barrels and the other broken machines that had been abandoned ever since, most of which hadn't been spoken of. These structures, monoliths, were capable of moving, watch-towers although in look, or fire watches, hanging like cranes, crawled. Hardly would they stay or sink, but capable of expanding, and bridging one another as they would come out of their way, millions of them had.

But it was dangerous hanging outside for long, because of them, the beings out there. They were like flex-curling, blimp-fat filled with growths, forearmed arm appendages with single, accompanied by their fat twisted in the front like a python-thumbs, or if they were vertically flipped, would've looked like a craned neck with two fat beaks molded-close to two-balloon inflated creatures. But the thumb region was split-hybridized with a strangled spiked tri-dome with a small chess pawn-shaped protrusion sprouting out of it, which looked as if it, itself, domed on top the many sharpened blades that adorned the fat drooping appendage sack it loomed over. A rain of black powder ripped away whatever shred of humanity there was among the many ill-sought for remains of there ever having been a city or a remnant of civilization.

'Your senses are tainted, you will never be human that way.'

'I still have a chance, I think, but, my mind, it's been poisoned. What can I do about it, master?'

'There's yet some that ought to be sekt just yet and tried.

A piece of your mind; it needs to be lodged inside the ground. It reeks still. Rots away, because of us; but I still think there's a chance, if you bequest enough of him. He can fix it, he can fix the land, the land is his after all, his touch make ill grow, his touch makes stalk out of whatever wretched contorted that you ought to know. Otherwise, it will keep falling apart.'

Their bodies angered, not unlike them. The pieces, whatever they could gather from around the place, added to their outer-sacks, the boils keeping all safe inside of them. A damp little stinger as well, sprouting out a tree. It moved upon rods and beams that were not belonged to it by any means, nor would they stand attached for long, if had it so:

'Of course, of course, you do and will do as you please, but follow after, through that hole, crawl if you have to, brought and aft of little more than maggots, swaying.'

Most peculiarly he asked of him, whom was named, prior to the advent of the maze, the maker of grit, sharpener of feet, he fancied it. Only a most rounded globular head rested-draw-contorted as for the hounding and most malicious of the voiced echoes that bounced around his ever-gloried head. A transparent fish-globe skull, with a brain fragmented but plated by millions of iron spades, with cysted rubies planted inside its socket, staring long-forth projecting, a single beak-lance drawing out of it, with many incisors drooping down, alerting of the little brow they were approached by. A malicious segment, almost rib-cage like of two by two segmented limbs, without palms kept the crystal sphere from falling. A ray of moving acid spat, out the tip of its 'beak', drawn out by the smell of palsy; of smoke, showing out of a chimney that was no farther than fifteen miles off the trailed snail-road made out of shells, many of whom were ever so drawn to one another tottering tithed greens verdure, cunt.

Most voices were lost as the second door opened, upon the monsoon of a command but bidden as to listen to the day of July, again, the sight that lay before them was open-wide slit, as if by force. There in plain sight.

An android body sprouting out of the body of a man whose upper-side of the trunk, cut off the collar bone, upwardly that is, lacking in arms lend itself as a socket for the machine to come out of it. Its head, on top was a painted cranium with two jewels. An echo could faintly be heard : Hoigar.

It smashed through one of the nearest building, walking peacefully as if nothing was unchanged. Since it could clearly be seen that the great race-track he came out of from, the general direction being sprouted after-shade in dark planetary sight a-run of the mill crowd with people's he's been used to get there where he were. Part of them possessed his mind, a cancer of interlopers all laughing at him for some reason or another, being very much incapable of discerning reality from what was being fed into the neurons that had been saved and given onto him for safe-keeping since his brain-jelly-jar of a head was a fishing bowl of sinew-crack spine soup-mixes, mixed themselves with various other chemicals made out of the bodies of men. He imagined them in a Stadium of some kind, trapped with him in an endless competition whereas he would not stop from anything, and nothing other than crushing their spirits, their flagrant rage's haze being blinded by a perdition granted by the remains of his swollen yet solemnly beating bleakly-so, blocky-set heart, that bled for them, as pained he was by most disgusting an apparel of bones that manifested around both his mechanical body as well as his humanoid part, many of them being there as embodiments set to fight him, although he was very much incapable of meeting them fist for fist, since they were cysted-brought to their knees, bloodily knuckled by pints that were incapable of resurging and regurgitating the pain they had inherited through their memories, since they were like elephants in some way, bastardly working over-hour over-clocked in order to remember the days they had been beaten to a pulp, whereas neither of them could survive, entirely, although spectral phantom-limbed as they were both in body and in mind, there was something too irresolute about the way they were acting, beating, slashing, cutting themselves in frustration-bred out of the fact that their defects were readily propagating the most distasteful, their punishment for thinking being frustration, followed by deep laceration as they bled spectral chemicals, the wholesome quality of blood-liquefied bloody-sank-sank droplet flower-thrust burying the stadium beneath itself, in what appeared to be a pit filled with blood-creep parasitical peons working on the blood mines, whose growth, of clumsily 'placed' yet placated by hard-work chiseled by mere strength of arm, force, by muscle-power in rapport to the quantity, heavy-weight ratio by the force propagated by the incisors which were in turn used to destroy, as hard as they could, not only the sides of the walls themselves, being very much so reinforced by several layers, each layer being contaminated by not only corpses but by the contaminated blood that had been run out of the specters themselves, whose procrastination ended when, sullen as they were dowry, they realized that there was no possible escape from this eternal hellish-nightmarish torture, being so defeated, that at a point in time they simply chucked themselves into the pit that's lain below them. This entire ordeal being very much so not only a show of incompetence but a sick-looking memory Hoigar wanted to have nothing to do with, although, by mere chance, which worked to his inconvenience, hardly felt a matter, turn out, to his dismay, that this memory of it happening, that is to say, the events that occurred during the past few months, got associated with the stadium, which, although might've been envisioned as a rather generic looking one, the cylindrical pit on top of, whom-width rested on top, placed on it, was, there, put on it, looked like a blood smoothie filled with worms and layered plates of ice-cubes that just so happened to be his favorite-favorite drink he would never forget the taste of, although he hadn't even had a chance to get a taste of it, which in turn, had him licking his finger-toes until he became, that is not to say, he did, but that he took the shape, like a contortionist's, a canoe. Some of the other buildings joined in the other one.

As little as was known by the strange torsoed humane with a strange domed-in a multi-faceted shaped face with two rounded-circled speaker shaped emptily hollow eyes, drawn forth as a mammoth's skull, whose tusks are molded into one, with a doctor's stethoscope for a mouth, haired by many coils that at the end, bore a single rounded old telephone's speaker's handle device. With an almost armored look he wore, and instead of a leg, although lacking in appendages, capable of levitating a few feet off the air, a giant seed-like growth it bore, where it stored all of its organs. No longer than a few hours ago, below the basement of the first of the adjacent buildings to the one that's been completely nigh-close to it destroyed, or prior to it handling the arrangements that were needed to be had in order or with regard to the delivery of the first pyramidal structure as well as the peculiarly horned-chimney bricked obelisk that stood no farther than twenty feet to the great alchemical sphere that was lain in the middle of the chamber, as well as the other utensils that've been repurposed as for the act of thieving from one of the dirty yet declared out of order kitchens out of which they've been taken out of, having went not only unchecked and unguarded, it so happened for a culprit, that being, one of the very men this Meyopylat, the one levitating whose entrance had been very much un-well received, in the ritual haul, that being the very chamber where the monolith-like obelisk's been found in, as it happened, the same man that's witnessed the theft was the same one who so happened to be in his presence, Pylat's, and whereas they both went their separate ways in a most disputably obtuse manner, as for the stranger, having gone through one of the, walk of separations, cradling his very fate dug through the soles of his eyes as they've entered a dark abode, a hopeless tunnel, at the end of which he's met his untimely end, the other followers that were present, numbering themselves in what would be fair to say, the hundreds appeared to have gone titer and thetetter, until not a single man who's presence was ever-so well received by his benevolent self even made sense as to rejuvenate the very idea that there could be a chance for there to be any survivors left in any place whatsoever, other than the ritual chamber he was in, though currently, in hold of a single living being, standing most displeasingly confused.

Twenty bullets had already been shot, yet neither one of them grazed the side. They were flaccid now, on the ground near them, on top of a soiled by some sea-level raised incline wavish brought in-seepage of 'water' that made them squirm, as they've become fish, but not any kind of sea-dwellers either, but ones of a specific kind whom rarely are seen as to resurface out of the chasm that are beckoned as to be their natural habitats.

'I enjoy beating my dog, sometimes, only sometimes, only when it's done something wrong, such as peeing in the house despite being pot-trained to do it outside. She's old and all, but needs to be punished.

Peeing inside the house is a maximum offense crime that can lead to severe maim and a lot of physical trauma being put to the employ of the Enforcer against the criminal in question. I am the judge, the jury and the enforcer. I need to beat my dog, otherwise it won't learn. It's for the better that I do; otherwise she'll simply start peeing wily nilly wherever she pleases, this fiend, this bastardly creation, this disgusting mutt, this little hopeless dumb-non-human entity that need to be stomped underneath my foot, beneath my toes. I have to beat her constantly. The good man, dog beater; I have to beat her, it, I have to beat it, my dog, all the time, constantly, increasing the intensity of my derangement as I keep pounding my foot against her skull, pounding her into eternity as she becomes nothing else than a pool of blood for me to leap on top of, to bathe in her and at the end, clean up after myself. Filthy dog, I hate it. I loathe how I am forced to look after this cunt, this whore, this bitch, this, this, archetype of a woman. Seems all too likely that they can't be differentiated, bitches from women. Both anger me, especially females, who seem to piss themselves when being raped, by force, coercion being put to the employ of the rapist. And the rapist, when the rapist turns a killer, he doesn't have to become a cleaner any longer.'

A lone candle-melted, lumped with blest blisters, wax-melt in appearance, with a bubble sprouting off this waxen-golden yellow-reddish volcano's top, the corpses being encased around its base and across its body, at the top, only a most peculiar skull lay frozenly inside the crag, a giant one, cumbersome and filled with knife-handle with lumps sprouting off their 'blades' incisor formed spires with strange worm-shot drooping elongations coming out of it, out its sockets, the jaw, the teeth and every side of its bone-structure, falling down. They squirmed but trapped they couldn't handle being snapped back in place once pushing out too far. As this tower only shook as well, upon an altar-box it rested. As an orator ordaining a crowd with his speeches' wonder; placed inside a wagon-like trunk, elongated and behind it, after. One could see a giant pockish tail, fatter than the wagon, with an iceberg-raised tiny-tinted pointy incisor-pint as well as it could be seen as a nail. The mass only thrust the wagon on top another limb with many tiny feet It crawled upon, as if it were but a mounted upon beat that drew around its chariot of cartilage, in front of the men it drew upon, as for their vigilance, twas tested:

'You shall stop here and go no further!'

But they could not stay for long their mouths, since there was another, as if inside a carnival's barred electronic car, but as thick as an arcade cabinet, inside of which a man without a torso with an astronaut shaped head that was cracked, without features, made out of one piece as this 'device' which was his body crawled upon the sight as well. And he was made out of hundreds of heads and features, arms, but they looked chiseled but smelled of rotten meat, were white, and yolkish-green and spoiled, rotten, reddish, with more rounded forms here and there, and a giant two winged, but downwardly rotated, pointing up, pseudo 'ring' behind it. That moved only by elongating its front and back side as to raise itself up, deforming its entire body, as it release from the middle a second body double that crawled like a lamia, contorting itself inside out where it had to go with the certainty of quickness it needed to prove itself ever-so malleable and flexible as to drive the people –high away, for where it stood now, tall, it looked like a Baron, adorned by many shaped. A finely crimson suit, and a black mouth-doubloon appeared to protrude out. Many of the front-coming out of it shapes, like rooster's hen, but green and spoiled as well, corpses but without the beaks, still attached but mournfully they rested at its 'feet'.

It was definitely not going to get any easier than this, since they were on his track, incapable, of, ah, a, there, that one, dumb-faggot; a dumb-fucking retarded faggot, standing there, fagging around. A nasty fucking fruit; with his dyed hair a comb piece in; but he wasn't going to make a case out of it since they would sniff him right away. And when it happened, when they all found that reasonable point to go all in, hell's gonna break loose on top his head.

'Oi, nigger, I think I called you before so at the very least I think I earned an answer or so.'

This nigger was special, it was special indeed. Fat beyond belief, a frozen chick whose head was cut, open by the looks of it, out of which a key-shaped needled tomb-cartilage organ appeared to infest him. No explanation was needed.

A beam of purple-flashy irresolute light drew out from inside of it, the pillar that stood by its side. Something close to twenty or so pinhead surrounding the area on top of which it undulated its very drool-worthy sights. As for a site behind it was set, a pseudo swamp with a few see-through objects, yellow-gelatin miniatures of mountains as well as other pseudo geological shapes that appeared to have gathered around it, many of whom resembled, in some defunct way, fleas and other insects, leaping crickets whose lodged-near their sides giant-phantasms, whom had gathered near the site as well, started jolting up and down, in a desperate attempt to get at them, since they were ever so perfectly still, at all times that even the slightly-similar in superficial manner, attempt at a movement resulted in the entirety of this cave being forced onto a choke-point. Various elliptical deformities, such as one would come to accept as either eyes or some left-over breathing extremity that could no longer be considered as being of any use. Various spectators gathered, already come from various spots of abandonment. Many cracks and cured-meat rotten legs leading them around, levitating as they spread a cloud-of chained leaping diseases. It was only a matter of time at this point until either of them would say a word.

His slaver, his nigger-dark skinned bloated slave drew back to his master. To his bowed knee, from beneath it:

'Please master, we must leave before they do something to us. Something that will so regrettable that your existence will be deemed as being finite, incontestably of no use to them as to keep feeding us still, until mouths be shut down, until finally allowed for water to be drawn from out of lungs of wherever else.'

'Silence, nigger; or have you forgotten who is the one in charge?'

There was an eerie silence and little to no response from the creature. It merely sunk in one of its lower pouches where it stood some time, brooding, in a place beneath the earthier soil's rapier, showing signs of touch. Its face was peeling off by the minute, creeping off to reveal a second one beneath. It was ruddier, leathery even. A pertinent thought; such simple creatures, are they not?'

'One would find himself experiment on them, especially after taking into account how eerily disgusting they seem to be, how wretchedly they act whenever met by some force greater than theirs, that is often put to the employ of whoever benevolent being there is out there to act upon them.

A pitiful thing but largely unsurprising, since they are what they are. Wretched, ugly, contorted, pitiful beings of little to no worth, that will cast themselves against you whenever they find it convenient, or know that they can get away with. For that reason alone, I have to bury you alive, my little simian friend. I have to make sure you shall not cause too much trouble, since, there's something rather disgusting about the way you've been acting as of lately and don't think I haven't noticed it. These certain behavioral changes I'm talking off, they've been gnawing at my skin, rubbing me in the worst possible manner. You, abominations of nature, filthy of tawny skin, you're something else. Something beyond reason and for that alone, one might find himself taking a few cuts here and there before finally allowing you rest.'

A macabre set of on-lookers drew from every side; whispering in slurred speech, warring each other as they simply walked, with their heads in and out, incapable of fitting them in since they wore collars with fit-through shapes they always missed the proper entry in, like dumb-children incapable of fitting them in, square-box-star-elongated-circle-cylinder- improper neck fitting, out of which a few things, tenebrous as they were, extended:

'Out with it, out with it, pinch the steel bars, pinch the steel bars I'm telling you, don't try to cheat me because I know that kind of stuff, I made it.'

Akrecken, the leader of the band:

'I've spoken to this chair several times but it will not respond to me, I swear, I can calculate the mid-size region of the full extension of one of them entering another, then stepped on top of it, added to the pile, and brother, let me tell you something of it now.'

There was a nervous jeer that was hingedly expressed, present in all of them. Especially in the way they moved. Expressed only by lousy-foot; and a few more people there; all of them bankers and stoke-brokers, but only on posters. They laughed sincerely, with patriotic gulfs filled beneath them, stained. It dripped off the wall and onto the floor, while those around them kept fitting in the wrong pieces, all the wrong fares:

'Won't you try taking a cone and fitting it in? I swear, they've taken us for fools who can't remember, they've taken us for dolts, for people who felt themselves up-fielded, trunks of the calling, but more, I swear, it can be trained, they were training us since we were born.'

'Shut your mouth and grab a handle.'

A few of them onlain, across the lower-hanging stones that drifted on the same-looker, near one of the hookers, but that was only a particularly strange fish-netted door, whose handles were placed both on the wrong spots. It required the actioning of greater hands than they possessed. Some enormous grapplers; with stroked upon finger nails, all curved like talons, to fit and plunge onto it, away.

'That is not a whore, I swear, I saw that sign again, it's from a bar, albeit one of the old ones no one seems to venture near. Think you've ever saw one of them?'

'Never, I don't venture into soundly places.'

A few miles away from them, called:

An almost too-loud a machine drew one of the rooms in front of them, through the great hall. It was inviting, even luring, to hear it call on them less. A few hotel-rooms inside of it, fashioned as to impress, or lend one a thought: There's someone inside. Despite the dungeon-appearance of the walls, the ruffians welded everything onto them, through the cracks between each brick but alloy, and the chains kept everything together, to the fault of the architect whom had once been clearly hit then hid inside, at the back of his head, nails, but none punctures, not reported, but from a point where one could see why. He built it all wrong. Some doors were strapped, which only added pressure to every single time one tried opening or closing them, again. Some people might find themselves staring at a coffin, or them, standing in the lobby, smoking; a parcel of a few living people staring at them. They were an awkward lord who was always struck changing and exchanging places with their heads, head-on, not to ask, but a young lad was send forth, a bucket on his head and the countenance of a man twice as old.

But the clock hit seventeen, and where he'd been seen, he disappeared, leaving a pile of ash, the janitor's trash and a few insects that were under-foot, hid beneath a plank, whom had operated him, piece for piece, part for part, readily gathering themselves to bring him home.

'The work of a magician, or the cleaner's stove!'

Soot, a lot of it, but it was off an ashtray; a wagon stood no further than fifteen meters off where it's been. OF course, of course, it could've been much worse than being thawed. The entirety of the wagon had been frozen, but inside of it, there was something still burning inside.

As they drew near, clearly still throwing their head back and forth, readily struck, as to catch them in case they fell off the ground, the jugglers up-pointed:

'A croissant-lamp, it's what makes the heat, not whatever is inside that ice-heap. I swear I've seen this kind of thing before, in some ancient place none of you would happen to know of, and if you had, I swear, even then, you would not even dare think of the things I've had to endure, or have to go through, or even be a part of, since, I've been vanquished of all flit, tenderness-is-hot abode, come upon my will but hope, lo', that I will not have the will to share, forage what you can as in the mere chance, if it's approached upon the time that I reveal as such, for every man that's listening now or could curm each suffering's hardened bond we've been sharing for so long without fear delighted, frightened but righted off, of rite impatient, strong, we were, as to fade away whenever in group, ahoy-leeway, never to have shared what I still come to bear, to stumble upon, such mild despair that once but brooded out, of hiding in the lot no longer as to be allowed, but flee, of dark absinthe drinking every such purged night, you will have then recognized that living with this kind of knowledge would do no man any good, as it would only cast him out of the un-cherished abodes, draft of cones, in which he will have shun his life, living inside of, calling each man he sees on the street a wretched specter's wife, for that's the life one has to live in once made known, living as in trudging alone, forever stuck but called, paranoid. I've lived but under the impression that once it would be gone, if I were to only close my eyes from time to time, training my quickly-endowed recognition, being familiarized or set in habit, hardened stone. To fashion it with chisel shown, by terms dictated in such a fashion as to be claimed of being or belonging only to mine, mine arms, hands and ruddy souls, anchored to a plane of hardiness, prepared as to be shown, no other way titter or tether, or finely weather it through such reign of insolent drops, struck by lightning cast, only to be met, alas, by fasting, alert, dying by day, worn-out but burnt, by hurricane taken apart, by conditioning to be met, but barter my soul for no less than some light, meaning, understanding that were never come, all to understand why I'm haunted, by, and why I may never grow to resist its influence as I am engulfed in this state of mind I may never seek retreat out of. For I've seen many wretched creature that would make me seek no memory of home since lodged they are, in every abode and every den I may call. To refer to such in vanquished form, but slay. Whichever doubt you may have of me or what I have to say, for you have known me ever since and you have searched for a reason to leave but hinge upon the quietness I offer; while searching or asking for compensation no longer, you stay, sit and lay in quiet near me, as I fashion no ill-thought towards the forbearers of the tools that were granted, to, and offered us, as well, as it is due to come, upon the realization that all mourning will be done, countenance withheld, and come upon it as I will, or I have come upon, stumbled even, very well. I admit that I have grown fond of it, of losing myself in change, of changing, switching and slipping in every slip of neck I would fit my noose instead, of seeing death. Memory granted, but I live abhorrent, wanted for, by it alone and asked on every turn, when will you fall? And who will mourn for you if you were alone? I seek no contribution be withheld from, and thus I end casting my die and offer my unending contribution to disquiet as I lay submerged into naught but empty silence.'

They were bloodied all over from stuffing their ears with some kind of plaster and some foam. Another man approached, but this one was taller, and was made of some broken up apart uniform he had taken from another soldier, down below:

'I've been watching you closely, but I've yet to understand what is the reason behind coming here in the first place? It's a danger, extremely dangerous and not a single soul can survive by normal means, let alone, with this, this thing, stacked against you!'

Above them, the building, it could, it could fall at any moment. Truly a marvel beyond the common belief of danger and of meaning, if one were accosted by its fall.

But that was not all that happened there, not even close. Various signs had appeared prior to them doing the, retaking, mistaking and the flopping around. A few paraplegic motions had them drawn to the floor, hanging loosely by each other's collars, then around the bones of the floor where their legs had been enwrapped by some of the enriched by iron molecules they were sagging in, as to crawl through. Since this dilapidated place had every brick made to draw them in and out, then allow them to walk freely on open bands, many of which were kept secret below. So many passages, too many secret passages opened, all at once. Before anyone could react they were withdrawn to such a level that they could see nothing but feel, feel with their feet, for every step that drew or pushed them forward had them sprinkling ankles with every morose point being a stickler to their Pandora Boxes. Every sociopath delighted himself staring, well equipped with some nightmare-driven glasses that stuck out of their faces as if they were grown by them, shown by them, rubbed as they looked. One pulled at it, started extending it forward until it's become a binocular, out of which a pool's worth of dripping pure nasty-rotten smelling cardboard kept in wax-fruit liquefaction, pure-pure pure. But not a single soul was disturbed by this since they were running into circles, getting a knife from somewhere on the floor:

'Get down, he's aiming it at your face!'

Another shout leaped off into the distance, only that it was too soon and it came off the side of his face. Shot-through, the man leaped out his chair, squirming in the air, making a motion as to grab something before a piece of the ceiling fell off again. No passage door, no trap, but a single bust-stone that smashed through all his visors, leaving him in a state of general blind. They were contempt with finally taking a break from observation. Rummaging no longer but standing in front of him, thinking of what's been done, what's transpired, what entered through his side, and what they had to win out of it.

'If I were to, only.'

A quick stomp over the side of his skull revealed some cotton. He was full of it. The others joined in, leaping on top the body, trying to get as much action as they could; not to lay it on too quickly, as people watched, but there was a thaw. Heat rang on. A bunch of rats appeared, many of which deeply embed into the same liquor everything surrounded itself or put itself through. Fire would soon dip everything in a cajoling embrace, and there was still the one man in their group without a face, clinging on his eye device.

There's no such thing as raping a woman, or at least one could be deceived to think, that one is incapable of lying as to no peep at least a wink, then shove it in.

Cow-war

Lots of dead heaps of the old helmets drowned, with little to be said about the villages that'd been brought down, down with the children, down with the maidens, down with the animals, down with the trenches, down with the people, down with all, and there was little to be left but living fifteen centimeters above the ground floor. Where worms were dry, left overs from the past charade, with the rest of the rubble that followed in their glorious wake, the men who trailed behind were numb. The numb-skulls that were on top of them but couldn't walk; yet they had their glorious gliders to which their lower bodies were attached to, every single one of them connected by long tranquil-looking long-pumps. A network of them, all sharing what they had inside:

'The two Mayors shall come within the hour, when the obelisks fall in line, but no sooner than it's happened, else, there might be some people disappointed of what's come into their headed sons!'

It trashed, it trashed, it trashed everything it had in sight. Walking on a street in the past; a few cops raised their guns and started shooting at him, then the others came from the woods and the streets were filled with twenty or so figures, shirtless but it revealed much about the components that were implanted into them. Most of these 'soldiers' being fresh, too fresh; large boards and some smallish components that looked like probes encompassing the greatest areas, giant pills or cylindrical tube-filled strange mechanisms that were rounded, and spun like washing-machines, but allowed for the sight to be taken as more men joined in, trying to gun them down, riling as many troops as possible until there was no space left for them to run.

'Get away from him!'

A 'human', large-spread, chest slightly wider but in the middle, a trail leading down his belly button, where there lay a few springs and a few wires in-between, keeping domed-for touch and other tottering things that came out of him, mainly antennas that kept bubbling balloons of meat upward-thrust in order to grow the organic components they lost along the way. Hand-thrust, immediate swipe and the cop fell down, incapable of lifting himself from where he stood, alas.

They charged and trampled through the cops. But from this crowd of almost nigh-unkillables one stood out in the back, yelling and shouting:

'It hurts, it hurts, it hurts, I cannot stop!'

Immediately, after that:

‘I can’t stop it from hurting and progressing, I cannot stop it from progressing!’

It felt like some unlawful disease that would not stress itself past the fruitious attempt it had begun –de-centering from, as its body started convulsing a few feet off the ground while still being attached, loosely to the legs and the arms that thrust around, longer than they had been before, much wider then as they took a hard turn towards the other machine pieces that had made the entirety of their beings, until completely thrown out of balance, they begun forming a strange concave at the top see-through tent, which had its hinder legs descend further in the back, the front-arms completely annexed to the oval region in which they dug into, then as if rehearsed, a strange portal filled with unnatural dark energies started opening, convulsing openly as it started drawing out for breath, this dark three-headed hydra-leviathan worm made of pure energy which lodged itself into the body of this wretched thing, the cowed figure with limbless worthless scummy-cones that drew out of its eerily jerky body that belonged to it, the outwardly creature that had possessed this entombed ‘humanoid- corpular’ cast it possessed in order to get inside the world, using it as a stepping stone of much-allure disengaged out of, effigy-implanted, inside the head of there being herded – still, inside all of the other modified men that were picking up signals from the other worlds, of quiet unspoken, blasphemies of never-see, seething through the agony, as they waited for something else to happen; herded beings fighting against one another, in gambles, waiting for a win or a loss, or something that would come to no point and at no point in time, during the desperation that had castrated their rotten-brains in order for their elliptical-horns, that connected to their bodies, empty plumes, harder, fatter and much more rotten than before, outwardly flung, as they mixed together, as their essence only continued bastardizing itself into one, a loss of purity disabling their superior minds as they were forced to become almost nigger-like in terms of what they acted or were like. Wretched and fallen apart, distraught, incapable of churning either one of the smaller bottle-filled things that entered the land from the side of the Silos; eighteen of them gouged open from a long-stride road-highway led filled with gas terminated but off the limits under construction, derogation being part of the man’s carry-through the war of veteran hedges put over the dark desire to be delirious for a second more’, as the respite of the olden age’s crevice was done and revealed, the various hedges and the lone-hills that were adorning the Mastodons that had been dug then visibly displayed from open-cooperation during the riot’s open revolt as a sign of domestic causality’s driven irresponsible, yet incapable of properly adorning either one of the men’s whose fates are still lost in the war, dug-out graves then lost in avalanches of dirt pushed into open graves revealed by the shattered epitaphs whose lost words still echo through the sullen side of the perniciously-swollen December’s last call of wind’s summer’s frost eve at the noon and dawn of January’s cold approach of coming to the age of winter-globes’ clusters of shrapnel-ice come into the eyes of every man wondering what happened during the alluring day of what’s to be and what happened, what’s truly happened during our stay in the Vietnams, where Gook ladies with yellow nipples started being milked by bulls, as the white man plowed through rain of steel’s come through, as the white man delivered them from the Judaic-Bolshevik promise of Jews-molesting-children-from-this-point on, at the sight of which, as many people killed, in the millions, was deemed a sacrifice readied to be delivered from this point on, to the afterlife, as soldiers gathered one last time, placing their swollen arms in memories of fallen-dog tags they thought they’d carry on forever, but they seem to have released them now, in these tombs of fallen angels, in which the marry-for-gotten-round, the Constitution the Jews wanted to disband, the niggers that were getting lynched for the crimes they committed against humanity, now that humanity, in some way was gone, both in spirit then all around, they all raised their rifles, their fiddles, their Berettas, their sub-machines, their pistols, their mugs, their cigarettes, their wives by their clearly tattooed arms, their nasty left-over-but-not-mourned for any longer stumps, their descendants that were at the time, thankfully to God, still white, their solidarity's abode, during the mourning of their loss of homes, that were being taken and mistaken, then sabotaged, as many of them were taken down by the creatures that profited out of the chaos that was ensued by man, out there, in the open, in front of all of their ever-watchful and vigilant eyes!

A giant maw made itself appear in a gust of mist, like horse-teeth aligned with the gums being made out of some rubbery chewing gum wax-boil filled gelatin, with a conically deformed, downward curved almost sword-like protrusions that started rotating and growing from one side to another until no longer was it fashionable, to be caught in the greater octave. A tomb-like enclave of many contorted ram' horns in terms of how the rigs and crevices filled and hid away, this bubbly contorted, deformed but elongated see-through skull, socketless and without a lower-side that would signal the presence of an opposable jaw. Connected to a great grappling hook of almost iron-alloy looking frame that kept a few low-hanging 'body-bags' that were constantly being released and lowered from below the main bone-chains that kept it hanging about. It came out of the portal and immediately started drilling its way through the air, until finally it lowered itself on top of a 'portal'-device humanoid, it soon after crushed underneath this unfathomable weight that could not be properly be dealt with.

An abhorrent jewel

What could be told of the documents that had been delivered this morning upon the brow of the Community's desk would yearn little more than no attention from the directed upon the trophies of oblique whose run-of the lot have completely ruined the last traces of there being any lesser second, third or fourth class of men, to have been drawn by any other means, to leave or to stay in this abhorrent Institution well beyond the occupation and the replacement of the board had taken place, since many of the men felt as if their inquires were unfold, their delirious rants unheard, blasphemed by waves of mockery-uncouth that no man should be forced to appease as to lend onto it, organically, the time of the day needed in order to reprove the parole bequest of all sanity that would require such an equestrian sojourn to take place, a coup d'état, that would righteously lynch them like a bunch of dirty niggers they themselves presented themselves as in spirit, despite not in look, as to come to the understanding that these self-admittedly villains have come to contort whatever portion of there ever having been a chance to fully draw in breath of iron and of spoiled breath, the mill now having its wings plucked as if a giant decided the fly was to be bedded in a coffin lowered in a crypt as well as the most luxurious of commands being ridden of all there having ever been, a chance of, venturing that slouch of dandy crudeness, of blob and of moisture filled-inside every single piece of growth that's come onto them during the itinerary's met basin, filled with the corpses that spoke to them, during the time they had been forced to bring in a few of the black-tar filled with chairs, on top of which they now are forced to sit down impaled, by black roots, as their backs are one, as they lack but arms, as the room they're in, the desk in question being bone-like, part of their rack, to which they're attached, all bearing but a single eye, lower-jaws pushed on both sides, like some kind of glider out of which small fragments, like miniature-bones, anciently taken out of some sarcophagi while they produce, through their mouths, puffs of smoke-dice-mice, atoms scattered as if by carpets being constantly whipped, along a whip's crack. The men under their employ are to hold testimony to the long-standing, almost judiciary intravenous disparity of every abuse that had been written off by the documents of peril that had been given place and existence of, as well as a chance to proliferate in terms of complete spread as well as the removal of any possible alteration as there might be as a hope for this system being given the freedom of inquiry, and inquisitiveness it needs to adhere to, by the very nature of this act, functioning at a level beyond the means or understanding, that is to say, completely removing any out-side, non-parliamentary-chitinous at to the regard of the body of functions as well as the people-above-the-people's far-beyond their understanding level of deterrence, as it would function as, by no means contestable, a natural barrier that would bar anyone that would be deemed or judged as being below their ranks, this monarchy of spirit's blind promontory task of excluding as many people as possible while at the same time blatantly lying to them as to convince there of there ever being a chance for them to join or climb the ladder, grow in rank, a thing that no man should be allowed to bathe in the false hope of since this kind of brainwashing would only serve no one and no one at all, to understand this truly, one would only have to have been made feel as if he rules over someone, only to have realized soon after that he's ruled upon, and that the people he's thought he ran happened to be the same people of the same complacency, same calling, same origin and same rank as he is a part of, making him reach a second realization, unless he is fully-brainwashed, completely, yet innocuously, dull, slow, or his parents are siblings, to have passed him at such a level, flying over his head, didn't get it, the chump just didn't get it, I mean, how can he be so, so; blind, at to fail to realize that the people ruling over him are actually, or do actually belong to the same class as he does, whereas the people ruling over everyone are nowhere to be found, leaving him like many others who'd, under normal circumstances hope to achieve something by either trailing the footprints or trying to make use of whatever else they could come up with in order to track down the people behind every movement, and every wrong-think carried on they didn't even know they were responsible of until they were told of; the Government is corrupt. They were filled with boils and they were melting and lost their legs that became something close to a clown's balloon animals in terms of the many appendages that started lifting and growing which elongated themselves, arching like scorpion tails, in this wreck of an unfathomable place that would disgust every if no, if ever there was another sane man to enter the room and bring the news of the new archeological wonder that's been found somewhere across the wild-coast of the Eastern Border of the lower Gulfs of Arabia where the latter, most disgustingly malformed, and yet unnaturally deformed tower-figures; these unnatural dark and tall things that could barely be touched came and returned back to life after being placed under some stasis of some unnatural coming they had refused ever-so-nearing the time, that oft be said, would've presented itself as some kind of threat other men like them, the archeologists, the locals and the brine full in shape workers that were, contract-workers, present there during this discovery found themselves trying, or hardly, depending on the preternatural condition of every man present there, from understanding, preventing them, therefore, from fully adhering to the consideration that this planet was no longer theirs as well as to the fact that they were responsible of a force, far beyond the likes of there ever being a chance for their turn of bowels to be interpreted as their openly expressed fear for the apparitions, these giant globular of green, yellowish-green and reddish-whitish-purple that overlapped, were see-through and appeared to be the blasphemously niggerish beings that dripped, dropped and poured themselves into the least comfortable thoughts that were present during the happening. Yet, the men feared something that was far beyond their mere reasoning abilities could ever hope to achieve or entail.

Indeed they have, as their mere mortal-human conditions of being allowed only for the fathomless approach of a most unreasonable and disjointedly somber quality of being, therefore-after made apparent to the, immediate abhorment of the first people who had come into contact with one of the ill-most hidden vile jews which had been ever so wretchedly caught in their coccyx of a prudish prude-like little pod of amber like fruition in which they as many others have touched, prayed and bowed down with complete insolence as to the fact that they were unaware of what was going on inside their heads while this strange sting-like thing that was pushing at the back of their heads, then through each temple's taken away but clearly flimsy filament of wonderment that had been taken from and out of with a prime-like fascia they could not endear being around of, had left with nothing less than a wretched sensation as that of some bodily intrusion they could not shake off, as if they were controlled by a supreme-overly beyond them malevolence, as that of some blasted unnatural spirit that had crawled inside of them until finally revealed, it had leaped in front of them, this giant-fat, unnatural toad of a mount, a mountainous cocoon wide spread into what would appear to almost be a hill of a creature with all of its limbs being thrown back and forth during this shamle of unconsciousness they could not be awakened out of during their drivel of an almost epistolary reckoning, as it, this almost pyramidical thing of fat, with many sprouting out of it giant humanoid hands, arms, appendages, various almost eyeless reptile carnivorous mouths, sharp stingers and almost syringe-fat-shaped thrusters, which had been completely embalmed, that is to say, completely in some kind of reddish-gray-meaty liquefied looking unnatural constantly falling apart skin it could not get itself rid of had revealed as little as a single recognizable head, which in any other case would only have revealed the, not to mention the account of many hollow black spots that revealed its red-bone, crimson-shrapnel cartilage like substance that made this iron-like thing that held it all together, and the fact that the entirety of the being more so appeared to be only the meat-fashioning of a rotten, way-past being and living kind of creature whose existence would've been seemed as being rottenly insignificant and completely dismissible by all other means, as this, this almost frame of a rotten building, with every floor being revealed by the constantly moving then the sails of red that fell on top of them, resting against them as if they hung across the ledges all too soon revealed nothing else and nothing other than its true head, as this wretched son, of none other being was to be held as no one else but one of the descendants of a Lomek; which had been immediately revealed by the very fact that out of that vacuous pile of growths as well as many unnatural things that came apart and came along, then lone-forth struck out, and then again allowed to continue out of their carcass, strikes and all around it struck were the walls that almost fell upon his fit of rage as the true head came out; that of a red-haired, one eyed, white-bone cartilage helmeted-like that of a deformed nautilus, but far simpler, far more infantile of a shell, almost like that of a sea-shell, simian. A red-haired simian that resembled its grape-tinted father, the progenitor who's come from that point onward, then fell as to appease, that sire of a second conjoined fiend, thrashing away with the stinger then retracted back and crawled within the weight of a single blocky foot, drawn and dragged along upon a broken shore and upon a ledge. The hair was wide-spread but only covered some of the meat, the blimp-like fat, belonging to this wretched fiend only tickled their fancies as they were quickly withdrawn; never to be found again, as that thing only ran around, in this facility, withdrawn from all life, as one would have it, the jewel it desired as well, and if it were any simpler after, no one would've found the abhorrent nature of the Son of Lomek any easier to harness after. For it ran and wretched and despite its sheer size no temple connected would withhold all of this unnatural thing that could not be taken-nor drawn away; the hinges that would take a hint, the other explorers that came in search of a jewel only to have their teeth, clatter in desperation, calamity's clamor to no end.

A shout had come out of somewhere, while, its head, its head that moved, lodged on the side, not even at the top of the mountain, the son's head was only come, as if out of a long-neck standing, as if from the depths of a hollowness come to a point, incapable of turning around but jointed, always looking to its left, then hope. It had, that it would ever meet the progenitor, the father, that had given life to it during the time of war, the rivers shallow-black, then torn apart, as never seen before:

'Release me you villainous fiend! Can't you see that I'm merely trying to escape this thing of rabid venture, to have myself be drawn away from the broken carriage taken such of plaster's coming to withhold me from being devoured by the means of retribution coming? By the evil field whose tales I've heard and of the evil days that will come to mourn me no longer whenever I'm come to life? To the reasonless approach no man in part will have taken for granted during the time I've come to understand what's come?

Out of them I will have reeled if I could have it so, but lo' again I'm afraid that my life is forfeit at the hands of others that would have me wrought in shapeless woe.'

'Tell me then good man, what's come into you that you've been driven to a driven of sun and of voices come back, returned back to the hopelessness of a hole in your heart that's been ripped apart, by stiletto's coming to the age, of blink and beam of ink, drawn to you, I've come instead to ask what's happened. I seek but reason but none's come so far, I seek forth as to know what happened.'

'They've stolen something from me, I swear, they stole my mind and sent me to this place that I may wretch myself to prostitution-thought of wanting such release as death only could grant me so, that I may never speak of the jewel yet again that I, oh May, have thought alive, then as to wretch, as to abide, and dream of it no longer as I'd see, what it is and what's been taken out of me, I seek no reason, nor else that might be taken still, but I can feel but nothing come to me now, for I'm still blind, I feel.'

'Then join me and we shall both attempt to find it in this place, we shall both seek reason where there's little to behold or little more that they might take away from us when the time ends, for it shall wait for no other man than the one who shouts the loudest!'

'Do you know and have you not heard the stories of what happens in here and whom thrusts himself away, calling after? Call again, and to have him pain himself through such antiquity as there would be, the saint. I've dreamed of the saint!'

'As have I my good man, that wretched most sublime corpse take from use, that limbless trunk, a face uncanny, that helmeted shaped hairless thing with sockets filled with two red-crystals, a jawless mouth open-forth, and called upon the sight of pools, crimson of red-globed wine and rancid.'

'That hairless thing dipping in the blood, that hairless white-flashy like, as if it basked into the glittering white shone-upon, the rays of a morbid-yet calloused sun, the one mocking us still with its blocky eyes, and teeth-but split.'

'By pain alone it had survived, the saint is mocking us, even still, he must be a simian.'

'It can only make so much sense from this point, that niggardly thing of flashy pale, a cadaverous thing of no little and no less. I've known as such but many who'd appear. I've know but lesser men who'd do naught else but sneer once they found out what I dreamed of, during the profoundest glimpses into their realms. Realms of joy, realms of pain, and others that had fallen apart; but I seek no will to find but eerily distraught disgrace, nor to drive away my pain out of my chest, since I can still hear it beating from this point on where they've taken jabs and stolen what little is there left and worthless come belong to worthlessness, I am aware.

That as soon as we release the shout, the saint has warned us!'

'Worn us out with little but no more than petty thought, but lo' and look around you, at this architectural delight! How could there be something as unfathomable as this, taken from us and from out dandelion feet? Of puffy whites that had made us try, and such attempt, to flee, whenever looking such dumbfounded and come upon the tree, of insolent branches, of the abhorrent come today. I seek but such a thing as freedom as I seek but seek in due such flight as I await the wont for reason, as to see whether or not such things exist as the dreaded simians!'

'Then shout away and let us seek but flight!

Let the animal descent if he is still alive!'

As they did and little more but yearned for, little more of dreadful hope to share, as their echoes but had such sublime effect upon such halls of dread, to have been heard no less, unwonted as they brought onto their face their end. For there it stood the giant apparition crawling, making smirks and cackles, grins then come upon some bile it staggered, as if moving itself had been a strain, both upon its mental prowess as onto everything else.

But the Jewel, the jewel was stolen by the paraplegic-god, whose only innermost inconclusive yet abhorrently mischievous crime against humanity was robbing it completely of the blood-liter of plasma's swollen bacterium kingdom of appendages from which it stole one of the pouting lepers that hid it inside.

'I've seen it before, I've seen it during the dark ages, somewhere down there, before it had been dropped into the slithering cower of depression in which it hid itself before anyone could venture to rip a part of it and come onto it by rubbing every single block of sightless fright!'

'Why would you reveal that onto me now that I'm bastardly away from that lightless bliss that had once robbed me of the sight I shared with one of the petty little anchored to the ground, wretchedly abhorrent mazes, in which shingle of loft surroundings growth, where they might know of thee, and therefore come, I know but little of what happened to them.'

'But dear oozing this without respite, I seek but need of wretched, that I may help; only one thing that could surely be frightened as to show there come upon the whole lot with hope of mighty gone when praying. Of mightily as there be, and insolence upon their praying in-between I seek but oft twas' which was said.'

Hagghunt hid in one of the boxes, unmoved by what was happening around him; there was some dust and some sand sprayed around some leaves that bloomed upon the sight' ed lost; where there had only been a few people, much to their complaint maligned by what was going on around them. Far than being aware of what was going around them, being left in some growth of some pale-tallish corn-like grave, a sharpened by maligned maze; followed soon after by a flood of growths-come back.

‘You’ve rung my ears!’

He then called, as the echoes started rubbing it in with every moment’s proud-but swollen sight of light.

One of the Hospices

‘I was approached by him during one of my nasty years, the ones spent in the Hospice.

A mountain hag rump, floating, I could see through her, it, made out of many insects that were all formed into adorning pitches that moved like static. As if, as if, she were an invisible woman wearing the a curtain on top head, head. My eyes deceived me, for she was cut in half as she continued eating through the people she entered through, walking both on top and through them. I was afraid that she would momentarily seek to bring and cast ruin over me and for that reason I sekt no ordained gasp as I returned back onto the garden home that’s been dug for me to hid in, underneath the giant leaf, during the stormy rain, as I was looked after by her, who looked down upon me as from the crack, that slither left in-between the leaf and the ground, above the pit, this lid, from which I stood but touched by her, as she would mock me.

I conceive, with not a great ease that she gravitated towards me in some way I’ve never been approached or come to have felt upon my body cast in wither, either, never way before, by no perdition of a mild recast, by nothing as much as this insolence that would cast upon me such a throat-bothering insufferable must, of sekt alone in the far distance, or shout for aid. That I might have someone drag me from the pit I’ve been cast into, by each and every conceivable way. But there was no one that would hear me as to ascend past that much to myself needed, much needed.’

Mouthless with scorn were the people whom were the building stretch. During the time Neil Kleig was trapped inside that pit, they grew and stretched like some unreasonable, yet abhorrent creatures that would by all means seek no way to enter, outwardly, yet clearly out-shown, out the bands of lights and pitched-up colors they had slicked, and cindered through the fire of the pot-broils they had concocted beneath the earth, where spat, since their heads united at the top of the building, onto or having become the ‘ceiling’, as envy seething through their outwardly funnel shaped but strangely shell-like mouths, through their bodiless fingers planted akin to roots beneath the ground where they fed some kind of parasitical entity of little to no regard for any other than its bothersome companion, one that would be mourned by far fewer than itself, but ask for certainty during a time during which one could not forget what happened to trail around them during the second beat of a clock’s ever-green fall of robes, the clattering certainty of the gardener being only met by nothing of his own but instead, he had been forced to kneel before a party of damned, certainly beaten into the ground and filled with soil-bugs- so much so that these gravediggers would no longer be dug out of the graves that they had cast themselves alone into as the dreadful, most insolent of flames that started expanding, bubbling from the ground had only, yet to be seen, acted upon the yet-few instruments that were useful or had been useful for, respectively the only men that had been kidnapped from the Hospice itself and allowed to stay there, in servitude alone up-bringing children and other countless generations bred with the mad-to-drivel bent nurses forced to feed and care, by bothersome niggardly un-care for themselves during the striking of the iron upon their backs, where, upon the sight, of that blasted room-of-crystal red, where not even the least commendable things, of hearts that grew and germinated on every wall as well would there have been a better hope for soil's scorn as to remember what an abhorrent throne has been cast away, a strange rectangular drawn thing as if it was indeed made by a stick, of stickiness, uncannily deformed.

As little as it was known about the circumstances that were clearly at play during the absence of a quiet-yet allure contrasted by the.

It laughed, again, this was the second time.

'It's open mouthed, is it not?'

Another experiment would be required to remove the vulva from inside of it now.

A row of most canine adorers:

'There's a cult involved in every decision this bottle-mankind has ever done, but they're nearing the point where they will be irrevocably shattered then melted in some fine rubbery paste I shall rub all over my face as I prepare myself to embrace their many voices while they suffer no less than needed, the passing of an epoch of pain, heartiness, hardly adventurous but just enough to quiet some of them down.'

'I see, but say, as one of the last physicians, what's been taken from you that you've diverged into this state of pandemonium-death driven anxiety you've fallen out of?'

'Since you asked so nicely, I would like to add only that I've seen the pain I've caused throughout the years to the people I've not only come into contact but the ones I've actively searched for a means, meant only by the culprit of abhorrent to distress himself as to entertain no perdition from no lordly being, murdering around at heart's content as I've come onto the plight of stares, the flight of stairs against which I've thrown, off onto the other side, countless victims I would've found no means, none other to spear, as my heart would beat, but leper, you must cast away whatever guilt you might attribute still, for I know but little shame over what I've done and since [of sic] wordless count of testimonies that are written, passed as my own, but otherwise blurring the fact that they account for saving men, when in reality I've been butchering incessantly, non-stop, to my heart's content, I've made hundreds upon hundreds, and hundreds more to suffer, killing them endlessly, only to appease that apparel of disease my coat's reign entrenched, had become, that sulfur of cast away into the basement' fire cove where they might no longer be entrenched by the pain I've felt as my heart has been taken away from me as well, since my cognition, in the Congos, if you may be so inclined to remember the lecture I held on the scripture of taken legs I've collected to make my platform, that is my home after all, as well as their souls that I own, that I won by fair-game and power-through plough of ghoul that might've crawled upon their chests, dragged by force away by my servants, the ones without faces but blind, I am not, for I feel that I've come to fear that which is, my life endangered, although others would sicken me no less, gut-impress by such wordlessness, as my insemination's disablement might've allowed you to reach the conclusion that's been lead to even before I've carefully chosen the time to open my mouth and reveal what I've encountered during that journey where, suffice to say, it has cursed me ever since by the most wretched of things that could only take away my petty mentality and throw it back onto a reality that's slickened and slapped it with naught else other than the elementary force that's been cast into the realm of darkness out of which I've cast a glance upon that wretched jewel that extended around my body, completely encompassing it in some chemicals that had, temporarily blinded me to such an extent that I am still dumbfounded as to how I came onto the plains of that dark world of grays, of dark-grays and similar-kind of made-through gradients that would've stolen my second heart, the second engine for my brain that's been stored and sorted in some kind of box that's almost come to explode in my own hands as I was prepared to give it away to this figure, this tall lady whose wickedness, featurelessness almost made me commit an act of evil that thy thyself would've cowered away from, since fear's might cast a hook upon the glaze, then munch back upon the grounded worms that entered me like hooks, granting me the vision of the perils that encrusted our world, which, upon my sight being regained, I was allowed to refrain, for a second more's breathing fear, that I can deem no longer a treacherous thing but instead, the only feel of despair that I might've shared with the people that followed from the unawares and from the distance, whom had come to hunt me for I've intruded upon their land of strange clustered together like hives, beings, that were made feel to me, forgiven, now by prayer alone, that I've tainted this world with this knowledge of the unknown by the blessed saint I've come to seek repast again, when all of the sudden, I feel as if, I feel no less than aware of what had happened then, that I had been forced to push that heart way back into the second open side of my chest by my right side, above one of the lungs and hid it there, only momentarily so, for such a thing as might've been forlorn then given, stolen by a such-and-through battlement of standard, that they've come, charged, right went through in order to protect the maiden I've almost handed onto the alter of respite, and mightily as I were, crafted a ring as to ask for her hand to a lady's death but come as I stumble still, the realization ever since that we were and are still of different worlds that could not be met by the same hope, by the same reason of logic and of laws that we might spare to think of each other as commoners, in the medieval times, therefore revel as I may in the fact that I lay away during the midnight hour of a night that's been stolen of sleep, on my own mighty feet still standing, like a blessed child in the night's ever but looking away, a curtained, but no less, drawn-away, and ever-since I looked every night, since that escape's delight, nearing the few months I've finally stumbled away, no longer in fright to share what I've come upon, I still see the stars, the shards, and the moon itself but cast in the shape of the jewel my eyes have come to accept as nothing more but some insolent throne of evil that's been quieted in the dark's own missing Solstice that could pain me no less than the day of the Leper's rot, come upon being brought onto the lower sided eighteen hundred altars, the ones in which, cocoon-like giant flat-blimp, rounded like towers, but almost thumb-like, their prisons, growths that have only their faces reveled whereas the rest of their bodies could only be brought out of the cones that were their prisons of worship, the parasitical lower-growths of the legless humanoid worshippers, that I have done as well and that I have done alone, all covered up by the people, the practitioners whom I passed as my own, by these doctors of no renown I've stolen from, that by all means could worship me no less and hit me with each whips' come to an end, blinded by a fate's uncannily distorted but disrobed by all membrane of a detrimental obscenity's felt during the honey moon's refrained to be consumed by the finding of a cadaver, not hers, but left behind, as treacherously as the day one bought her from some Asiatic country where they sold them by weight and one should've known them to be craftier despite their overcompensation of weight on top of speed that would wrench away all that rotten meat that fell out of their legs, the many of them forming a tail of dreadful pieces, all counting upon one another's elated-forth, then thrown past the kingdom's come deprave surroundings that were neared in countenance of expansion by the other, more ennobled peoples whom had drawn themselves out of their various hiding spots, they spent a lot of time in, wondering, for long, though decided, upon their barbarous' s's' war-generals' ss – sss, sssssss, sss 's deciding factor-of conquest drivels-scrawl randomly on a map by chucking darts at it with tipped crayons- plan of engagement which had been an expeditionary yet hardly felt by the Heralds of Pain, of whose rotten and fallen apart, armors made out of cast-like made out of iron-caged bar-like exoskeletons they wore, chest, shoulder pads, arms, knee joints, legs, cuirasses of graved boots, whom were all carefully designed like some form of nesting of puzzle-like pieces that had been welded together on some frame, hooked to the body by smallish tube-like filaments placed or from their side, holding onto multiple crisscrossed pieces, across the body, held by leathery belts, spanning, across their bodies like rings, from one end to another, like overly extended sprinklers raised to the level of holding onto multiple sided metal lunged around bars they held with their strange almost organic pincers that had been put to their employ, giving one the impression that they were in actuality, beneath that leathery belt inside of which they buried themselves in, some worm-like creatures bearing multiple heads that all held the grapplers that not only kept everything still but prevented the armor from completely falling apart, although the creatures behind these naked-skeleton frames were ghoulish and ugly themselves, by all means, this sudden jolt of coming all the way through in search of a hiding place they might retreat to after having their enclave broken by the united armies that had been formed against them by means of an impediment's no-longer worthless mean of bastardly influence, misgiving yet forgetful as they were, during an errand of scouts that by the moon's fall into the bland ultramarine ring of darkness, worming with spiked shadows sprouting out with many faces, these creatures being the wedding wedges of the lady of whose fortune lay in such disease, distressful after her death, and at death's wont, yearned-for feet, were they led inside the Hospice as well as onto the wretched pit inside of which I was forced to lain for countless hours in order to wait for a piety's blessing to finally come as they exchanged one of their cognition hearts for their stay, in return that I may kindly meet their demands and never utter a word of this unfathomable thing that had in turn robbed me of my age, since, seething as I am by pain unmet by lust, in wickedly blessed and darkly-unmet delight, I am awaited by wager, wretchedly of pain, and cast, that eventually I may yearn for agony's cast disease, in order to be put down but the beast I have become shall pointedly stop existing once the wretched agony of my existence shall be trifled with by means of never-to-have gone away, when nastily the wretched spear that shall be produced by the evils of my and their days shall finally come to an end, and then, only then, when the heart I had been given onto holding, finally wretched into the palace of skin that's my rotten chest, the gelatin, the compact fridge and the tomb of reckoning that had kept a hold of all my memories, reminders of my many unfathomably never-ending sins, only then shall I feel such endearing blurring, yet cheerful misfortune as to be met by long-awaited death, although only calmly as it would be abhorrent, for I know, the least of all, that my heart had been blessed, whereas my head beaten on a ledged crest shall know no little as there is but ill, misfortune's cast away but sunken deep within the likes of a never ending, yet felt upon, treacherous recall of things that were done during my youth that I have thought to be forgiven yet uncondemned, I yearn for blasphemy undone.

‘A corpse shall sing from thereon out, whence the rancid dance of rain’s acid flooring stung, upon and ever-nearing the land’s gone trough of mightily repaired brained nonce, eunuchs dancing with him upon the abode of reigned and ringed bones!’

Upon the crier's head a stone fell and crowed a single bloody bone that pouched and gutted and plentifully rotten, as the many beasts and the dark littered by coals of fire cysts, carpets and carpentine and serpentine-benign. A wretched-foul, beast had grabbed and brought, a few iliac-crested whips, but only some that had been used on saints, hardly rocked at all.

‘Abhorrently forbidden, beast, you must leave at once before they call upon your mighty felt upon darkened tryst!’

‘It would be ethnical and most subservient of dark rods, if we were brought upon the sight of evil-brought upon the remains of the day, whenever called.’

‘Yet your will wanes away with each day, and you know it to be true!’

SO many shiny lights, all taken back by him, during the time people approached and called back onto it! Alas, be gone! It started again.

Four fifteen; it moves. Slowly but on a toppled level off the street-wiped clean off floor, it moved through unobtrusive means of complete shatter, which was hardly unfelt yet cleanly ignored by most of the patients who were incapable of expressing any feeling of distress at what was going on there, during the non-stop hike-hour they were forced to be a part of.

‘Insolence shall not be admitted into the Hospice and whoever shall be found clearly incompliant with the code of conduct we have instilled upon you shall be executed on sight!’

Two by two on either side, a trunk-compact machine with raised shoulder-like pillars on both ends, holding an elongated almost humanoid but bovine skull with small puckery eyes and with its ‘insides’, fleshy tendons entered a top-hole through the trunk; which was used for mobile traction, whenever not seen around, puffing and spreading small ganglions around.

‘Shut your filthy mouth immediately before I slag your knocker off the chains!’

‘You’ve been hunting rats again, haven’t you?’

‘And what if I did? What if I did indeed? I swear you rat-keepers paint yourself saints and martyrs, yet not a single finger was lifted to my nose and spiel! I feel the need to reel!’ Back and forth he cradles when closely watched; a defense mechanism that others were and are not aware of until now.

‘I am eating alone in my room, do not disturb me.’

Fifteen minutes more passed and the otter was dead, cleansed in a blood-circle. A red crimson dot in a room of blue, where a few attendees gathered:

‘I think it’s safe to safe!’

‘We need to crack it if it’s a question of proximity, otherwise we can just assume the culprit left the area immediately after the deed, vowing never to return unless asked for by one of the great dark forces that succumb to the platform beneath us.’

‘Is it possible it might fall?’

‘Not that I’m aware of.’

Though it squirmed and fell and fenced around, with every chance it got, to leap like Spanish flies that swerved and merged with conical-darkly shapes. It was uneven, darkly tested. A castle that appeared in the distance, seen through one of the lights that fell through the window signaled through its many bricks the passing of the valley, onto the heap that moved and swirled around, in flight encumbered through the dark end's meat and flight through flays and various unnaturally dark, and seething unnatural little people that took shots; flights followed soon after since they could not understand how they managed to ruin everything that seeped into their blood. A cut was made on one of the insane, they flew in flight and ruined every moment's countenance withheld, without being aware what was going on, through many pillars that fell off the ground, shattered vases and the wind's flight. Many of the candles started shooting fire out of them like Champaign bottles- blowtorch Molotov cocktails that started cradling in and out, back and forth, being shaken as nymph-ish women chased one another during the lest withheld, dampness.

'A crook nicked, at third o'er Bovine sayath!?'

'I think you've swallowed one' a hole. There's poison in each and every one of them that I may not be able to remove unless suckling could somehow distill what's been taken away from me when I was still a man of hope.'

'What happened to you in that case?'

'I don't know nor can I truly tell you what's been going on in my mind when it happened, when I was visited by the dark embrace of that rapier that had curbed some liter off a few pints, during the day I could only think there was a slither and a tatter of something that might come after. That there were people who knew me when I knew me not; abandoned by my relatives, whom were dead and deaf even before I had gotten a chance to do as such. To them I can only give as much as I could think no less of what had happened during the time there was a slither of an hour, such to impress upon me what I could only refer to as the hour of disease. Though it's no less important than the heart I stole along the way, since there was only a slither of membrane I cut.'

'What for and what have you done? I can't bother myself to keep track of all the open-book entries, unless one could only hope to hide them away from me and when that happens, I don't think and I can't think clear. Since we're both diseased, are we not? '

'That's what the physicians told us, but I couldn't think of any reason why we could not disrupt or be informed with the slither of thoughts that kempt their trails of blob-like hairs and the ones that open-ended such remained with us during the passing of the eight cycles, through day-nigh-day and five consecutive nights we had to spare no man-like manner or matter through which the mass and the gas that enraged our senses into being completely destroyed by means of trying ourselves, I think I could not understand what or whom.'

'Who is to say what happened to us?'

A vitamin could solve no cure, especially since they were infected. Ugly bodied, both of them, struck in a room they had been flung into by a strong wind that had come out of the very roof's hole they had been staring into, that black abyss, niggardish, falling apart, dormant still yet inserted through the many needles, the single bed that appeared to be broken in the new room. A deprave thing of moisture, filled with empty barren moist-planks that started drooling, coming apart. Trenching its way, and slither of come onto the dark remains; a single man appeared to knock.

‘May I come in? ‘

‘Leave, devil, leave immediately before he wakes up!’

A single figure with a skull for a head, red and empty eyed, and with a single spiel of wonder; and wonderment abhorred every moment that passed forth; it oozed with darkness and threatened to come awake. A tall figure, armored as well. A tall figure speaking in tongues, for even during its foreboding sleep it was a trifle more that mattered, that would allow it to come back to life. But the armor itself was only the chest, armless, legless but with a coil coming from beneath him, holding a giant blob; a tumor-thing shaped like a giant insect’s abdomen that cradled between trying itself out, and coming out of some cone of the lower side, a hive-like depression that had been dug through the bed, dug through the hole, a few feet beneath him, where they worshipped what came out of it, the children, the blobs and the ones that were unearthed had come to possess everything in sight.

A triangular platform appeared to keep a hold of a rectangular one with the help of a few bolts that held ropes attached to all four of its ends, being more like a glider for the latter.

Not that it would border one to be approached and apprehended before even speaking ill of what he’s seen during the haze that’s been forcefully shun upon his being, yet some similarity to the herd that was present there, during their cone- shared a little insufficiency of chemicals, of liquids and of sorts, some kind of indubitably scrumptious to be barred between their teeth as alarmingly un-aware as one would have it from the point of and to the hedge that neared the illimitable click of a clock, a most blasphemous thing that was presented to them, merely ticking away whatever chance at having a most horrendous sleep that could be rather yet betokened to no plainness, one at a time. They snuck in.

‘I’ve got a light; here, grab a smoke while you can, brother! It’ll do you good!’

‘It most definitely won’t. I don’t think there’s ever going to be a chance for me to pick one ever again.’

‘Your arm, let me see your arm, now!’

It’s been way too cruel, to administer another to shot to him, especially this far gone, since the disease kept eating pieces of their appendages as well; it left little to be called as for the insolence of having brought him along being pestily recorded by one of the Hospice’s operator cables, which had done as much as it could to burden the little fellow by a sudden microscopic raise of hemoglobin-butane; now turned into some gaseous thing that turned his skin-slowly, by normal leverage, upside-down and inside-out with every turn of his finger and every flip being but a simple prick of the thought to him, as much as it was to them, bothersome by all accounts; yet not a single one of them said a thing about the alternative, of putting him down before he could infest them, or worse, have the disease eat them completely as well. It stood alongside them. In a bubbling spherical but low-hanging bag, inside of which parts of them still appeared to eclipse most if not close to just about everything they could point towards. An imbecile had a better chance to strike it down than they had, since their incapability of getting off all four and walking was turned into a vitriol, a violent strive not to draw too much attention towards them, which would end, more or less against their favor. Regardless of the unspoken-on the sight rules that only drawled some of the excusable behaviors that more or less seeped inside the cordial yet jovial attendees. A jovial box produces some noises every now and then, largely ignored by them since they have no way of knowing just what that meant for them on the long run, since they would spend the next few days in a pseudo-room acreage of looked-at by several shifting back and forth, then back in place – doors, many of whom would thicken out and come inside, revealing their wagon-like fat as well as stretches of a few meters going in through unseen tunnels. Regardless of who pulled the strings, if there was one behind any or either one, there was a clear disjointitude that remained unrelated. Many fox-tails and other rabid parts being delivered onto them by normal post-work; a strangeness to it, but largely unquestionable:

‘We’re eating tonight, Boarthram; you hear? I think there’s something still in the back you can chew on, some bones, some good bones, I think they’ve skinned the last residents before we came in!’

‘Aren’t you afraid they’ll come for us during our stay?’

‘It’s a chance, as long as you keep making that incessant noise anyway. I wouldn’t reapprove anyway.’

An intent to do something, filthy hours passing by the clock, and a few cracks here and there only removed some of the grime off; not that one, but the next one, they came whenever they felt like it, and almost left with a puddle and a paddle splash, the noise that crashed and left a rung-in noise that followed soon, alas.

‘The masters are asleep, yet the condolences are yet to have arrived and arisen in place. Not that I would feel there’s such a need to awaken them, but within the hour, they’ll be fully submerged in their beds; stuck in a hibernatory phosphorous state out of which they might not awaken. Such is the chance that might come if we leave them be.

I’m sorry to reaffirm this but there’s never been a change in their condition since they started taking the shots we were sent from the Inferno.’

‘But they told us it would work, somehow, our suppliers have been keeping us going for months, with their words given on back of their back burners!’

‘Yet we’re here, are we not? At a point where we had to completely encrust them in life-preservers in order to avoid them being completely destroyed, after all, if they fall so do we.’

‘Then why the rush to wake them up if their lives are at a hinge to fall?’

‘It was merely meant to serve as a suggestion, nothing more than that. If I offended, I could have myself be thrown inside one of the dark machines as well, then have no while awakened for what’s to come.’

‘I think we can do just fine as well as we take care of the people we have in store today.’

‘We could do without a few of them, if only I were allowed to play!’

‘No, Donaughway, I’m afraid that would be too, dangerous. Too dangerous, I feel like many of them can still be saved if we were to try something more unorthodox; some, prick and a prattle, something that could come after and leave just as quickly as we allowed it to spread.’

‘You couldn’t mean poisoning them on purpose, would you?’

‘I’m afraid there’s not much choice; there’s a fleeting sewage tube outside, as thick as a giant worm, with large thick piston sticks that have glowing globular oblongs that pollute everything they touch at their ends. They move like snakes leaving their skin behind, as if our air is water for them, and they have no other option but to sink deeper in this space of abrasion, of rubbing. We could have the top of the Hospice blown off by one of them if we do not start poisoning some of the other staff members as well as the patients!’

‘If there’s no other option, then, I suppose poison would do, poison would suffice for the time being!’

Both of them drank to it, and didn’t look back, and they didn’t cradle their arms and they didn’t rub one out either and they didn’t try fancying another set of shots because they were on the job and whoever drank on the job had to take himself out, if that’s what it’d been in his cards. For what would be a few hours gone straight away as if their truncheon had been only a reliquary of the jests the interns were present for had only robbed them of a loss unlike no other in terms of the most profuse of refugary spots they could retreat back to, the back-hobble being implanted in such a way that they allowed entry only for a handful of ‘people’.

‘A faint, and a wonder that we’re still here, after the sun-down!’

A baby-like fetus’s half an elephant head- blob of two pieces, its ear and the head-trunk shape made its torso. A larval syringe-wriggly pole dropped from beneath it then curved into a fleshy L. It leaped then stopped. It called upon a fleshy bulbic lymph node with a tiny little humanoid tiny figure in the middle of it, that followed it around; right as soon as it extended a desk-like rectangular pocket, out of which it dropped a dropping bag, that was still attached to it, which recoiled in the air, clearly filled with its internals, protected by a membrane that could not be defiled. A few peculiar almost wind-blown tent-like huts made out of piles of growths made their home, although exiles weren’t supposed to last; his people abandoned him for the crimes he had committed, which could not be forgiven, for, they had thrust and cast away, and defiled whatever perdition might hope of yeast to have prevailed!

‘Where did they go?’

‘On top that house upon the greatest hill made out of the bodies of the dead beasts buried by the sand-wrought, and carried along through the epicanthic fold that molded itself with their bodies wrought, in the darkest of coves that had ever been created from that point on and ever-after brought up cold with the incinerator-maker of corpse-food they feed the broken angelic figures colored green with muck, their wings blasphemous and grown like snail-shells with elongated syringe fat-appendages become slugs with pointy downward talons with faces at their ends that bear large puncturing devices that spread disease for gravy, as for the munchers, they’re leftovers after all, from the Humanoid Navy!’

A great tooth appeared on the mound. It must’ve belonged to one of the colossal greater-lesser winged ones, as for their horns, they had been taken down and carried in secret places since that’s where their wombs were stored after all. A new generation awaited their time, as much saved as needed, in order to carry out the order of the malign, their blasphemy within reason, as to carry on their genetic material to some place where it’d be safe. Perforations of the DNA allowed for bottled humanoids of the Red Bottle kind of clot to appear and worship that horn. Knowing, simply knowing was enough. They listened with their red-clotted, crimson-bottled ears near the cartilage that was bone-shrapnel! Inside of it, ancient similar to itself organic material appeared to produce a near-similar to its state of mental cognition stored inbred material of promulgated growth that allowed as much of the near-liked quasi-alive state of immaterialessness to occur while the little larvae-like globule bacteria started attaching itself to some of the larger fetus-like blocks of stonish-hardened teathed by chitinous plates growths of similar sized likens; that allowed them to endure during this overly hardened gestation period that threatened to possibly destroy their entire quantum-absorption of the much needed power they had to consume in order to promote their overly cumbersome growth, which was in dire need of occurring at the same ration it promulgated the need of. Weird bulbic things, they were; like puffy starved prunes, or some squishy-meaty seeds that looked as if they had been infested by worms, rotted; lending on the impression of them making wild expressions as if they were faced by humanoid men. Ugly even; but even uglier in terms of how they charged one another, striking, bouncing and adhering to one another's most primal larval state.

Norway:

Advancing forward onto the cold morass; a drunk; with a face pallid-strung!

'Stranger, is there no more fault your kind could endear bringing still upon our plains?'

A peculiar robe-skinned appeared to house a body of all bones piled together, underneath a skin-cloak he wore of skin. But in the middle of this wretch of corpses lay a hardened lump of ruddy red; piled with similar crystalline roots and a lower almost infantile thing, a fetus encased in some bathed-in ruddy blue-jelly, darkly encased. Three blind-yolk eyes and a mouth that pushed out and connected with its tail, armless as it was; ancient of no regard, but the rods, the three of them that were held by the roots were the things holding the ancient bones together as well as the skin.

'I, the ancient murderer have returned! I ask to be remembered as the master of this house, steward!'

'Yet I require proof for such a claim, I've yet to see some shown to me, therefore remain where I stand!'

'Impoverished enough to release such ponder? How is it then that it shall begotten? May you spend the night in if such's the case?'

If that were the case, damned he be!

Immediately upon the sight of none else but the cowering mountainous pointy had of a house he had once postulated the likes of calling a homeless abode, the drunkenly stumbling upon his knees Hoyd simply brushed past the man, being immediately followed by four of five other men of similar ilk that had been hidden until that point, where, upon being met by the sight of a giant stone-tick of mass and growths, with a head-like cartilage almost pea-termite head bulb on top of it, which was chained to the fire place; he simply leaped on top of it, immediately gluing himself to the vile creature while being in wait of the others' say. Out of the men that were present in that room, a single spear-one eyed faced beam erupted out of the body of, floating eerily in place, in a levitating kind of manner before flinging itself around the room, while readying itself to encircle the house several times before, out of its one eyes, a single puff postulated naught but the despondency of a second, shot straight out, second floating eye that began receding back and forth like some vertical pendulum before going straight ahead to perform some wild maneuvers that allowed for a single note to be produced as if from the bowels of the universe itself, sprouting into existence with a sinister appeal; barrowing in the countenance of the men present there, whom were largely of a mind to ask:

‘What is this thing supposed to be now?’

‘A subpoena, of course, for trespassing in this house uninvited without pay?’

Another man rejoined!’

‘It is not, it’s not, it’s not!’

‘It is, trust me, for I’ve dealt with such similar colloquial matters before, and I have seen firsthand what such lawful notes look like!’

‘And I’m telling you sir that you are not only wrong, but you’re incumbent on thinking yourself all mighty as to believe something such as this would have any effect whatsoever on a precipitately tainted by train; trained eye, who, upon being met by such a note and upon such parting words as I would facilitate your beckoning as to sit and ponder at the affront of having attempted to distort our meager understanding on the matter, such as such you would invite yourself out as to avoid any further hurt that might be inflicted to our personages by your petty meek lies; would immediately recognize it as being nothing short of a fake!’

‘There’s no mistake here, I think there’s a few blue oyster-flowers I ought to buy.’

‘Thank yee.’

Of course it was but a little while taken by the chilled forth quail and tile.

‘I’ll smash your fucking head split open!’

The savage returned again from one of his long trips to the destroyed garden.

‘I’ve felt it before and I will feel it again, just as my arms get stretched!’

Of flashes turpentine

And most soluble of liquids, in the chemical plant, upon the draw of the lot, and draft of soldiers in the making, rook of knowing of intentions standing as a witnessing lord by their side, as they were called, as to attend the morbid sermon as it happened, bastardly as it were, hour of days, in which the tubes were longed for and attached, to their general’s calling’s, during a time when they were not, the least, matched, for callings and outer wailings, stopped upon the end of echoes, cavernoids plain, all beset by such assaults, as there were coming, during madly, yet inclined a quay; out of the bowels of the earth, the wasps, carrying their master's cast of brine, and most sublime was the song of their swarm as it but came after, no more, until they felt the tune, lightning that could, for some, and boon, upon which a soldier lonesome, might he walk but sway, no other man present, in this swallowed by most atrophy, a quail, to say, what, thoroughly had happened to him since. And madly may he call upon the day, a prince, bestowed onto others by men, whom, would but have himself but starved and then, there would be little trouble. And more-so, ever was it, there to happen, meet his maker, in the dark; when, upon the power-out, would pane but shoot, and rifles flinging, Gattling-true. To their master's call, they stop. When the lights come back, brought, onto justice, all of them, have they realized what happened. As they were taken by the heels and taken after, strung and eaten, long-defeated and deranged.

One of them drew forth, faceless but that only happened to him, somewhere, long before along the way, as he carried on top his back, in a lavish basket, a strange artifact, of such an age. Homage to the champions who fought and lost, during, such embrace as they would've had themselves brought onto, stand aghast. A body to be certain, a cadaver not to be longed for, rotten with diseased, and spoiled as fruit and yet, pieced back together at a most simple command. He of all would've had himself be brought back, when the time was right, only to squirm and yet again betray, to have him swung along a single tray, of metal and of fleshy steel, and madly was there brought, a strange appeal. If no such thing was there to happen, he opened but eleven dark stallion-bloated nests that came out of its gut after. He flew across the room and gave birth onto them, this day. When one might've but had it said:

'I've come and brought the race, returned. Upon the plain of which I seek, but mourn, for such lost brothers as I have had long, since then, in past. For them, as I would've had it, alone, I end up cast. Way out of heaven and to the embrace of kin, I listen, to beasts that seek destruction ridden, to lesser one that come but follow, to the ones that come, forever after, that alone I've come to ail. My bitter kin' tender, as it is but frail, I bear only in lost, ago, but long, memory.'

'And whom might listen to you, of such dark rancor and strangely as there is, appease, what one might come, forth, ask, of sunder as the ground and gourds, for what you have cast away and forth, I ask of you to long-since meet, and see of better days, of sink.'

Of mighty ship had he but spoiled such hour, the solider did know only after, and would he had but found such day, and would he have but failed, a day, as it, never to have come. And blasted would it had been, and gone. But lo', the creature, such was filled, and long before, lost, indirect appeal was such regained. Through battle after, and through pain, until the day after was but sailed.

Dina

'Of beauty that there is, you've lived.'

'Who are you?'

Dina turned, and watched and winced. A moistened by the flashes of the snow, soon after followed after. A crack in stone, her husband still missing, yet she thought.

‘Who and where have you gone?’

Forth she followed as the snow-blearing beat of drums dropped until a pint of flakes, and made cold engulfed and lesser yet, was there a drift of ice, when in their hearts, the ones that followed her at last, was there naught to follow after in her steps.

‘I thought I heard you long before.’

An attempt to garter a reaction, for whichever reason followed after. But it would not talk back; and therefore snapped as if it were in place. A road had been driven in and least of all would one, had seemed, to be in tune and listen. For whichever reason; it left behind. A trail of flowers in the sky, and red gleams blearing upon stole, much elated, was, therefore, the stars of north, and brine alighted. For what followed after was, something she much delighted asking but herself.

‘How has he done that?’

But there was still none to answer her.

An abandoned train lay on top a pitcher of snow.

A pale rider- snowman by it; with a flame sprouting out; a man left something behind, a lantern, of sticks put together in the mourning.’

There was a bleary misunderstanding that was unspoken of, nor was it approached by any well-to-do mean. It was senseless how the snow started drifting in one direction, then simply stopped when the time arose. Various chemicals infesting the snow, mesmerizingly so; a drift apart of wooden-stranglers in the wooden-look-through lenses, perilous disaster of wreathed upon craven-lard of fishes snow drifted in the cold morose-and lost but born out of a minus-exemplary, unfathomable fall and drift and snowy-fist that came up-first, a cyst of stalactites of cold, and worn-out bolden throbbing boats whose wreckages served as delightful as one could come of mind, would to make a difference of blighted by the light of winter’s after, such was the release, the torpedo that but olden, as it were, bird being strung beaded-akin to every single thing that followed after on a whim.

Somehwere, in a distant shed.

‘I woke up in the middle of the night with a numb side of the face, leg and arm; I may’ve suffered a stroke that seems to have put an end to my reign of terror. Once again, I stand defeated, beaten and am afraid of what will happen to me from this point on, or simply how severe the damage I’ve sustained, mentally speaking, irreversibly assessed, being very much immeasurable. The permanency of which is very much frightening, and to think it all because of them, and their inferior genes, and the inferior blood I inherited from them, serving as the main cause of my plight is something I will never be capable of moving on from.’

More of it was still to come, off the goblet they’ve got it run.

‘You should’ve trusted your gut before.’

It made little sense as it did.

It hid a spruce for every tree inside of it, always swindled by an old tumorous towering man, hid inside his stove of a body, hid inside his giant head that was placed inside an ambulance shaped sewage system with eighteen long tunnels that looked something close to a jelly case made out of flooding an ant’s colony, pulled out afterwards only to be placed back in place on top a weirdly socket’s throated body, whose strange defiance ever showed.

A few robust knives held rocks, inside depigmented bubbly people whose backs were open and in them shone lights. They had no heads and no arms either but stranger coiling things that appeared to cradle-spin something from one point to the other, around, then stopped to chew on their bodies, came a pair of insects that carried them behind a tree:

‘Leprous thing there’s a clock, filled with many growths, where their likes had swallowed me.’

But it was different, dark abode, there was something strange, the sky was reddened black, a tumorous crack, split in half, then ever-pushing:

‘Lo, there’s but a light calling on the day, it’s been swollen-eaten and they’ve cast the dead through, and up and go, allure, was theirs, and gone around the curved, would they.’

Oozing in the most protrudingly there came only a single most disturbingly hard to look, and entered through there came another pair of corpses laddered, asked for by a most disturbing lot, waiting for them, brought to kneeling positions in cradled upon craters filled with snots.

‘Gelbas-Harness, you’ve stumbled upon a fortune of needles racked together and put in copious amount of oozing pools, hardened by the looks of it, I would expect no less from you, yet to ask.’

‘Whereas would they have gone otherwise?’

And there was a gull bearing two pistols, and bombs.’

In the distant dark:

A flat end of the box:

‘Part of it tss’ open.’

No one around the room to yell about the on-going rape; there was only a side of the rape that was visible, inside, from inside outside, the box, not from the outside inside, where the rape was happening, out in the open. The rape was one sided, only one person was raped, a woman, a moist female, of some unknown ethnic origin. Drenched in puddles of butchered from one side of the ceiling to the other, in the good old days of doing it, she was marked. Even more so, bothersome as her breathe had been, he couldn't help but ask the being behind the scene:

'Why are you doing it inside the box when, there's so many fancy places of bathed green you could do it in, instead.'

'I get no satisfaction otherwise, not likely that you'd understand, as I've tried explaining it to your friend before.'

The box was wet as well. And had a cardboard tunnel truck connected to it, drawing ahead, all the way to the back. A black chocolate factory of iron-blocks melted in candy-corn, somewhere in his thoughts. He was lonely and thirsty and there was only chocolate pudding with a sweet-sprinkled on top of it, little flakes of sugar-cones vanilla flavored pikes his mouth could chew on the viscera of, only for a sweet taste of what trailed around his mouth, that being a little swollen parasite the size of his ankle, bud. The growth of lepers, all of whom begged to be put down. They were eighteen body-bag figures that trailed out of his ankle upon a small dragged by him as his, he was, leg, tagging, being an ogre's hand, heavy, with curled, 'round the bags' s' little bag-sack dragging-fat, on which his grip was anchored against, them, being dragged by him.

It was going on four hours at most, at best, segmented into sessions filled with breaks in-between made of making sure she was all right, as to not be broken too easily, only to extend the rape as far as he possibly could, even though there was no saying just what he could do, if he sniffed the wrong way, proddingly with a fistful knife.

The Broken Bloody Boney Massacre came after rape. In her:

'Ye of all ought to know that from the depths of what's been trenched before the glowing tubes that's made her throngs, no longer will there any life be made, grievous in turn as well.'

A Tumorous being that was planted in her even before the rape occurred, prior to her birth as well, while in the womb, named Helsagg, that served as a diviner for her obvious but oblivious to her, breast condition, being the reason why it was shoved in, in the first place, was now part of her upper-chest marbled, though inwardly inside, checker's board textured but covered by humanoid statuesque figures whose head-automatons were springing out, in the most unnecessarily disgustingly disturbingly hard to stare at manner, filled as they were with pseudo organically yet mechanical mouthed-wombs, out of which, tenderly tenebrous lobes filled with acre-spread horned trails of worming-moles, plastered upon her viscera connected with the tiny 'ish figure of herself that was connected with hose-tubes to the floating gloating with disease, spreading levitating organs, that were under her command, her being a baboon that began chimping around during the distress, destroying her organs out of stress, as her cavity would only heave back in and out, as many as sixteen hundred heart-beats with her smaller torso, the one in her heart-pumping acid in her glands, burning sordidly her eye-lids, liquefying her eyes-liquor-shared into pools trailing along like Mascara on a heat-driven summer of September Paradise, when the hour of midnight stroke one of the marked bones as for a strike, pounded by the hour, the tongue having slit off the side of her cartilage into a viscous pool of whitish cerebral fluid of spine, both watches being there, flying clingly as gauged each other's sides out, while launching each other in whatever direction they could reach or aim towards, most solemnly as must:

'There's no end to this, my dear maiden, shall you concede the hour?'

'I shall wake up from this Nightmarish thing one day, and dare I say, not be raped no longer.'

'SO you shall.'

'I shall be, so.'

Thus was ended her life.

Hux A-jar

A rounded curvature could barely be seen around the lid, dried by a few sea fowlers' moons that had been present since the crude Creoles came along. The most despicable of sights drew forth.

'We won't be able to move on from that spot any longer.'

'Then stay.'

'If I do, you know what's eventually going to happen, don't you?'

'I know.'

A cyst-beaked, between them, in middle; like a rocket's launching split in halves's, but with a bud instead.

'I think we both know that's only a matter of time until one of us tires. We can't sustain the balance, let alone lend it the needed weight, can we?'

'Then leave, there's the door behind you, open. You've seen it before, even before I pointed it to you. You've seen it but you've not left yet. Why?'

You could've saved yourself a long time ago, but you're still here.'

'As I soon as I step out, it's closed. There's no way to stop it, even if I were to lodge my entire arm and side of my body, it'd be over in a clean-cut. Even if I were to let you got first, it's too long of a run for you to make it in time before it closes over.'

It feels as if, regardless of how I look at it, this' been made to have you trapped at the other end, with me escaping, with me leaving you behind, with me thinking it over. Or tiring myself up until there's nothing left to say or do.'

An arm's stretch, like in a boxer's ring, only but a problem reaching over; he could've slugged him at any point. Either man could've, but they kept their distance, at all times. Sweat had ran through what might've been taken for a long run, a marathon of some kind, or training for the Olympics, but the scent was missing, as was another day of standing. Their eyes were bleak with spirals of pudgy white, it's been another day or so of simple talk, where nothing was, so far, established. Half a shake of hand, the sly bastard almost tried it. A piece of the bud below them, had already shown signs of eruption, detrimental to both of their lives, it seemed as if the choice whether or not he would survive would be taken for him.

'In less than a week, I'd say, it's going to be done, finite, finished, completely, as either of our lives, I'd say. There's just no walk-around it, you know? There's no second chance after wars, as soon as that thing erupts.

We're standing on shaky grounds and the only thing that's keeping us from falling down is less than an inch away from melting.'

It was insane, how neither of them acknowledged it. Come to think of it, there was no reason to waste any more breathe on an.

'I can still see the roots, from what I recall.

I've been down there before, with a hedge seasoner. I've studied the structure in great detail during my stay.

'It's been so long and I'm tired, I should take a break from the path I was set on. I've been walking on this path of consternation, inside an incisor bloated hive-like cocoon filled with my furious appeasement of how things have been going so far, in the world, in a giant ink bottle whose shattered giant trunk filled with growths but made out of one piece body of intruding thoughts regarding the people I've met, whose dreams I've been let known of, as their apparent bottle-giant flea-shaped shrimp-shaped tubularly contorted come-out of the hive-like mind the people have come to lose during their impatient advent through the streets of spikes in which they have adorned their reproachful up-horn thrust of incendiary feebleness expressed in their non-desires of having chosen, or to choose, for them, but they didn't, a path in life, to follow after, now lain into coffins wide spread but like bolts and conical, being 'buried' upright instead of in the fetal position or a comfortable spot, of peace, of mind, horned but by narwhals but by drinking, horns, through which their cries could not be heard no less than the echoes of razor-molted into two elongated carpets by its side with wings, of glorious contrivances, expressed as part of their non-elegant nature, as they are shocked by worlds of viruses, realities, escapes, from their dilemmas that are drawn not by them, but by others, a pogo-stick of trails of tears of fears, expressed as angst as they're caught in a never ending-loop of jumping along, niggers, fucking kikes, during their fight against a system that's been struggling, over-pressured by modernity and other insoluble materials of vivacity, they, are forced to live through. And therefore, they must be skinned alive. Humanoids are not to be trusted.'

A sign laid outside, no humanoids allowed. No humanoids on sight, no humanoids to walk unattended by someone who owns a weapon that might thrust his guts out in a different dimension if that may need be, necessary.'

'What are you thinking of?'

‘Nothing, I’m not thinking of anything in particular, only some of the falls, there’s leaves all around where they shouldn’t. Painted, childless widow’s nails, with blue unnatural petals sinking in their house-bound’s prisoner in chains, their sexless marriage coming to an abrupt end, finally made decided to commit decide, the reign of her brothel’s plough-breeder never having worked, that he finally came to the only possible conclusion, that being, taking his life in front of a bed-driven drivelspry ankle sprained by timeless anchors pulled back up to sails of whitened bells when death part due’s promise-promised to prevail, against their proper judgment, as to keep it together but not with child, the sadness arose, when driven into the wild, she ate up a hiker, dressing in his clothes, when, beneath and out of her, a high-way road stretch of a hundred fifty seven miles a bile release that had replaced her legs but was inflated, as an oblong-blimp, with fat released as well, ten miles away from the position in which her body appeared to have taken precedent, grew a giant insectoid appendage, with two segments and a giant body bag-filled with fluid mold coming out of her, inside of which hundreds of look-a-like bodies appeared to be nesting themselves in.’

‘All of this because she didn’t get a divorce?’

‘And much, much, far worse than that, my dear companion, far, far worse.’

Profusions of the most deprecated manner intruded upon their minds, when and during, such likes were taken away from them, a delightful stare of red-orange lily’s encasted shade gusted as through pane of thunder’s light abode projected through a chrysanthemum-prism, of bold, of liter, of lightlessness departure sung, when realized that there were none to be found, upon this blissful desolation twas anchored to a land as front were warded but the soldier’s run had cast them out of a heaven driven through the ground. A boil-encased ship that carried them away, until they joined the rest of these lands, twas’ warted by the growths that lay; before them a single man:

‘I’ve met not one but two, but two, two of the same coin, brought onto you, but neither one acknowledges what I’ve done to reach the world that’s heavy. And him, of agonies, rung as shady.’

Oft was cast when better naught; its dark protrusions now come to light; an insolent delight only drilling through absinthe the gamble of the cycled moons he’s spent alluring yet to strays he seemed uncannily forlorn along the way, when talk would turn, and nastily his born-for sired, disastrous as he’d be recognized, bastards of petite-disguise, all whom masked themselves to be alike, to their master’s reproachful delight when he realized:

‘You’re my sons, but how come, so many?’

Distant

‘I’ve been infested plenty of times before, on various barely worth mentioning occasions, by several shady dealers or people whom I suspected prone to what they drive out of your body with, that kind of stuff, being riddled with, as I stand before you being in it, wearing it, having bathed in it several times, dangerous stuff, they don’t show you on TV or rub it in your face too often since they’re afraid people might pick up on in for some reason or another. It’s made me feel, strange, being a carrier. Touching people inappropriately only to infest them, because I don't think, I didn't think I'd enjoy it. But I do, in some sick way. I am a violent man of rape after all, and I have plenty of needs I need to satiate.'

His partner in crime was standing by his side, he promised.

'I promise you that regardless of what you tell me, I will never abandon you regardless of my personal feelings I hold towards you. We shall keep this as a professional relationship, and you needn't worry about being disappointed in it.'

Since they bore the read-waxen people by their side, inside the truck; driven through the night before a sole-single, simple moon's lighted grayish shades, whom fluttered with every wing as they passed by way of derogation:

'We've killed a man.'

'You drove into him. His body still rolls. I can see it in the rear-view window. He was riding a bike but you killed him and he's dead.'

'Let us inspect the body then and see what it has to say for itself.'

Immediately said, they got out of the truck. A winter drew onward from the eastern border, where a black pudgy spherical pair of hard lumped objects that were soon identified as being large missile of plastic-junk-yard toy manufacturer variety of repurposed nickel-iron with horse-chew gum put on it, strapped to hanged men, whom were present, inside of them, hearts of elephant-dragons, all butchered with their iron deposits being ripped off out of their bodies and out of them, of little worthless wonder that was left.

Two friends

It was dark to see, from what I could remember. It drew from the side, a canopy maze of contorted green mush, spring was gone. A bodily deformity, a giant; made entirely of rusty-green screws, joined its friend, the gas-masked corpse, in wait. A ruddy shaking hand, like that of a man; it rustled but never touched.

The dead man said nothing, while the green-hurricane spread maligned gas. It moved like a child towards him, waiting. One of this day it will wake up; my friend will. He is not dead, but merely, pretending.

Rails of heaps:

Played upon each other's stranger heedless knives-sharpened needles, all trapped by hinges, dripping continuously on each tile- each block of iron-wood, upon which they stood, dark in appearance and filled with a disgusting inflammable fluid that sprouted about. But they were all locked inside a single house. Where there wasn't enough space for anything else. Yet they brought a subject in the middle of in, leaving him there all alone in hopes he'd starve. Even dressed him in a suit of armor, with many manes in the back, many faces that had been sutured off some people, that were placed like the most unnaturally dark, most stridently disgusting things, a necklace clad not to be used by anyone else. But they all spoke and pointed at a single thing forth.

‘The door, you need to reach the door, son, if you will yourself alive, if you want to somehow survive, you’ll need to put an unfathomable amount of effort that’s never been seen by anyone in this lifetime alone, do you understand?’

It’s not an easy thing, to be certain, but it’s definitely achievable. You’ll need to start a fire first, otherwise, you’ll lose your mind trying to snick in a popper!’

Place of worship:

Chimes aren’t supposed to look that way. It must be a result of the storm; the constant junk being thrown from one sand quay to another, after all the local machines being shaken over by force.

‘Open up the TV, I think I hear a few more hooligans making their way in!’

There were a few uglier, much uglier, too ugly to mention, unnaturally headed-from one side of the other, of their bodies, dark-creatures, all walking in creak-surroundings, with legs of metal, carrying towers, on top of which men were chained, by their legs to the highest domed roof that came out of the back of their heads as well as their backs, through which, one plate open. Every single time, every single one, but they were all too unnatural to count or would’ve been counted dead a long time ago. Their lot was done for. Growths of tubes-coming out of them, like some unnatural almost mosquito-beams, pulsating, emanating light, creating a most obscured delight of come-together lights.

It should make no other deliberate sense that the man in charge of them, was the same wretched master of the hound, whose collection of many screws were known to all, at least when the poisonous death-imbued clouds settled down. There was no possible reaction to what was going there, other than, allowing the few seconds to fade away. Some lights in the distance signaled another cargo making it safely. By the tall one:

‘Let him in, he’s one of us, he’s one of us, I’m telling you!’

They had.

A big one, a flier; fat human, almost a blood-sucker’s giant head, two tops, his head being a patch of wooliness sutured to the rest of its face, and crawled deeper, then deeper and deeper still inside. No lower jaw but what came out of the little body it had was the giant two segmented appendage it constantly jabbed away at the air with, around the wild-surroundings, creeping about as to get closer in order to take another shot at what he could. A satchel shaped body, compact with a single tiny tail converged in it, bearing the appearance of a pincer, but no more. Its head, this giant boat-motor, ice-box shaped fat-thing and its mouth-stinger obscured most of everything, wherever they could look towards, whenever as to drink, with leper-strength, it thrust forth.

Yet he was seen as one of them. Mainly they were, very much afraid of what he might do, if such unrest, of every day was brought. If anything uneven said, and stopped:

‘He’s ugly, disgusting look, why are we allowing him entry in the first place? Can’t you see that this is a bad idea? Too worse of an idea to make it work?’

Because it will start feeding on us, I know it will. The first chance it gets, it will come at our throats. And when it happens, don't let me tell you.'

'Enough of it!'

'No, I can't let him walk unimpeded. You know what they're like, the ones that fly. They grow all wrong in the head, they're made to abolish whatever else there is of their bodies until their heads overly inflate, just like their egos, fat, fat-balloons, disgustingly all-around. And worse of all, that thing that appeared out of its mouth, it's way too unnatural, even for someone like him. Such a change would be deemed unnatural to anyone else.'

'Yet we can freely breathe and we know as much, that, some change to our internal organs has as much altered us completely, to a point where I doubt we're much, if recognizable at all. You may not want to admit it either, but, it is what it is. We can't judge him, honestly, for what's been done to us. It could happen again, we could start flying out of nowhere, or worse.

What's happened inside of us could and might as well just show up, outside; as some wild mutation. And what will you when you wake up one day, turning about as you've realized you've sweat profusely throughout the night, incapable of fully falling asleep, only at the sound of, you know; the noise caused by everyone who they themselves would be incapable of dealing with what's happened to them. But even before you could lay Eve's eyes onto them, you'll see, first the mirror, brought in front of you, by the bed.

You thought it a nightmare, you thought it was somewhere else, some ugly, nasty, painting. I suppose. But no, it's you, my friend, it's you. There's no way to hide it either, because everyone else will find out eventually and that's the worst part.'

The mutations were uncontrollable; to a point where they affected everything, even the immaterial.

Ghostly tumors with weird elongated eyes appeared out of nowhere, inside giant rounded-egg cracked shells inside of which pools of strange people that had been killed, all shot in the back, with their hearts out pulsating, fifteen meters in the air, dripping on top of them, as 'short-circuit' shots would emerge yet again, cracking lightning rods' worth of power-strangling, as well as strongmen's share of weight-drop that would crush the very atoms around them until the point stopped, and they could not longer eat, and eat they had, spitting out even tinier fragments of hearts that polluted the air.

A man in the distance shouted:

'They're spitting red! You see that?'

'I see it, I see it mighty and fine, but don't count on me to clean it afterwards. It think that Hurk's doing its fair share of spreading it around by itself. Wait, I think I, yes.

Listen, go around the tool bar and bring me one of those things, you know which ones, the tube-fridges, the one that has some faces embed onto them. They should all be put inside one of those wooden Vietnamese bathtubs, the traditional ones, the ones filled with raped-women, the Gooky-eyed ones. You know what I'm talking about.'

'C-O-R-R-E-C-T, sir, I know that Johns. I know that very well. I think I'm going to, yes, here it is.'

He had it in sight. An ugly thing, compact but wheeled. Whoever had this fine idea of equipping all of these fridges with wheels was a god-damn genius. They worked like freshly baked fine burnt-bread and he liked it even better while knowing that these faces appeared to belong to soldiers he didn't even know existed prior to him having taken a bite out of them.

'Don't bite shallowly!'

One of them said. From the taste of it, he had been a career officer or something. With a magnet lodged inside his brain, that appeared to draw out itself, some unnaturally dark elements that oozed and glowed, with puffs of glow-blue around them, reigns and crowns and unnatural things that entered his vision now, all the tall dark skeletons of red, dancing and running around him, as if he's eaten a bunch of psychedelic mushrooms instead. It made him feel all bad inside, all the worse for the others that were incapable of fully understanding what was going on or why. Why would one succumb to this need to eat them?

'I've seen it before, the dark spirit cone, that's dreary, call of Nak, he's in the distance and he's yet be brought onto justice like everyone deserves to have him sought, then killed, with such a rapier thin that no sane man, bore upon a horse bearing mane, completely encompassed by it as if eaten by a pit of sand would have it.

And the others, do you see them, boy?'

'I think I can, but I don't want to do it anymore! Please, stop this, stop this now! I don't want to be forced to bask upon their darkened light, upon their ugliness that I may see no more!'

'They're armed, yes, and they don't like being looked at for too long a period of time, this could be dangerous. You sure he can actually, no.'

'It's what I thought, his intent could be interpreted as some intention wilt for war. A quay of death to sail no more but drown the kid inside some cat-filled with well.'

It wasn't that he knew no less, it wasn't even as dangerous to consider the fact that there were such things. Since all these ghoulish figures that appeared, empty eyed as if sullen, and swollen and forgotten with every moment that would grant them the desire to return as well. They were not breathing, if one were not to count the incandescence they displayed when no one was watching, nor wailed around, for empty pail.

'Be careful, the ones up-high, the tall ones, they could trample on top of you, they could kill you any moment if they were to step a toe too far.'

Another side of the fridge spoke.

Who was inside? It was an accomplishment that no torso-elongation-being whose head splintered in a few bits, all bearing one eye, but it was not humanoid, even though the superficial resemblance appeared to communicate of the little and the less.

'It's an abhorrent behavior and we can expect nothing less from someone such as yourself, a pitiful example that no man would even want or hope to serve under, since you've driven everyone out of the barracks before the first wave of gases came into the sight, and now?'

Within a second, before the Soldier Gah could finish, the pollution, the hurricane and the poison and the gas, di-di-di-di, were all gone, in a moment, in an instant, with at little left behind as the chaos that erupted next.

A days' worth of days passed. And they were woken up, as if from their graves, all aligned behind a line.

Everyone but it; a wall creature, extremely wide, ugly, almost fallen apart, a beast. A nigger's face stretched onto it, flat eyes, flat features', like a Gook's; extremely and beyond ugly, beyond comprehension, a beast with no intention to open its mouth, since it was very much impossible for it to be properly done.

It was titillating yet bothersome, being stared at by a wide-filthy sub-human nigger, a wall of a beast that could easily be crushed, or pushed over its back, from a position it could not lift itself back from, yet they didn't want to touch it. No one wanted to approach that insolently, disgustingly, subhumanly wretched thing that was something beyond even the most illimitable things that had ever encumbered this world, or any other, no sane man being as much as capable of standing before it without a will to strike, yet met by a countenance that purposefully defeated that which may have just have distraught any other man in turn, since this terrible thing moaned and groaned. Then revealed, its mouth opened, like a pyramid but flailed were those flat-lips as they peeled off it.

'This nigger has some big eyes, don't you think? Both of which move in every direction at once, even though we can't observe it; just like most niggers, it must've been drugged by its master, thenceforth made lay waste onto whatever it could fling itself against unflinchingly until the most terrible of things could happen to come and near its waste and beyond that. I cannot say much. Beasts like these ones appear every now and then with nothing else but a wreathing sekt for reason to spread destruction upon every plain of plan, even the poor grains of sand that now stand beneath it.

There's no saying on what it destroyed, this nigger-fiend, while we were asleep, or why it's decided to show up after the poison started dreading itself out of existence.

Yet, if there's one thing clear, if there's one thing as clear as daylight could be. That's certainly the fact that we must put this nigger-beast down before it throttles what's left of the moon, what's left of this fine land before it spreads here and there, in open-wide terrain and breeds, with dogs or other animals, until it forms thousands of filthy niggers that would block everything in turn, until no space could be allowed for any of us to move, either back or forth, or any other way there is.'

It leaped out of place, going at it against one of the most, heavier clouds that were hanging low on every possible side. A dead man erupted out of another. He was patched all around the body, bandaged as if he had just come out of a nurse's office, or some camp after being roughened up by a complete show of artillery's falling over, no more than what anyone would deserve to know.

Eyes, adding up to many beads and many ugly foot-tips that were formed upon the base of that flat thing, the moon behaved, yet it was a grave, behind, holding endless bodies that had been brought from the other side of the world, all forming chains and leashed and various other formations come out of the dark frontiers that had been brought out of the darkest corners, the two gods being responsible for it, as one, they thought, but one turned itself into the abyss puffing dark-ultramarine flashing thing it was, out of which billions of rotten, darkly forgotten, covered in red, thrust around and all whom had been dead were just as soon delivered. Yet out of whom, a bodily creation alive. A dark thing but yellowish and as if made out of a single stone it drew itself out of the main pile of corpses that were almost made to look as if they had been wished into existence, isolating itself only to cackle at the unrest. It should've made no difference, of how ugly, how deformed, how unnaturally strange it looked as if. Mourned for, then made to be thrown around, mounted in the ground's abode, fashioned like the rest of them, to come, and see, then deeper-still.

'You have not escaped just yet.'

It wasn't them, it couldn't be them, no, no, it could not be the wretches that had dug themselves in the lamentable minds of every corpse that had endured the travel, yet as seen benign, would they wrench themselves abhorrently, yet anchored closer.

'It's not you, it's not him either, but who?'

'A friend, a friend that shall guide you from this point on until you've made the journey into the pile, where you shall bury yourself and escape for some time now.'

'Why should I trust you then?'

'I'm afraid this might be your only choice to make something of it, if, it comes to it, that is. You must trust me with all of your life, to hinge yourself upon no stone's quiet and allow me to do something others would not allow.

Implant a piece of myself into you, great ruler-maligned. I shall see to it that you shall be finely rewarded if it comes to it, that is to say, for you to survive.'

'No distinction between them. There's none to be had, we've completely removed all means that would help one inquire of who they are, what they are or whether or not there's any identifiable way to allow one to distinguish between them, all within the passing of an hour, irreversible even. And we've got no one else to thank but you!'

'Are they, may I?'

'Of course you may, you're the project leader after all, these are the fruits of the labor you yourself have worked hard for, harder than anyone else involved in the project. That, of course being a lie, but would you expect any better? Would you expect anyone else to stand against you when they're all dead?'

'I wouldn't want to intrude on your parade, but, may I see them at work?'

'What of the eulogy? There's certainly something in there.'

The altar-sun held by the upward-pointing anchor-like structure, bearing a bile of mass, plump growths that only reminded one of what had been stolen from man eerily jerked as it was approached by them. Not a single word nor whisper would suffice; since it only served as a means to taunt them, with every second they spent after, being reasonless, as if to understand why.

'Are they supposed to be stored in it?'

‘I don’t know.’

‘Will you tell me of something you do know?’

‘Then it would be unfair towards the other ones. The other parties do have a stake in this as well, and that, I cannot truly discern between the clients, even though you’ve served just well enough, under surveillance that is, we cannot give you more than that. With regret, I must let you know that you’re only allowed to peer on them and as little more, not else.

It’s an unfortunate, I know. But that’s how it is, that’s how things work, or have to work from this point on, since they bought it.’

‘My entire research wing with every man and every piece of meat in it?’

‘Of course they have, even you, I suppose it would be fair to say, they won the bid. They own all of us and it’s only going to get worse from this point on. Since they intend on doing things you wouldn’t even dream of being possible if you were still in charge.

A drop, let’s start with that, there’s going to be a huge drop in, let’s refer to it as the mechanisms that are at play or responsible for the continuation of the life-support of this zone and the adjacent ones to them. Since they don’t need to breathe or consume anything, there won’t be any need for those things, at least for a while, until some of the hardier men all come down from the other side of the world, and stomp in the competition with their Para-scanners.’

‘I’ve heard about those, but I didn’t think they’d be possible, at least it’s something that, it’s not supposed to work either in theory, on paper or in practice. They’re beyond the feasibility of that which is even remotely convenient to exist in the realms of the real world.’

‘Unfortunately, they’re capable of scanning and readdressing the problem of the life-fluctuations in the area where plenty of them’ve been. Implanting whatever they’ve dragged out of their cocky-bastard stone formations, rooks of falling snow, the sandpits and everything else that’s been wasted along the way in order to bring them in.

Call them recyclers, yeah, that’s fitting; but as much as they’re bead-spoken of, and about, I’m afraid that they’re capable of reproducing edible materials as well as oxygen, as long as there’s some kind of organic body they could wrap their hands around. And that is much more easier or seems to be much easier than it’s been before, since, with the technology advancing, you know the rest. They’ve progressed far beyond what we’d thought them capable of.

Now we’re to suffer the consequences, as well as them.’

A marvelous sight soon enough made revealed. They reveled in the sight of it, even if it was only for a moment or so. It would be irrelevant to ask either way, but not a single man out there had chosen this by any means. Victims wouldn’t fit as a classification either since there was no man without a sign and no glory that would otherwise be shown to bear itself forward for no carcass that spoke no word, instead chose to spread and put the placed back where they had been taken out of. Taking them out, putting them in, making sure there were no defects in the panels behind them, or no one hiding, most importantly, no one hiding, since that had been by far, the worst thing that could’ve happened. Workers playing with puzzle pieces then acting as if they were shocked at what was happening behind the closed curtains; and much-much worse, if something appeared on the other side, in that falsely-flagged abyss, it could by no means be human, or one of them either. There was, under no possible circumstance whatsoever be anything else than something sprouting and spanning millions of miles up in the air, or something far beyond the outer reaches of such a height, to the point where transparency meant insolence to the outer-growths that came out of it; one who had clearly appeared as soon as they were done, talking about their nonsense in the most alluring way possible, a twinge for every nook it took down, for the foliage was one of blackened rods and other fallen apart pieces, but it stood tall. Somewhat of a chick inside an incubator being released too soon of an appearance, most dreadfully insolent and filled with lesser strings of far that grew on sight, and almost made themselves be known to those other ones that followed soon enough. A pseudo beak was only formed out of the many boils that were clearly outwardly not only protruding but started moving while wincing, jerkily themselves away, drawing breath whenever the casings were released as well, when finally the curtain fell, when the pieces of the puzzles were drawn, they had taken away only some bricks and revealed the empty, space.

‘There’s no vacuum any longer.

I think they’ve eaten the stars as well.’

Space appeared to be floored, beaten and allowed to rest on a surface that extended in some infinity where every other, spared stone or crackling asteroid, of any other less formation that had followed soon about, they had suffered the same treatment as they had them go through, all the way through and gone, were their thoughts when finally met by this conundrum.

‘What shall we do about them?

Can the scanners deal with these things?’

Still tall-like lymph-node bulb-heads, or elongated stalks that bore light-bulbs, where they were joined soon after in some communion of boils that allowed them to share in that substance they shared so dearly for their life’s least important bothersome touch.

Again, one drew nearer to what was left of this wall’s side. They couldn’t enter inside, but the boils amassed, forming a great seed that flew right through, expanding, then forming a strange syringe-like cysted with rings, holding many lesser arms –satellite, which changed in color, from some see-through yellow, to a strange blue-red beyond the black, acid-like gust-mist, out of which some darkened stone began forming, like frozen in-mid air crystalline-formations that were endowed with the most unnaturally hard to fathom, smaller spatially deformed great obelisks, two of them, shaped along a trail made as if by the tail of a scorpion readying itself to strike, with the beads of fat and with the inner-fetus-like pumping creatures that used both of these structures as a means to survive, at the tip of which finally they released some inner-wave like blood-clot transfusion kind of weird globular spheres of a few unnaturally dissected out of some lower-species, ranging diameters that soon entered the bubbling forms of the outer-drawn husks that were these fleshy suits of mindlessness the workers had been forced into. They were cut, but no motion of cutting had been observed. They were bleeding but no blood came out. There were bubbles but there was no air. They were souls, but they had been soulless all along. And most importantly there was no explanation what this substance that was being extracted out of them, slowly, one by one, by the globules that soon enough retracted and hid away from sight had been. Nor would there be a chance to ask, since, it came it unannounced.

Or the three of them, to be more precise; great-tri-bodied torsos, rotten faces, blackened armored, with the pipe-like pea-shooters, submachine-gun, filled with gas-like puckery coal-funnels. Witnessing this, the door opened, as if it had been asked to do it, without even wasting a warning before they could finally be brought down. A few of the workers were immediately shot before they could react, before they could even propagate whatever there was that they shared between one another, as well as.

Information:

‘I think there’s a problem here.’

‘This is what you get for replacing me. I supposed them, the higher ups much more intelligent than this. But seeing how this is not exactly what they’ve expected, I’d say.’

‘It’s inconclusive.’

A nasty-fucking screen, talking back; you should be shattered! He thought. Thinking itself better than I am, thinking that I’m simply going to bow down my head and act as if they’re much better, much, much better than I’ll ever be.

Stride along and wait.

‘A process had started already, that cannot be undone.’

A ship had sailed and not a single sane man could be had or taken yet for granted. Sacked, were a few rafters the man went nearby by it, drooping jaw being placed on top of his neck, bobbling his head downward, to brothel his way through a few flights of ‘stairs’ automated, as he simply descended through a maze, then stepped on his own toes, winging himself closer to the door, half-opened by the time he pushed it fully open, where, nodding disappointingly aware, away from the crowd, that was in the sector four, the other zone being contaminated, at the very least for a few more moments until the air supplies were fully consumed, then wasted on, wasted himself, drooping by a cradle, bathing a snare upon a walk at unawares benign, as he opened his eyes no sooner than he realized that he was again alone, with no one around him. And there was also the incompetence of losing a shout, a cradle about the hourglass; but not a single candle in sight.

‘No one’s here to hear you scream, even though that can’t be completely interpreted as such.’

Second message come from the screen. It was getting ridiculous, beyond it, no one in their sane minds would stand there, like that, taking it as if they were some punching bags, like niggers, cowardly ensnared. Not a single diamond in the rough to make it as if, sooner or later it would be fair, or much fairer to raise a torch; skin and embroil, a spineless bothersome obelisk not gone. In the same fashion they had appeared, so had the lost one disappeared away from sight. A bothersome allure, and then, with a puff, they were gone.

‘And a leper man arrives!’

A voice had come and then announced, but this time it had been prepared. The seed of boils drew back as well, as it wouldn't want to make too much noise now. Too evident, too annoying, to have it soothe.

'Space is being devoured yet not a single one of you shook or made it well haven trashed.'

But there was no telling from which exact spot it had come from. Nor of the consequences that followed of the project being abandoned if a single man appeared to have come and smashed. A single brim of tools that stood erected.

The fall

'Eventually, just you wait for them, they'll join us. I know they will, you just count on it. Eventually, I tell you!

Every single living man, every single living being, all will join us in the chasm, and they shall lay with us from this point on, without concern, without a doubt.'

'Will they like it here? In this dead-place, in this wretched hole where their holistic reality will simply slide into, falling out of place.

'I doubt it, not since they're very much alive. They're too real, physical, minded by objects that are poisoned, by so many unnatural things that seem to harm us with everything that's yet endured. It's simply something that's unavoidable, I suppose. Since many of them, the people are taught things in a certain way.

Primates, it's what I've heard they are. It's what they're called and used for, since the fall has already commenced and many of them are still yet to acquaint themselves with our fine-folk.'

'Don't do something unappealing or something that will have them nibble at our fingers or our toes. You know how they get then and after. How they like playing the fools. How they employ the most disgusting things and bring forth their living arms and tools. They're something disgraceful, shameful, they represent only the most disturbing aspect of our kind; regressing in their hobbles of dirt, and into their plain to see disgusting holes, when we.'

'I'm afraid we're being watched, lady. This isn't a safe place to be seen in. We'll have to leave immediately!'

'Shouldn't we at least try to wait until the rain settles down?'

'We can't. There's just too much at stake and little more to be said between us.'

'Then leave. I'll stay behind.'

‘I can’t let you do that either; if I leave, that very black and white marbled door will automatically open for a man you’ve never seen throughout the entirety of your life. And he will crack a shot at you. And you will die as soon as he is done.’

‘This apartments are full of them, I can smile if you’d like.’

‘Your face would be more endearing that way, go ahead, you’ve my permission. If the pain persists, I’ll have no other option than to cull the lot and pull you out of this room myself, then fling you in his arms so he could have an easier time killing you.’

‘Why are you being so cruel to me? I’ve done nothing but show you with endless waves of sensible, tranquil and lovely yet carnality be put aside, affection. What changed?’

‘It is for that reason alone that I choose to leave you behind; I’ve grown tired of you, of using you, of thrust my things against your body and against your insignificant lumped-together pig-fat I am from this point on repelled by.’

‘But I’m not overweight, I’m thin, thin as a board, certainly there must be another reason for you acting this way.’

‘Another woman, women actually, hundreds of them I’ve fallen in love with. And all of them way beyond cheerful to replace you! They would, at the beat of a heart. This carnal rage of mine can only be satisfied by thousands of women, then a housewife I’m going to most likely cheat upon. As I’m the villain; my villainous rampage cannot yield until fully met. My carnivore desires expand for more than mere mortal flesh.’

‘Then I suppose I’m left with nothing more but die.’

‘On this very bridge your fate will be decided.’

Since the bridge stretched all the way to that tiny building they were connected to. And the ‘room’ they were in had been carried away by the smoke which had already hardened at the spots where the pieces of the ceiling, part of the floor, walls, the windows, the window blinds, the furniture, the carpets, the lamp, various drops of paint, some old manor-like paintings dating back to the sixteen hundreds, some animals that were cruelly kept in cages, some wall-hidden riddled with growths that had elongated rat-tails as well as humanoid skulls for heads that were extended a few feet from the area towards which they had once been ‘magnetized’-drawn towards, before being completely drawn into it, with bodies that were many faceted and appeared to have man’s-faced- with worm bodies and worm arms and worm legs that were held in see-through coffin-formation filled with preservation fluid that made it so these creatures looked like some sort of peculiar mechanical mixers.

Off Hand’s over the shoulder view revealed the side-long arm-stretch of a floating door; which had its bottom wall-filling, as it was no longer mounted into one, fully encompassed by the hardened almost neuron-sea formations, a web-like eerie gelatin thing that was dripping with moisture as it rejoined the controlled gas; since it was but a toxic powdery gust coming out of the great shell-like formations off the side of the cliff; out of giant slug-like faces that constantly puked since they, at the bottom of the ravine bore hundreds of pipes that were all connected to giant growth-organs that had been mechanized then filled with giant Cuban-like cigars. Both Hand Offsluck and Jane Horr were actively feeling the effects of a most bothersome toxin that was tearing them apart from inside out. She lost a leg and was bleeding into nothingness; as one of the 'planks' that made the bridge simply drew back in, in a most mechanical kind of manner. They choked on the smoke. Jane was left with a black cancerous tumor-growth for a lump, caused by the incessant smoking she was forced to breathe in. It spread like an infection of tar that became an elongated tree-trunked in bulk root that shot onto the ground.

'I won't be the executioner Jane. I'm much better than that. I could not fathom leaving you to die out here alone.'

'That a rifle on you?'

'I saved it for a special occasion, but I'm not going to be the one that kills you. It's either him or you're doing it yourself.'

'You want me to end my own life in front of you? How is that not cruel?'

The smoke already corroded half of her face which had become an oblong growth as if it were welded in by weld-wire.

Rapier of Hillum

'Oft there is of any reason to continue whenever they look down yet rescind something that would've hanged upon the brow of the falling planes that have amassed in spare.'

'There's only one wing left, what'd you expect?'

'Some survivors at the very least, not to anger the one working with them; but I've listened unimpressed and I've since found no other man hiding in the wreckages, nor inside the plains, the ones hidden thither and away; once apart, the culprit that's been seen will be here at once. I know it to be so!'

A day apart was waited by them near one of the only, most absurd music's come to an end tune; whenever missing and mixed with, strung abhorrent yet come upon were they not listened to.

'I see but a single arch coming from that far end.'

He gutted one of the rocks, out of which an oyster clam's rose –inside shone upon the strike up-front, twisted-in the curve, the shining forth as it's been thrown through the sickeningly stoles of pebbles and of empty bodiless flung apart.

'One of the files you've been working on Gourney, there's something I'd like you to go back to, backtrack if you will, only for a moment or so until, there. That line, precisely that line, I'd like you to go over it again.'

'What's wrong with it?'

‘Nothing, of course there’s nothing wrong with it; maybe not the line itself but the people involved in it. The professor, that’s the one, that’s exactly what I’m talking about, the side of street seems too familiar to me to simply let go of.’

‘The Island stretches for miles at times.’

‘It seems to me that it’s now connected to their part of the town, barely dimly lit, still, oft night I see. Shade’s being thrown in the distance, can you see it?’

Past the open hanger, up-lifted sight:

It was a senseless compression from one sight to another, two bulbic spheres, a normal sun and a puffier one, standing as representatives as they oozed with power and with light alongside the dark and the lightened recess of the blasphemous holes, facets as well as the other deformations against which they shot their many pea-shooter straw-thin elongated lobes. It was a mess of unfathomable proportions, yet it was there.

‘You’ve pointed in that direction yet yearned for such a thing as one would call for, an investigation. Could it be that you still fear to approach it?’

‘Claire!’ Clearly dumb-found he stroke the pin again; having the door opened on a whim before she entered. His secretary, as youthful as in the day she’s had her. Behind, the stretch, the compartment of a plane, reeling back and forth with two leashes, whips made out of two ripped away rails it used to crawl along. It bequeathed an approval to get out of this trap. Not a man responded yet, she asked:

‘Is there something you would need, sir?’

He will find me out. Will thought. He will find out about the premonition the conical frog had whispered to me in my ear during the blissful dream of end-age run.

‘We shall go there at once then!’

It was settled, as they walked through the door, taking Claire with her in the trunk near the stopper, the broth of many barrels forming a strange cord. A few wheels on both sides, and a few more apparently humanoid casks lain on top the tomb-like formation that lay inside the prior to their entry-door. The car being segmented into two main pieces, the front compartment with four seats and the one behind, separated by a downwardly retractable door that allowed one to see the other one. Inside of it lay the ooze-dripping transparent gelatin door inside of which the tomb was cast in, on top of which the ‘humanoids’ almost made a mount, a pile, strapped and benighted, the barrels having formed the chitinous membrane that formed this unnatural thing that withheld all from entering; the fashionable corpses having gathered around, heaving their flat forward cast thing caskets sprouting out of their pyramided pincer-helms, with their flat, upward-at-the-sky googly bulbs suddenly having curved in the front as the car stopped in the middle of the road, most people rotated at them, but with one exception, a giant see-through of glass with a humanoid-bulbic brain floating in place, surrounded by metal bands of ‘iron’-like twists as well. A pseudo-sea ray of iron coming out of the iron-rose bud that lay in front of them, -kind of appearance to every single corpse’s helmet, although they were not like any other seen before corpse since they had been forcefully extracted recently, the deprave spoke again:

‘Let us in and sweat, for the heat shall lay upon you a nail of many faces, that thee upon thine road might see mischievous!’

‘There’s a reason you were asked to come in. Please, have a seat near one of the empty holes, the ones in the furniture, the ones in the syphilis-like people that are shaking near them, the tall demonical figurines on the shelves near you and the Despot, whose servitude is mine alone to call upon when time un-gone. I think there’s someone listening on us.’

‘Who would that be?’

‘I’m uncertain to a point; else, withheld from choosing, might I be spoiled not to spare. There’s something down the line anyway.’

‘What is?’

‘Another similar to him, the Despot walks with many a-like but he cannot wince at a single one whether or not that makes any ill-felt sense.’

‘Will you give something in return?’

‘Unfortunately, I cannot!’

Not while the fungi was approaching, forming a strange elongation that occult alone could not have summoned from the vile Empress herself; for her domain alone appeared to be seeping in.

‘A Cypress for the Empress, lack of a mind, and to it, a filter of the silk-n- rodded mind; but lo, he’s coming.’

One of the lord that governed over bile, large meaty head, an oyster-like thing opened with many rubbery teeth that crawled inside his gums like worms, a single tape-one whipping vertically while flung and held in the air, akin to some numb bear, a wing to its right side, and one molded into its head, in the mouth, having absorbed an eye, coming out like a puffy thing or some parasite; preventing it from fully opening as it arrived.

There, on sight, it grinned.

‘I see that you’ve been messing with some of the stoles and flocks or birds of death, the ones I’ve found lying near my cemetery-bed, but you’ve yet to become made of a mind.’

‘We shall not lend onto you the same ammunition that shall have us shot at the back of our heads tonight!’

‘My will shall not prevail, and that, on top a quail I shall have it wilt delivered onto you by chance, and have another one bring ransom to your souls at the time they shall be brought to my domain of pain.’

For the sky darkened, filled with rough smoke.

In the distance there lay a flying pair of barracks, all torn apart but neighboring one another. They looked out of place, many hill-shaped buildings with one exception, an altar-rectangular-pillar which depressed in a cave-like entrance that was pushed inside in a giant backward on an incline downward pointing cylinder, where hundreds of coffin-like moved by a system of metallic arm-like things, flying and with bulb-rounded bodies, with eyes at the end of their tail-like static pipe; stored the thousands of dead-like machine chamberlains before they could be used again. A strange 'island' unit, 'patch' of ground with a few buildings stuck on it appeared to be detached but at the same time attached by a depressing bridge that connected it to the main base it was a part of.

'There's the scent of perfume I've been looking for, think there's some left inside?'

'Nay, not that I think of anything ill now, but we're standing at the crossroads of near-to-die!'

Somewhere the true rapier existed. A large cylindrical device; entered through a giant mass, pumping inside of it, pure men, of growths come out, filled with antler-like spreads of geometrically imprinted on their bodies, giant spreads in which they crawled with hundreds upon hundreds upon hundreds of many more like them as well, as many others that didn't exist by any other mean at all.

'I am of a sort that does not belong in here.'

'You are to watch over the few that make it all the way through and ease their passing as well, otherwise you shall be cowed and put in trappings such as to be sent to the stooper soon after!'

There were signs of Mortis just about everywhere an eye could see. A giant trash-sack bullfrog belly with an open lid-flat oblongoid of a head holding onto it by a few thin rope-teeth; eyeless but with the empty sockets in place; an organic wart-covered pseudo flattened and then fattened stove of mass; leaping around in search for something, more of the obfuscated bodies as well as bones, the ones that were clearly waiting for it to maim-lick-slurp the marrow clean off them.

'I am in search of some eyes; would any of you agree as to lend onto me a shuddersome donation?'

'We do not make such inquires to a broth of skin!'

Let alone to one as putrid as it'd been.

'Filthy parasites! I will sacrifice as many of you as I can!'

A lot of them would be a handful for anyone with a hardened back, especially since they showed no sign of kicking some back off the trail.'

'I'm saddened as well, that we'd have to do this, you know? To one of ours, if he did it first; first time's the worst. I wouldn't bear to forgive myself for what would allege of him after.'

A giant flat compact fridge-like skull of some tawny brawn- bag like strapped on top of a giant worm-like tube that was attached to the lower part of its nostrils as well as the entirety of its lower-side, jawless as it were, eyeless, and seemingly more of a flaccid mask than an actual skull. A dead-look on its' face. Many like it soon followed. Completely organic in the way they turned and curved.

So many people depend on it. The rapier feeds them, it feeds its citizens as if they're its children; albeit there's never been a chance to hope shattering it; there's still a chance to still withdraw. After what's it done to the houses; to their homes, to the people who are now hooked on it; incapable of escaping by their own accord as they chained themselves with the feeders, crops of cotton-like blobs entering them, all come from one of the lesser rapiers grown at the end of the village, this small town a sample of what's to come. From one end to another, from one vicious looking insignificant other that could not withdraw the reigns or hope they could climb on top one of the leprous trains and leave. Too weak to do so; a door opened and fell. Looters often came, but stopped when they saw a man unhooked.

'You'd better run before they get you too!

I heard they're preparing to charm them with a crumbling stove and spread it from one end to another until they've bathed all of us into a pyre of smoke.'

'I'm not afraid of standing up for my people!'

'I beg your pardon, but they're that bulb's, that radish of fat, the crumbling tower-thing that flops and wriggles and feeds them growth.'

Lodged in every house now, conquered with no hope.'

'There's still a chance to save them, isn't there? I simply say. I'd think there'd be a machine keeping the rapier alive! It's partly inorganic as life itself wouldn't survive in one of those!'

'Unless it's attached to one of the lesser blocks of meat, the squarish pyramid triangular below, the wretched singer with many faces that feed the blobs that grow beneath it, which grant it a divine right to enter each man's soul and form him of a perfect marble.'

A terracotta army of angels moving beneath the underground chambers; the man knew the truth. But the soulless would come after him if they found him out. He had no gut, hence no need to feed. The looters were cannibals and criminals, but somehow they pervaded the likings of theirs, that struggled. A skin only flashed upon one another if glistening like one's brother. And they were as dissimilar as one could not think of anything more opposite than alike.

As of now, there's not a single livid entourage to the man sitting in front of them, to be discerned by the device; at which memory's incomplete epitome diaphragm complete destruction's reach had been completely burnt to a pulp; unending.

'Good's man lord coming from Wyoming, I see!'

'There's twenty more like them waiting in line, trying to set their foot in past the threshold, think they're not replaceable by us? I think we ought to kill them for burning the Constitution and pissing on the flag!'

'Great one Dement; Admiral, may I, if it's possible, enter the first crystal?'

'Eight lay broken by disease, but I suppose there'd be something in it for you to look in!'

'There's still something I've yet to ask!'

Of course he wouldn't. If only he would. Of course he would. If only he shut his mouth and didn't move; it'd be much easier to get to him and do him harm. Most interesting if one could have it now; but there, there; they were of an opinion that no one was to be spared if it could be even feasibly achievable to cleanse them all ethnically! It would be warmly felt, if that meant a thing at all. They would have to deal with the mighty mystifying test of least-leprous endurance, hardly withheld from any if not all, but theirs. It was the ingratitude he showed what tipped them off to his true, turbulent-like nature, which very much, remotely so, abhorred even the most moderate of the council members, who stood on blocks of servants piled together, molded into barrel-shapes.

‘A rotten tower in that case! We shall exchange every single one of our hearts for a rotten tower, which shall not be toppled by anything that would cast away, whichever there be, or therefore see, a reason to seep in and cast away the agony which is misgiving!’

‘I’d think there was such a thing as a scuffle for us to be aware of! Is there not?’

‘Silence, silence in the court! There’s no reason to adjourn or seek a trifle of this insolence, disciple! I call upon you to bring upon us further proof of what’s been done, the harm tempered and therefore gone, but we cannot say, therefore. A little more of the matter unless proof is brought onto the court, there, there, silence I say!’

The Jury would prevail, but the court was open, the door struck, over there! Of course it would be, a large crowd connected to another that were standing upon their shoulders like a ladder, carrying a platform-like structure split in four sides, on top of which four great beings, humanoids like were kept levitating on top of each, in the middle, whereas their heads kept changing in forms; strange things hard to discern anymore. Yet, surrounding them was a pitch black filled with dancing figures, madly trying to condescend what appeared to be naught else but a peculiar cove-cavern they came out of. In the back a giant dwarfish spined figure; with two heads pointing on both sides, socketless, but armed with pistons coming out of them; two arm-like guns coming out, pointing at the four; chains appeared to be lodged beneath and every neatly, spoken-so of, eroded ankle-clasper held as well; handcuff appeared to be a thing of bluff. Were they really such entrapped? Or fear of being shot had taken them for the wretched they were, plenty withheld, others did not!’

‘Is there a reason they’re but here? We were not announced of such a figure!’

‘This is no court any longer, under the orders of his Majesty, this court is dissolved, entirely so, and everyone it is to be put on immediate trial!’

‘Guilty!’ Rejoined the other head, while spinning his Gattling-gun-like tubes, pointed at them still, barely holding on the urge to kill them on the spot, cackling as well in triumph of having almost gotten so much closer than was needed to get-still. It was a play for both of them, a game of luck; a game of chance. One arm stopped, the other kept rolling on. The other started again, but froze the other just as soon as they started playing still. To have discerned such virulent appeal; earlier it happened for him to be plain. During the day:

‘I need to pass!’

‘We need to pass!’

‘Which side?’ Asked the sole man responsible for lower and rising the bridge, since he could barely try his arm again; it pained him anyway to lend a hand, and therefore stay, and stand again, of wretch forlorn and therefore lay for such a moment's drawing ever after, slithering a ponder. What shall I do? The bridge was fifty miles a stretch from one side to the other, connecting two equally distant yet corrugated pieces of metal lodgings filled with open windows and possible thousands of citizens on either side, resting above a cliff in what would only seem a most disturbingly hard to see chaotic set of senseless twists and embodied in the crust of metal-symbiotic demonical and angelic figures with multiple heads and lower appendages that formed root-like spreads which wrapped their unnatural end-tubing wrought out outer protrusion, they shared, into a barrel-like feeding boiler-device the citizens fed in order to keep the entire city alive. Multiple lower tunnels appeared to connect one side to the other, but they were at large inaccessible to outsiders, unless they found a way in. And the way in was obscured, hidden, if there was one, and not many just as obscured as the one. A cliff-fall of billions of miles, making it even harder to see whether or not there was an end as well to the abyss. A deserted sight that stretched for even farther than that, on either side one could see. A desolate desert with figures which, upon rising, appeared to drag out giant hidden cities and revolts as well they kept to themselves, especially the more hidden ones. And there was also the problem on having to deal with the only consistently 'there', structure there was. The bridge, which required a toll to pass, albeit it was unknown whether or any of the prior passers paid the toll in full or not. He was a tiny man, calico-trouser wearing, with puffy buttons shaped like suns split in halves, with four and three faces similar to his; whereas his only defining feature was a metal band that bore a similar to the feeding of the lower-figures fallen down there, boiler- almost backpack-aligned to his back, bird-cage filled with many tinier formations kept a hold of inside this almost thumb or giant metal see-through cigar of a 'life-preserver' he kept a hold of, as if his dear life depended on it, to a fault he could not endow himself to deal with any longer, since it was too painful, keeping alive, silent as well, for this long; but enough of the appearances; which may or may not be deceitful as a stray looking forth would lay look upon naught else but the width of the bridge itself as to calculate or approximate more clearly, on the baffling to the common eye and judgment of the width the bridge appeared to bear since, one could barely comprehend whether or not there was still a chance to make it cleanly so without having to damage its structural integrity by mere act of pass.

Blurred singles

'Sometimes I can hear them, Herring Bosnia, you're not going to make it in time to shatter one of the globes, you know, right?'

'I'm going to take my chances, child. But first, I need to know who is it that you're hearing, otherwise I won't be able to leave. I really need to take claim over it before I leave, I truly do. And I can't easily explain it either, but it has something to do with how my mind's started acting up again, whenever active in that room, when they flash me with lights, I feel as if my head could pop off straight off my shoulders. Unless I find them, you're going to die!'

'I know that, father, I truly do, but you can't save me while half of my spine is in the god's jaw! It's the one piece keeping him alive, and gods cannot be killed, father!'

'They can be stumped and stuffed, and made pay for what they've taken for a father who clearly loves his daughter and that's all that I need to know! I'm not giving up on you, kid!'

‘Somehow, I knew you’d say that dad.’

‘Stay in this room and don’t leave, and don’t try talking to anyone!’

‘Don’t you want to know about them first?’

‘Not any longer, Margaret. I think you need some rest.’

He then dashed out of the velvety room, slamming the door behind. A room of flesh she was locked in with a single bed of iron. Watched running in circles as a sleepwalker by the various owl-headed animated corpses left behind, legless but floating in flying circles as well, with her. The room had lamp-suns, but that didn’t matter. A dead man waited in the side-view mirror, trapped inside a complete resin cast-mould that hardened and kept him completely encased in. Herring was driving through the building, entering apartment after apartment with every drive being ended up parked on top of some bed or some chair, or even the resident, who were bleeding. Their faces were open, completely, ellipses:

‘You’re trespassing and this is no place someone like you should be in!’

A room of puffy gray-stone with strange figures of blue and spirals and lines and spears, hunting mad-men on hills and what not; distraught people screaming, echoing, entering and leaping in like flies and flukes and unnatural dunes they formed once they brought the sand in. Dark braziers of gray and black smoke that trailed on the top of some engulfed in acid pouring off them people. Many dancing, evilly, speaking of naught else but treason:

‘Don’t get near them or they’ll fling you off as if you’d gotcha’rself in a trip to the bazaar pit where they feed the lions women’s feet!’

‘And you would know that, wouldn’t you?’

‘Of course I would stranger, after all, I’m responsible for feeding some of them myself; not that I would, in any case care to make a point about it, but I say. There’s a reason not many people return to it on Sundays during Eves’ Green and Gray, pudgy remains’!

In what sense, he couldn’t tell. One of the windows was open, it had an air of pigeons, which were being swallow fully by crows. Which spat out their bones in, which were slowly being assimilated by the carpet, melting queerly like wax; a little glimmer to each strike and each strode as the room was filled with empty cone-dressed eaters of blood. Drenched in it as well as clot; who were directed by none other than the host inside the room, who agreed upon nothing else but a simple culinary thing, an exchange of eyes whilst during the course they could only see feet coming out of some ridiculous meat-wagon that came out with dead bats and rabid Brits. Lousy POW’s that were released on the fairness of a notice that didn’t even exclude them from being caught, then delivered in the first place. A paradise, then no less embrace, being shared; there was a reason to stay and listen, songs were sung, guns were swung and if there was anyone with half-a-mind:

‘Bosnia, you’re the only one in this room without blanks! You stepped on two people and killed them now. Their blood belongs to them, the clot, never dead. And what will you do now that you’ve got me within your reach?’

‘I want to know something, Parasite-Paradise. Who are the ones whispering to my daughter during the blackest of nights? Who are they?’

One of the braziers was backwardly thrust into a giant gnawing bear-like taxidermist body of many rotten wormish-things that clawed constantly upon it, pushing it deeper, far too deep for any comfort to be attainable by any means. It was misery, at best, something that no one could get used to, and many lesser ones would attest! His daughter ey? She could be kidnapped by monkeys, these filthy fucking niggers, they’re dumb enough to talk loudly that they might be overheard by some passerby, immediately revealing themselves to the police; ay, it must’ve been a gang of gnawing hooligan niggers!

‘Frankly, I could not tell, dear sir. You’ve got me confused and befuddled in the worst possible manner. I am standing here, cannot tell. I’m trying to think but there.’

His knife was two thirst in a making, dirty for a drink! It was shaped as wide and long, same for depth, as a kite, coming out of his back slowly, while he prepared not only to strike back but to kill Bosnia before he could draw a second breath. Knowing that the room was being filled with blood-suckers that were bowed and melted partly as well as to absorb some of the clot within:

‘Ugly things, aren’t they?’

Dead stare-parted eyes; one of them cocked itself in one direction while rotating, on a constant until it disappeared in his socket. Until a black hole was left there, in Bosnia’s socket. E-M-P-T-Y! It returned, the reunion was over, no celebration needed!

‘I’ve grown fond of them. I fancy them too much to simply dismiss them as wretches or something of the kind!’

Horrendous Alacrity

It was an ungodly hour to be woken up at. And they were least of concerned with the noise, since they gathered around in their packs and in their filthy ransacked bloody pulps that came before their faces-brought closer to the bile-moon, as they carried in it at the very least eleven hundred wild buffoons, all of them mad and restless as they carried their diseases forth. The slit inside the moon drew forth, as it opened itself, cast aside. An Ile of poison in front of them was cast. And out of it only the most pristine primates came to life, these blasphemous creatures being uncannily deformed and slickened at their backs.

‘You’ve attached saw-like blades to them, for what reason would did you do it?’

‘I don’t know yet. I guess we’ll have to find out, won’t we? Because my intuition made me so I would at the very least look inside of them.’

‘The towering men, the ones deformed as well? The ones pinned in brine, upon their wretched holds, intertwined, as they are, I would not suggest you do it.’

‘Why? Are you afraid of something?’

‘Of course not, you boon, you bastardly set shiny thing of eyes, I would not think of it as much as daringly, if so, for you it’s prized a dark possession, I’d cast them away whenever you stand the chance, or else, you should at the very least avert your eyes. Since you know what happens to men who do things like that to themselves.’

‘Either I shall be driven mad or something much worse would happen, is that correct?’

‘You’re not even listening to me, are you? No, of course not, this isn’t a play of torture or anything even familiar or contestable, as to have yourself besmirched, or throttled. Ye who approached them stands alone, but yet with many eyes, is to come back home.’

‘Wretched canal, was it not? A place that’s been forgotten by age itself, as time stands still and many of our brothers still wail there, in the most wretched of ill abysses, where even we might draw towards one day.’

‘Certainty can only drive us as far, that is correct, as you are, in one, well, it’s a way to look at it, I wager. But we’ve come too far to take such chances as to risk it coming next for us. For, if you feed it, then you know what happens and what might happen next, if touched.’

‘It will not stop, nor recede from that agonizing place it’s been forced into, will it, now?’

‘I could grow old thinking or considering the alternative that, which you’ll hopefully have me fully progress into.’

And they settled with as little more.

No ship had arrived but a broken raft-like pentagon sea-dragon, one with many arms, instead of legs, tubes with large device-like engines that thrust him forward, much closer to them than he could even imagine drawing near to. Large house-stall-wormed bodied houses came out of its back with the help of pin-prick drill-roofs that had hooks attached to their every sides.

Anxiously greeted, they were speechless in talk, and even weirder in dance, as they only approached when their clothes eerily started crawling off their faces, then, in doubt, they stopped.

All of their heads pointed at the sky, wide-opened mouthed, with elongated chin-blade stalactites, superficial wings that didn’t flap adorning their backs, thrust forward out their chests, large sack like trunks, they carried, but anatomically theirs; whereas their lower bodies were caterpillar syringe turkey blowers, with strange horned cysts coming out of them. Yet, that didn’t prevent them from levitating towards their pray:

‘You’ve come at a right time, haven’t you, haven’t you? I thought you would, I thought you should at least dare knock; as fiercely as you could, since there’s no possible way you could ruin the gates, since fallen they’re not.’

‘Are you done yet, or will you drive the compass into your heart and allow us to carry on at that?’

Irregular heartbeats brought him a most engulfing stare of pristine pyramidal tendon powder pop-tastes coming out of his mouth.

They were brought inside within the hour. A shower-of tendons, inside an inverted submarine, they lived in. And breathing most profusely is how they got to know one another, despite being so eerily soon yet lost in thought but introduced, as such as was their claim to fame, and wretched was their dark remains, the ones floating above every single one.

‘Are they always there when you are in?’

‘We’re inseparable, dear Alf, but, as you’d expect, the weather outside allows for no respite to be taken while we’re among strangers.’

It seemed fair enough, for every single man out there feared what that meant, for every single one of them. Soon enough, we shall join them, in march, out of the graves beneath the coiled dark surroundings, where even the wretched wails of forgetfulness is made of us, in turn and wheat. Where we shall live, forever, at our feet.

One of the worming podiums appeared out of nowhere, already in sight, thinking of a way to introduce itself, as to show the contortions that had been the flooring and the furnished laundry mats, washing machines and other, much harder to be believed, furniture in which hid the rods. They were harder to look at and even harder to grasp as to show even a slimmer of understanding. It’s been long since it made a difference, thinking. They could already die and would not be longed for, at the very least by the special ones that messed with the city side reality. It was vague by means one couldn’t properly understand, how the bottle-trunked ruffians came out of their hidings, where were their heads, being replaced with every bubble that was shot like vintage Noire champagne, but they came out of it and already missed the cue:

‘Come here, come here, hands up where I can see em!’

There wasn’t even the slightest doubt that they didn’t know how to take him head-on, or how to react to their promontories of weapons, of defunct, functionless pegs they adorned around their rifles.

‘Cannibals, every single one of them! They will make sugar out of our meat!’

‘Relax, I think I know how we may just live through this yet. You need to listen to me before they decide we’re being too noisy to be left alive.’ Although it would not be as bothersome as to think of it yet; I would think it most necessary to abandon you somewhere along the road. This isn’t the right time to act irrational, not while they’re so naively pouncing around us. Pacing as speeds we can barely tack with your eyes, these insoluble things incapable of thought.

He derived as well from what they were doing and how they were acting.

‘Odd, you were not here before.’

‘Who said that? Show yourself, show yourself immediately!’

‘A baton of senses, is it not?’

A cornflower cinnamon thing invaded his nostrils in such a way that his mind started gnawing on both sides of the pantheon; there were corpses in the twisted podium after all, inscribed in every step. It was senseless, trying to fight them out in the open, especially since there was no possible way they could stand a chance against this intoxicating miasma of movements they simply let out of them; not while standing.

Somewhere in the distance, on the other side of the world:

The city was in peril, from one side of the other, of the upper valley's inter domination spread-through's cut-ins, there only being left a good eighteen hundred billion fifty five miles untouched, to the side-contorted road dug-out oratories of disease, because of the giant murk-heads stitched god-figures with socketless eyes whom were present there, in bubble-bellies; floating through strung tunnels carried in by winged insect-speared molded-wax Pantheonic Wart demons with spear-teeth pea-shooters coming out of their mouths, in the same way pipe-swarms would sometime appear, contort, stitch into one another's sides, then simply wrap themselves around the bubbles as if they were nothing, and naught more untouched by the dark-storm clouds that followed soon enough after, through the cuts that were being made by the little flying people's yellow panting pain-drops coming out their swollen-yet-forlorn eyes, decayed by parametric little fish they carried in their red-bubble boil-blimps they brought and stored the red lightning in, surging powerlessly with bothersome tender. The city was, luckily enough shielded inside a giant tubular cylinder- covered in chitin plates that had hundreds of people-carved- in figures, tomb-stone foliage of fought-for-their-nation men only to end up in there adorning what would appear to be the most deranged of cemeteries of the lost; a great dark, held by an elongated spear-scepter pillar, fan-filled with corroded, fish-net cords amassing around it, ring bore, on top of the musingly aligned shafts, large antennae-shots that projected men's atoms directly inside the city. The pillar was connected to an elongated tunnel-length sized hose-wriggling worm-pump that kept growing and receding in size; whom, itself was connected to a great base-like formation, a strange structural building in which the outsiders amassed in order for the projection to occur. That being, an almost beheaded snail whose shell and backside was the building's front, whose tail got cut off as well, but which had a giant leveled square-top emerging, like a barnacle out of a ship, outer level, that bore a front-faced, as if cruise-ship level, giant humanoid head-formation with many coon-like peas coming out of his chin and beneath his jaw, with an elongated top of the head cracked bottle tower, sharp at the top, out of which a power-ray shot at the sky, deliberately releasing surge-red-colored energy through which many soulless creatures could plainly be seen as if they were desperately trying to emerge out of their torturous hell. Or an ugly boot trying to raise its heel, whose foot was cut, bearing a saxophone shaped insect that came out its back.

It was most peculiar an existence they had to live through. Since the 'people' were so strange looking, flat-sheet-parchment faces attached to small device tin can filled boxes, sprouting out of large tubes that came out of liver-formed trunk 'masses of meat that bore, a curved blade-like formation where a human's head would've belonged, connected to a flat-plated note that had a triangular on one side, connected to an opposite direction pointing rounded-bulb filled with fluid growth that came out of it as if they were pieced together, with a pseudo-flat-talon cartilage pointing at the note, in the third direction. Like a guitar pick attached to an anatomical creature shaped like a pistol. And their heads and their 'notes' were aligned like fully-stretched arms, ready to clap. They had no fingers and no toes, only long melted dolphin elongated limbs filled with node-wombs; whereas their bodies were covered in veins and other deformed organs that came out of them and sometimes floated in the colossal rooms inside their city.

No sockets and no eyes but happy faces:

‘I have come home, do dinner, now, woman! I command you to start cooking immediately, so I may be fed to my heart’s contempt; or else I shall whip you to a point where you’ll simply stop breathing and I shall start beating you most violently so, until you’re dead.’

‘Honey, what’s gotten into you? Why are you, all of the sudden so sexy sounding when you are furious? I’ve never seen you act this way before but I think I like it; I think I could see myself growing to enjoy this kind of treatment, beaten, by you, my loving yet sternly, manly, strong-armed, husband, who needs to enact acts of abuse onto me on a constant basis only so I can get off it. I am wet.’

‘And my dinner is yet to be cooked still.’

Henceforth, she went along her way, open chested; with a dark crystal-spear shotgun-blast of clay formation filled tiny forest coming out of her.

‘The night is sure to come, isn’t it?’

‘You’ve noticed that, haven’t you?’

Eyes, Corn and Pucker-door, were fifty meters from them, in the transparent bubble-eye, with their so-much-so-expected, soon-enough that is, beheaded god’s resurrection being half-way through, already a limb sprouting out of his gut-chaotic drop of appendages that grew thrusting-fast out of his organs, being fused with the prison they were sitting in by the time either man outside the camp could even open his mouth.

Something’s wrong with it; he observed, just the strange way in which it kept moving when not observed.

A read miasma-like pucker of mists drew near them, coming out of a giant’s head machine back, whose arms were missing, he was not. Mentally at the very least he wasn’t only not present, if that were such, so the case, in turn, was he wondering when would they come near him, there, already, still talking to the gods, in turn, whom had joined the bubble and only entered, housing themselves inside those, by now, bloated things, Corn being of a mind to ask: ‘Have you come here for a reason? Are you to ask something of me when I close my eyes? Dead-god, you awake in sessions, but you, you just can’t stop getting out of place, can you?’

‘There’s something come along the way you ought to have considered. It’s a bullet inside a trapped inside of it sphere-filled chained, covered in explosives.’

‘Did you arm it, are you responsible for it?’

‘What are you hiding?’

A little bottle bloated, saw-with teeth long-maw formed creature with a leg by its side. Dragging itself along while the bottle was churning red-liquid into place; trying to open further, although the oblongity obstructed its capability of breathing. A scornful malignity made it raise itself from the spot it’s been driven into; a corner lay there, flat.

‘I’m going to kill your pet and open its mouth!’

Most irksome of things approached.

Eyes knew that something was extremely wrong, he was even wrathful for some reason, although that had been only short-lived for a moment or so. He had the perfect tool on him, ready for the slight shiv of a hand so they would be dispatched from sight. A dark enough glow protruding out of it, devouring, mesmerizingly so, out of the fuselage that was being eaten by it, and by the side of a slightly unmoving thing, its head, the great body of the machine having fallen, a plough of bombs soon after being part if not entirely it, the top-front of the building in which the dead-monolith fell into. With part of its body completely destroyed now, there was no doubt whatsoever about what happened there. Without a single speck of light entering them, one could see, even for a moment if that's what it took to know, that its children drew out of its Achillean heel, then came back to place. A tender, most rendered tenebrous entrance having been set there. Inside of it, partly after, entering yonder, a hole being bored, by a set of tools put to the employ of the research team present at the site; since it's been far too long since someone said a thing, and wingless dark machines were brought within the sinful, single most sin of bright:

'They dared cut through the giant only to find out that he's been partially eaten inside by the beasts. SO many experiments that have been done and gone through and for what?

A single pile of belch and ooze, through which they've pushed and put themselves through, so much so that I would find myself of no countenance as much as there would be.

So much so that I would dare satiate no need to ask, what have they done with it?'

'Worthless, are of you horrendous things, you're as worthless as one would have himself strung up and killed if he were only to open his mount for a momentous disparity, and ask himself whenever needed, burdened by all of you, living in this wicked reality, I, bastardly of men ask of you that you may consider cutting away the extra limbs, feeding the halvened destroyers that have come to threaten as to trample us, whenever called, and call for action shall not be stalled as long as so many of you are come onto me with thought of war, consider it still, I'd rather have myself but filthily filled, with bickering empty talks than aghast. I've come to cast all of you away, rather than send you to your deaths now, else', I give in.'

A general within and one at heart, he lived to his name, Geo-pyrat; an ecological crisis having come, ran over them, and left all to strung-forth pieces that could not be more disturbingly forlorn if lost, then regained, the men, whom mutated instead had only to ask:

'What comes thither, after that?'

'I reckon, nothing, nothing in part or that may be parted unless lesser men are told to be wailed upon if mourned for too long as well, I sicken to my bowels thinking of despair, tomorrow, as such, I've come to the realization that there's another way we can come, but crass onto the sea-but-venture spread in front of us, the road ahead, crudely made, wastes no longer.'

All of them in part were waited for, as to be imparted long-lasting wisdom before they could properly move on and forget what that was, part of it, the life before they were beckoned of defeat, and chopped along, alone, their feet would've had them lay-hanging near lynch, the guillotine.

'They all lead the same way it drools on top of. All the rivers are joined, and many are incapable of threading alone.'

‘Whose door was drowned by them?’

‘All are moistened and filled, of barrel-ill and brought to us when backened into a dead end, both feet were found standing in the corner he was driven to, our guide.’

‘Show it to me, immediately!’

On command and driven forth, upon two finger lobes that drew alight, he followed soon after. Sound by sound nearing each end of the worthless passage, drawn as well on top their masks, incapable as they were from telling whose was whose and what.

‘So many of the floors, simply removed, to what end and what was the reason behind it?’

No answer, and the same man left Gauff alone.

A standing pupae crawled by wheels attached to the rails, they were everywhere, especially stapled on the walls, where everything worked in tandem with some of the other things that rose out the quiet, and the silence that passed soon after, broken, yet again was he answered, by a figure unlike the guide, unlike the man he had been accompanied by:

‘Hide inside that hole down there, the one that’s engulfed in giant leaves, the one in which you shall find a dirty pit, and fifty meters in, stop. You should lay there for a while, cover yourself in the cardboard bag and make sure you feel the rain at your feet. There’s something nearing your position and I dread what it might do to you.’

As he was asked to, that’s been done forth, crawled along and lay right there, in a contortionist’s unaware stance, in such things-like twists that no one could even find it possible to have himself found in. The figure travelled along the halls, many of which exposed to the greater network of covered by the ‘ceiling’ ledges, canyons and other unfathomably hard to look at points. It was ‘mounted’ on a rack that looked like a footed leg kneeling whose knee pointed in the back, on top a pair of unseen rounded wheels that were completely engulfed by this metal chitinous machine, out of which, forwardly it sprouted, as tall as it were a figure with a back end –elongated like a simian-humanoid skull but rounded-open like a canon where a gelatin but frozen-solidly creature, but made of skin, squirming around capable of, but filled with back ended appendages equipped with various chemicals producing shower-heads that were all segmented and moved alarmingly around, that were encased in shackles that kept them together, that appeared to be akin to a tiny forest that was being held in place, which was even weirder since they were like trumpet-shaped elongated pipe-things in the ‘back’, although entangled since some pointed downward, upward, front-ward and everywhere-ward, as to denote the general direction towards which they had been aimed towards, which almost rested on the ‘knee’ but were only a few meters away from it. Although the ‘canon’ was even more peculiarly rounded, akin to a deformed but close enough in appearance musket that was capable of stretching, which housed all of these mantis- ‘arms’ which danced around. A cock-pit insectoid head was attached to the front end of the opposite direction, to the ‘arms’, or at the back of the musket, but behind the knee, in the front, where up there, it rested, being akin to a pilot’s house. Up-front, but below the cockpit, in the area between the lower ‘kneeling’ side of the ‘foot’ but not exceeding the ‘heel’ area, yet still at the same level but on the opposite of the ‘pipes’, stood a giant rounded hollow ellipse shaped hole, of whose rims were riddled with rounded maw-like formations of dark-incisor things that were all tied together and were capable, since they wore sturdy ropes, of pulling, out of the bowels of this strange, rather mechanical thing, a peculiar upstanding sarcophagus mummy-like standing figure, close enough to a fetus, whose head was compact, a sturdy eyeless whale with lower incisors, arachnid but closer to drills, with eyes below the chest, a humanoid torso-main rack with a shield-like compounded eye instead of a left arm, but not a real eye, this being an unknown organ, with two large thing that were 'its legs' but were a helicopter long-wing and a giant stepping platform like pirate on the plank jump in the sea growth that itself, this entire body was a second piled armor that was kept inside for protection, that also could open and puke out of it, a much stranger body as well. It was only a partially melted from an angle, as if an oblong had come from below it, then it was ripped off the ceiling, ice-pick shaped, but more like a tiny bulk with a tinier tip pointing down and a half-tusk saw off remnant on top, with two humanoid eyes that were much smaller and deformed, had an elongated nose that was part of itself, and this also appeared, as the entire creature, to be close enough to a stalactite that's been eaten over, which had, eerily baboonesque with a rounded mouth made out of nail-picks of iron, akin to the ones used for prison escape that were highly peculiar in nature if not even worse than that, that were piled together like fags, for burning, and were banded with a stained leather bolted thing that was even uglier than before, and out of its; it looked like a cocoon rather, or a pupae, caterpillar-transitioning in butterfly stage brought to, which also hard worming figures that wore elongated cyst-dagger spear blades coming out of it, spreading along, being riddles with buds and flowering other-figures that were unrecognizable as well, that whispered in each other's ears. It was kept safe in its darkly strangled place, out of which it could not escape no matter what. But most importantly, in its darkest spot, it communicate with uncanny things, most of which, being of a kin that could not be communed with by simpletons, even if their likes' minds were to be directly projected onto them. Since they were tall and nasty and their lower bodies were wide as benches and filled with no legs but one giant tooth-incisor inch that kept them floating, and whose teeth, which, on top of their milk-bottle shaped bodies, were actually circle-like but see-through and held secret-bubbling demons that were trying, or desperately attempting to punch their way through in order to escape, whose faces had been cut off but that was pointless since the bubbles were being given life in the same way oxygen was being given like to and they were also visited by strange butterfly shaped lily pads that were deformed and cradles small parasitical forms that spoke to most of the false gods that were plastered and sutured together on top a spinning wall of colors that spoke to other people whose faces and heads were missing and were all spinning in circles, while being struck by their strange insulatory community, out of whose place they could not escape out of. Most importantly, one of them had a wild array of possessing-in terms of capabilities of destruction, wide array of distressing- in terms of the possible amount of mind injury it was capable of contracting upon a person if they were truly head and endlessly speak-talking backwardly to the weird-triangular headed, downward pointing pyramid whose back of the head, not only had it been added on the initial documentation that was, strangely so, delivered in the hall, as for the mad observation, or the plain see-through, akin to a mildly induced psychosis had actually bidden it to appear in a vision like urge of the mind-eye coordination that had almost managed to burn off the mind of the dark scepter's wielding power-light that had definitely –afterwards, destroyed his mind, but wore a goblet like top ledge that had a hole in it, like a vase, whose, on top of it, the side of the lower-surface, of the pyramid head lay a front wave-shaped hill like structure that had shot out of it, this, creature, whose peculiar head was placed, on a single foot, bodiless as it were, leaping about, bearing a beard of appendages behind the tip since the pyramid was tilted in a way so the foot was in the back, attached to the 'base' of the pyramid, if the pyramid was placed in Egypt, and the foot was actually inclined and didn't point entirely at the sky, only a bit, as it would be slightly pointed towards the Nile or some similar direction, mid-way through to the horizon.

Close enough to a nautilus head, it bore a mouth that was open-holed and drew out a few shove-your-foot-inside-the-shoe-horn's wrought in tongues that carried shaper scalpel shapes with it, drawing along a split in half crack that spread all the way to the top, where, out of this flat-surface, there, having come out of it, two horn-shaped eyes, that were solid and kept in place. They were shaded by a great shadow. And the peculiar pyramid had enough space on the top to house, at the back of it, the form being depressed and having curved like the top-of a base which inversely descended as to become thinner as it connected to the 'head' form that kept the small wavish hill-cartilage attached to it, but which looked like an upward heaving tuba. It was leaping around the hall, sometimes, having come here, or showed up in a desire to accompany its most peculiar friend, in the hunt of a simple minded man, that had to be exterminated as if he were a nigger-kike, readily put in a long-prepared rape-oven filled with fire lynch-ropes of fuck-murder.

'Sub-human rats, if allowed to continue unchecked, the Communism disease will eventually follow as well. The Jews are desperately trying to hide their subversion as well as their involvement in the Bolshevik and Menshevik party, even now, as they're desperately trying to hide behind the faked numbers put behind the Holocaust which under no circumstance happened. Their involvement in it serves as nothing short but a good pointer towards their incontrollable sub-human tendencies of subverting and destroying their housing nations as well as a dead-giveaway as to the fact that the kikes will never be capable of assimilating in their host nations. Their mere existence is a threat to humanity itself and needs to be stumped out of existence. And there can be no exception whatsoever as for allowances for any single one of them that could, should or ought to be allowed to live. Even now, their in-human existence reeks and seeps, as poisonously toxic as it is venomously injected in the nation's unsuspecting throat, into the very people among which they live and prosper on the backs of.

There can be only way to remove this Holocaustic-Judeo-Communism-Bolshevik disease, entirely, down from its very roots to the very core of its existence, that being, only when every single living kike will have been ethnically cleansed and killed, butchered seamlessly, within reason, by the combined forced of every proponent of peace, truth, and utmost all, decency. As it is one of the most compassionate things to do, as one will only know it as to be true in his heart, not by choice but by dutiful execution, that being, putting a diseased animal down, that's outlived its morbidly prolonged-existence.

Their lies need be brought to an end, their race, ethnically cleansed, castrated and made to waste in the filthy pits they have been bred in and taken out of.'

A stump seemed to be barely worked on, near the side of the road. Eighteen people were standing there, all bearing mountains on top their arched backs, being projected from where they stood, on top a branch they were looking at.

By then, by the minute they were turned towards it, trotting ruggedly, as their calloused gloves fell of their fingerless armed flintlock-shaped lower-growths emerged out of their caved in bodies, they had already been introduced to the company, hiding behind the dark-tree stung mass that stood behind it. Moist as it were, the branch had almost fallen over, being incapable of sustaining the stress that was being forced upon it. Various green but filled with moist filaments grass blades bathing it in a green tinted red, that had been spread among the finer rafts that followed with the march that drew alongside them. A few finer half-above the torso missing, but filled with dark devices, still, hundreds of dark-looking fiends with bowels of green-pucker gelatin, drew in, their general direction.

‘Lo’, you’ve come here in darkened land, but there’s nothing here to see, for all was wrought into a smaller flint.’

‘I stand for the right man has to do whatever he pleases with the body of a fucking bitch. Women are sexual objects meant to be wrapped in nice foils, then fucked by men. Women should be devoid of human rights. It is a human rights’s violation, to give right to women. Since they are not human, no. Women are under no circumstance human, no.’

A dark steelbox-green with blue-top crystal bars adorning it, the crystal that was made to pop on the top:

A few lanterns adorned a towering roundedness, a square with many appendages, warted with boils and pus, and many other things that floated around it. A gray canyon; filaments around it. Surrounded by humanoids, billions of them, forming a circle, holding hand in hand, heads missing. Instead of them, floating a few centimeters above their necks, pseudo broken apart cubes, transparent, one side of it was an almost oblong with a lined top that looked almost like the pick of a guitar in terms of deformations, a see-through tetrahedron with pseudo swimming boards, or elongated trashcans-trash cats noises coming out of them, that held inside of them skin-diamonds, with a single non-facet, a rounded skull-tiny growth sticking off one side. Animatedly so, were they trying, one another, the entire Country being folded in pieces they carried in their’ eyes’ hindsight, the sun as well, and a part of the Northern Hemisphere, and dark matter made out of – panes, Souls and furies, all of which had not only, for a single moment chose to move past their, stoppers.

A base of operandi had been established no longer than fifteen hours ago, hardly a matter of survival had it been before the others came in:

‘Who is the master of this globed dark thing that’s lain before us?’

Although, unlikely to be miss-told, were they not like rafters- such in desperate need of evacuation, were they brought near a K-I-L-L-E-R of niggers, the marching champion of dark-forlorn, the master of their gathering and the one responsible for this red glow that encompassed all of them, despite being incapable of distinguishing like from dark they cast:

‘Thee, the one that stands before us, out of our sight, immediately, leave!

Take whatever might not hamper your arousal, and walk yonder to a place that might be taken away from you, whenever as to claim a ruse, whenever as to face of long-awaited subterfuge of coils and bowels will I ask you this. When the time comes, I will have a slice be made and cut, through growling fornications, though damned might it be, of forlorn creations there shall be as slaughtered-scorn.’

And the bastard’s victims, whom were all placed on top the many altars, altered between one another, switched, swooned, turned away from facing one another, nor able to convey the least amount of information they’d say:

‘Lee of little regard, you should’ve covered our mouths. Since there’s little, tiny-tit no wonder, as to what comes after, if entreacherous enteach. If we strike a bargain with the one who cuts women’s feet. He of Sicily with high-regards, he shall give us all we need to ask.’

‘His realm is dead, his bold-end-world of deadly scorrough, large approach. You must be cast away or you shall feel your feet cast thus nakedly, and hid inside the pliers of a giant roach, through which you shall live to see the tunnel, thus may crawl.’

The man drove into the rickety truck inside a soiled sock, on the spot, his head was wrung out, bloated in disease- he was petty with lust and filled with unsanitary lots he carried all the way ahead in the lot of darkly-pebbles he carried inside his head.

While getting out of his great magnificently built special man-suit device created as a means of protection by the Beneficiary Hound, whose many elongated hound-heads chewed a few pieces of his shoulders, his back, his lower-side of the waist, giving him not only brain damage but severely altering the way in which he bled, now constantly run course out of his head and nostrils, that in turn made him into a beacon for the blood-hounded clot-stripped with large mosquito-beams of pearl-spades, rummaging the Blue-Ocean Cloud sky, fifteen hundred with only seven at the end miles an hour on a relative distance that hadn’t changed at all, God, wished them split in billions, creating a pseudo-swarm devouring just about everything that’s ever existed, in terms of aerodynamics, turning God into a wooden board that occupied the only spot that wasn’t theirs, not that they dared approach, slip, slip, slap, slap, hit-hit, and a jab, now bled had the man as well, out his bloated-fat grainy looking veins, doing so in turn had he, as had, he had altered God with markers of thought, ruining it, written as he did, his name in ROMAN SPQR Indian Numerals, with a feather, of regret, a globe-box on top hybridized into a spine-cord filled with many strange growths that spread around, many crowned by a necromancer-like eely-figure with dark spear-shafts coming out of his exposed-expectedly elongated veins, of shaft-pikes, that hit him, on the ground, the man, Basknbastard, had become his great conduit, ruler of the many put-together and controlled by him, now, swarms that were pinned on his back by disgustingly-hard-to-look at veined tendrils of tenebrous pus, green and yellow and blue, being fermentingly-tingly changed to a nauseating red, pus-green, verdure-never-been violent-magenta, distracting the moving crater that advanced in slowly towards the man with its elongated spiked entrained viscera pushing out pouting-outside through little pyramidal man-tumors with eighteen or so billion head-falchions, that were all put to the employ of the great-stratagems destroyers, under the rule of the mighty Emperor-magician of Quantum-apples Hye-Hyhichern, responsible of arm-wrestling Basknbastard to failure, shattering his bone, arm-pulled out of socket, then sent back home, reattached within the hour, flower, flowers were sent in a basket-case with roses-red, like the color of dead, death, having also brought to his barely hinged home eighteen people, Ghye-gh Issiho, Melks Tysh, Sohomobour Yyr?; Ear-wax Can-trax, Bore-Hohon, Leper-strike Sixty five, Leper-strike Sixty-four, Leper-tower eight, Alice the Woman, women, women, women, put inside a tiny, finely, flavor of the sea added to the room, crafted Clock-tower coffin, bowl-shaped with large piston-apples, surrounded by felines-demons with human Asiatic-faces stitched on top of them, part of the Empire’s pact, being broke by this act of war and termination, which granted Basknbastard the rite of passage through one of the darkest ages humanity’s hymen being broken through had to gobble-munch upon, as he tripped, mentally upon his sudden-but come upon the brow of long-awaited, worked on suffering he’s had to fight his entire life through, fueled by a nauseating mid-life crisis filled with cancer-lymph node shaped with spiked incisors shaped like nigger-lynch-ropes and niggers, depression, he could not get away from with the help of anti-psychotic drugs, nor could he do it with the help of aids alone, despite getting a few, that is to say, not necessarily drugs or the 'Drugs' themselves, as to refer to ecstasy but to anti-psychotic medication, his hatred for all having encompassed even that dark sea-of ranging thoughts of sea-faring driven murder-defilement, of butcherment drive-throughs, he imagined himself in, killing a rival gang with illegally altered, while also being dual-wielded with both his pinkies being raised, on both sides of his hands at the same-time, sub-machine guns, therefore creating a strange bubble-wrap in his head, or a dream's catching net, like one of their, Iroquois dream-catchers his neurons shot through, billions of them at the same time, joining him momentarily, as he paced around in place, being joined by, the land itself, which was now darkened as for everything that's even been covered into the darkest, most unsanitary things that had all of the sudden destroyed even the canyons themselves, turning them into a disgusting green-pus march he had to swim through. Vile people appeared to be living among him, who happened to be met by a strange expectation, that was ever so slightly unspoken of, neither from one point or another, there, to have been a chance for him to breathe through this acid that filled him with the maddest of elations could he see or have seen, at any point in his life, clearer than he did now. The world bickered with itself no longer. The ones that survived were pitiful, bowed and served him, through the majesty that was his bowels' cut, through one of the most insidiously hard to gut bears; drinking sordidly but as if he'd fast, at the last second's reconsideration he stopped himself, having unwrapped the last drop of wine off the side of his cracked-open, hid-in deposited wine-drop, of red-blue, acid-hue and glue, his teeth were shaped like horses, filled with eyes and with spikes, and with dark flames coming out of blow-out the top cigars. It was evident, that, he desired, even more than before, that which he could not have.

'Women, where are the women. I demand I am met by women, immediately, by women of all nations, as I want to be served, by these hussies that should bow down to me and take as one of the greatest rulers of mankind, that've ever lived. Where are the females, where have they gone?

I wish to be met by satisfaction, to be served by these moist, bitches. The damned whores that are to be used by me as I please, as I am owed, by this world.

The chief making creature-predator of blasted dead fiendish animals with eighteen heads, subservient to the land had drawn attention to itself as the echoes of the other word-i-ly spoken name's after-shouting-come after power-beam diseased rays follow-through of the most incapable to bear bodies that flew into sight drew open-fire on the darkies, hiding beneath the rafts, which were being carried above the forest by most incessantly insane creatures that were boulder-like in torso, legs beings giants caves interconnected by weird tendrils, heads being sprouted out of each other's darker, hardly a matter of looking at filaments, with dents in them, armless but with appendages coming out of the keg-shaped second-neck out of the innards of the 'torsos', strange heads. These strange-heads being kept above the second-leveled to the top clouds, near which they dwindled across and in rapport to. Like deformedly distorted clay cups, where some ancient good for nothing Greek woman had accidentally shoved her finger in-too-deep into the vase for too long, having ruined it so profoundly that it's become belt-stretched but without a handle, with a mold-spoon coming out of it, bearing many features that had been painted on top and all around the weirdly deformed curvature.

'Chief Pyeroqui, we need to leave without immediate notice! '

His jeweled-by insects eyes drew out of their strange blocky-melted tunnels, then withdrew in and out, then shot out glanced near the wild surroundings. A dark sword-candle was shaped feather came in terms of being horn-like in appearance, out of his broken-square-flat forehead, which dangled around when heat started melting the little sprangle of tear-drops that had washed his face ever so eerily as it did then. His mouth bore palm-stretched flaccid hanging insect legs, tongues of eighteen or sixteen centimeters wide-stretched, giving it a most cut-through both sides of his smile by a serial killer of an appearance. Its body were only four overlapping bellies, crawling on them he drew onward, akin to a gelatin sledge, with its four belly buttons being botfly-worms with the number EIGHTY FIVE carved in each and every single one of them. Niggers.

Many of kinsmen were trapped inside broiled pseudo cages, all hanging on tall-standing poles, comb-like barred to the side, welded to bigger, much wider bars against which they appeared to be brushed against, with every step of the way, there being another corpse-around pivot, garbling another side of the rotating beamed-sockets. Some twenty or so gathered around it, trying to eat from a lot they didn't belong to. A few more good Samaritans gathering the fallen over appendages, at least some from around the palms and the gray areas where the sub-humans appeared to sink their teeth ever to deeper into the lower-combs:

'They're getting drawn in like flies to dying cattle in a field of marches- where they don't belong, abhorrently dancing there.'

'Rituals, as the Keifs taught them, they know he's watching!'

Twenty hundred miles or so, upon some niggardish-nigger palms tawny black-nigger sacks that drooled upon their own salivating nigger-kinds, there rested the watcher. He drooped savagely upon what appeared to be a few fallen-over pieces, as of obtuse ships, white starred, splendidly drawn on top off as well, by some ancient runes marked for whose belonged to – nation's ancient standing, there, in front of them, luff-salute. Some arrowed back to the brazier head-rounded, elongated to both side goblet, upon a tiny veined by tendon stacked neck-'tower', that, if it were to be completely vertically rotated, would perfectly match the, held by justice's blind hand, whereas both ends held two distinct growths that could barely be seen unless one got extremely close to it. One of it was a normal body-sack with a lid-growth on top of it that was almost akin to a bottle cap, whereas the other was longer, dolphin like, and even filled with some pseudo stump-growths, like that of a human, in some case or another, whereas as its end, there stood no tail but a cabinet-cube growth with nothing more inside of it but some squirming organs that hid and drenched each other as they drew along-side one another, drenched by disease, as well. Both came from the blade-like elongated flying machine's rotating but frozen in place single wing that molded itself with the rest of the festering growth that laid by its side.

Fewer by the hour emerging before one of the females got brought by a leaf, her head being pointed down, alarmingly so, as she'd been seen before, unmoving and solid. Many of her already receding eyes being placed in a place they didn't belong to.

'Bring her down, I see there's a great potential in her that's yet to be carved in, give 'er the run of the mill as they say, since you know there can be only one man trashing her face in once we're, done with, as you would know.'

'I get it.'

Gas, one of the feathered, for limbs, no flight set in, incapable of, delightful as he was, there was nothing standing between him and the calcification of the lower-bones that entered him from the side. A few more men gathered around him, using him as a tool to cut her open in the broad-daylight.

A trunked thing that hid inside itself but walking proudly had been asked no more, nor lightly would it have responded if my unruly, and untruly so by ever-emergent pass-over trough, to have hid itself before them, as they came through dark a cloudless day. When rain was little if not enough to cover for whatever wretched pass-over could they make, in order to refrain from carrying on their corpses, when not called for, and not to ask for their remains unmet. They had their visage shown, to little wonder as the men whom called upon them, the ones that stood the night-over pass, with empathy lacked in such guise, as they would've had each other, trenches past. Were, to wilt, to have been buried but no apparel might've cast, upon their faced-together, as if must, were they of no reason, when the dead hour woken them up.

'The women, they've been passed over while we slept, many of them burdened and dead. I seek no contribution, yet I know of ill what is abhorrent of disease, to have it heard it still, but I kept it at heart, after witnessing it with my own two trodden eyes. I know the culprit, and where's it hit, his heartlessness that would've come as no, not without reason, as I'd see it, and cast, whenever I must, out of it, and whether I am trust, twas for a reason I've come to obey. Fiend, I'll have them made of you, but you would know that, how they drew within reason, out of the way, when I cast upon them glance.

When they hid in wretched, such disgust, as would I have it mourn; the Moors abhorrent, and yet they know of what little I tell them, wretched as they are indeed, wretched as they are in turn. Many of their perilous eyes, were as they might taken from them, by force of steel, and grabbing, forcefully glancing through plow and plod-through after. I seek no restitution for my task, yet I ask of what's been called, before and prior, if there must.

I seek to burry such lover as was kilt on sight, before my troubled hands were even placed on their breasted lights, as they flee, even now I see no reason within to ask again. I'm pained and troubled by what happened, yet I stay, and wail upon my handless cut, whatever troubled thing, my fingers are yet to be brought around it, harm of it, this very nature. Most abhorrently, I've followed on their tracks and seen the nature for the likes of me to have been brought in shade-of, and there I lay.'

For hours upon hours, for as long and as far as he descended, as reticent as he was and to his likes fended, set on part, to have been walked and carried on, with fingers dirtily curled around a horses' broken back, upon the path- of likened to himself, as he'd have himself carried, a broken vessel filled with such, but branches as the stick-bugs would have him mistaken for one of them. Upon a sea of green through which, the lightly broken seal inkling of little worth he carried in his mouth but wrapped inside a corded leather-pouch with a tiny speck of what might've appeared to be hole, he bit, down deeper and never gave whatever release one might or might not have, to ask. Of it, what little time he had before being discovered, they were seen. Through cities and through many of them, through which, as plenty as would, had been. Made to listen to as little worthless as there a noise; boisterous approach, as a man of simple thought, from somewhere across the road approached:

His little sight was deafened by what came after, a wog but dressed for parted forth, and came along, with wheeled up-front, on which his bodied-stretched benign, of little what was left of him, his legs, but wheeled, and arms down-back, and strode, through stride, ripped apart, with every curve that took away from him whatever there was left of mind:

‘May I ask for what little closure there is?’

‘You’ve been given an hour, and yet you return with what little there is, how might I ask, is there a chance for you to come again, bearing what we ask?’

‘I shall come whenever needed but no little as there’s still, nor will I look for countenance when there’s but little more than what I feel. Around my arms, no little and no darker than what’s wrought inside a calf of eyes, broken as one could have it, in apparel stalked, and taken into half, but cut, would I have asked again. When will I be paid?’

‘Only when we shall receive what’s ours, and only then, when pleased with our transaction, darkened bold, wilt we have cast it where to please, no longer swollen, no longer darkly mistaken or taken forth. We know better, and no less, but lo there’s such, and darkened lain, upon each press, we’ve seen the marks.’

He was presented soon after, as the band, from out the wagons, the eighteen hundred of them, wrought in chains and low-hanging off them, but darkened steel with seal’s filled bellies fat, a fear, lesser fright but swollen, as disastrous as it was deliriously sullen, one might feel its gaze, but gouged soon after, not by trail but solemn vow, as to endow what little there was to listen to him, seethe no less, as such duress is only saved for the most lonely that do listen when alone:

‘I seek but one thing of glory as to be proven alive, when time is come upon me to ask, and ask I shall, lend upon me what I desire, no less and no more than I require. A simple proof of my conviction that there’s still there to’ve been lain upon my handed arms, soon after, when, I, to have been brought onto it again, wilt I, and there’ll be. Wilt that I shall see reason if there there’d be, of lesser, such no cause, I’ll listen instead. If reason to have me wilt away with nothing in my hands, I dare not question, likes of eunuch chanting and will do no gross, upon your hindrance’s cost. I’ll take my leave with such defeat and what’s been lain, above and onto, above my feet. Will I seek no more and I take it as I’m let be known.’

‘Then leave upon immediate stance and seek us not be cast away or called upon, when we have only sekt armistice with a man of little mind who’d listen to no one but himself, even when worsened by each day but crackle, of what’s to come and drag us after, from the bowels of the earth, you’d listen, still but screech. Where’s my trove to be given? Yet beseech of us what little we have, of what we’ve taken off the land, eaten away, of little benevolence that’s been taken out our way, we’ve given more than needed, bred through distance trance. And when time is come onto us away, at the hour of which you’ll shower us, in leech of answer, in search but bridled with what little theft you’d hear there be, and come onto our way, then we shall pay with wretch in deed and turn, and scour whatever there is left of your body off this side of the earth.’

Wilt he was and walked away before any or either one of them could have him taken from the wretch of plow. The night filled with what little evil there was in the men retired, and was come upon the brow of the earth, to which but pulled inside of it as the many of them were, as little of the dark command, a mouth had whispered and had come to the great brow of the ground, whichever that be.

Great serpents, drakes and spiraled fiends, corpses put on top each other, and a necromancer onto all of their corpses, with the head of his master. A living head put on top the very great pile that ruminated on top them all, falling on top itself no longer casting away whatever glance of little worth there'd be:

'I see, I see, you've brought one among you thinking I would have his soul, taken of the plow-through fort I have been working upon when the hour of the kill, and the broadened upon, as I would feel us thus, of darkly there had been recorded discs of might and killed benign, I would have you all cast inside and feel what little wretch I would've, sullen as I were, to complain to this day, caught.'

But they didn't say a thing and had all lay confused. For this was only one of the chief niggardly creatures in servitude and anchored as to knight itself, and no longer have what little halvened mind one would have in turn. Corpses throned of little wonder spraying what paraded upon disease, was there cast, but one thing was certain, despite the giant ticks that appeared to be feeding upon themselves and itself was of little reason not to obey or prey upon itself, along the way, one would've known it.

'The head of the House!'

A man cast his glance at last, and understood, what little piece of ancient day, that mattered, whatever reason came but true after, just as little, would they, to have fathomed the corpseless souls that drew from the insides, yonder:

A soulless thing stood around a coruscated rounded curve of tiny thorns, many of them being barely adorned by what appeared to be, every fifteen or so of them clustered together, shaper points that didn't last. Barely tied together, came at last, from one of them, from hopeless growls, from the distance, with as little as a musky noiseless prow, that had happened to lay itself forth, come around, and on top its bent knees as one would stand protected from there is, of evil and what's done, of what judgment's cast upon it so:

It was no necromancer, nor was there a reanimator instead.

A poison engulfing veil of toxins appeared to coat his dark iron cast throne of barely kept together piles. Within the flash of a lightning's strike, as if November comings had wanted a laughened slap of wristened sips, the stage was become but completely coated in his weird almost ringed by chains longer-pelt he wore, on top the most disturbing of the screamers and of lightened sights, and gaze-through leper's dark tenebrous batch, a few empty corpses being released as they drew out of the smoldering pile, a few plates were made off their show-through corpse hangers, the ones that were strewn besides them.

'What's the meaning of this debauchery?'

The corpses were tallish, and handsome by contrast and filled with bile pudgy worm-maggots, although very distracting by the very contrast of the strange series of contortions that would very much so force any man in their place to cower at the mere thought of there being an unwonted alternative to death, as much as it could be said, one of the men that was present there, out of the crowd-made-into-devolved from a single, simple twentyish or so group of them that came along out of nowhere, one of them, being distracted by a passing thought went on a tangent about how much he loathed the presence of niggers, whom his shared hatred towards could not have been more peculiarly dislodged from the mind or cut out since, a few meters away from there, an entire water or by pouring rain soluble, as if they were marble caught in an attempt to withstand acid instead, tall-grazed by their sides with human elongated faces adorning their not only sides but as they proceeded to look in the general direction in which these mushrooms dangled, the lower protrusions that were instead, apparently toppled ropes of some kind, that had been reeled in all of the sudden, in order to put on a show of nigger-lynching, followed by a Coon-like song display played by a gramophone-unseen device, although unseen, seeded yet rooted in the most peculiar way, into the most desperate-deprecatory manner, of nigger-lynching manners, possible ways of doing it. A strange elongated appendage that sprouted from the ground with toe-cut, fingerless but a humanoid palm that drew out of the holes large ringed by chains, lynchings appeared to bear at the very least a lot of canoe-shaped niggers that had suffered for prolonged durations of time, although nothing could be said since, mostly, everyone was mesmerized by the fact, twisted by the fact that there were no niggers in the crowd either, a few clouds began pouring some acid, not to melt the mushrooms since their impermeability permitted them to avoid this ghastly thing that was the acid vacuum of dark penetrating laceration inducing incubation period endowed onto them as the niggers were not and had not only been alleviated from the eternal wait as for their passing to have been gotten through, but afterlife actively waited or delayed its punishment in order for them to be reanimated momentarily as to suffer even more at the 'hands' of acid, at which Horxin, the Patron saint recognized that niggers were not steeds but instead filthy sub-human simians that were worthy of as little as there was left of mercy, therefore, their suffering continued. Worsened by the progress of this rain, they were left unrecognizably maimed-charred, beyond the means of there being any chance to make something out of them, it was a situation that left them irresolute, and wide-spread on the ground. A height uncanny lain between them and the mushrooms near which they've been lynched by the side of. What was more peculiar in terms of how the physiology of the mushroom contorted itself, as well as to conform to the appendage's curvature in order to allow the acid drops to melt the bodies of the niggers, was the fact that no damage as sustained by these strange-forest muscle jointed things at all.

In the distance towards which was pointed by a greater servant whose head was even taller than the corpses, yet was brought. Upon the realization, this deformed mushroom top, whose body was a sea-cucumber sponged thing with many lumps, as if cut-by side within, its mushroom 'hat' whose head was a pawn shaped gurgling defiled cranium with whirls filled with citrus segments, as if oranges cut on either sides, encapsulated within, whose shoulder, as of the 'plant' were filled, and sharp as they were as blades of curved pads, shoulder-like but filled with bubbling growths that grew as plants. A single jackal-skulled head-deformation, with many stalactite-teeth that squirmed around, its top, was but a single imprinted boil, reddened with filthy blood, its eyes but blind as to what's it seen or what was greeted by, of thin-end cloud:

'IT curled, the ship, curled. I saw the blimp pull all of them in, the city, the people, they're in.'

The city belonged to it, now, with every curling bow-legged rope that drew them on, through window and through sill, through skull, through head, through soiled scream. The children, the animals, the creatures whom had rose; the ones that died in the cemetery and the one whose bodies froze; and we were there to see it all undone. To hear the lightning crackle upon their ends, withdrawn; until no man, no living thing was left. Until there was no insolence to be drawn from breath, again. We were left inside, trapped in flight, worship of benign. A few bars sullen pounded at the heights. Of course there was no living man, alone, but set in sight. Of flightless drawn, a stall of metal-crafted trough, be gone as everyone, through seethed pipes, they landed on the ground and all had died, leaving only but a man alone. A single pit-formation made of them. But all were puckered, left to rot:

‘Come to me, as I am brought!’

Onto him, the ether of the air, he spoke and only saw but fittingly, a single darkened-ended hole. A pit of disillusionment but calling, onto him again, approach; do not show shyness for they might take you for a broach, to wear. And fear what might come after, twas’ but said:

‘There’s only a few feet left for you to trail and follow, and the fall of foliage there’s cast to wallow in, if squirm alone your wont of said. Wordless anchors, of more but said; you need to take no more refuge and leap down there, where the bodies wait, underneath to ruse.’

‘What’s happened to them?’

‘Glorified anchors, as many of them had become, they only drag what’s left of the bloated thing above us down. Where the storm comes, the greater one, only once strike of light and just as well, all should be but thoroughly gone. With as little as a swollen cysted tomb for countless corns to finally pop; they’re unprotected, as are we.’

‘Show yourself then, if that’s to come. If there’s no chance for either one, show yourself to me before I die, before I cast myself through such uncanny taw as they shall have me after!’

Weather balloons appeared to be wide-spread, as for every corner that was out there, pouting but with disappearing leds. No fewer men than in-between them, hanging on by basket held. Their arms but rotten, everywhere; thrown but tawny, yawn as if no less was heard; through morrow yet disturbing parts of them, whatever was left uncut-cast away; inside but lain, then devoured by the little munchers in the baskets, with their little pincers’ anchoring that wouldn’t say:

‘We need to stop them, stop them immediately from doing that, from all that would be cast and all would fall apart, if they do it.’

‘Then what will have me do? Will you have my life be taken as I leap and join my brothers in death? Would you have but lepers cast, from basket, lain? In no other place can they fall, and if I do as such, they might follow the trails and cast their pincers, lodged away, into the hoses, climbing with each step, but tawny, trying to get themselves but in and rancid.

‘You must try to find away to cut their path, prevent them from jointing themselves, part to the clouds. If they do it, we shall all die. If you fall but soon after, I can promise you that you shall no die. And join not them, but live forever as I say.’

‘In a world destroy.’

‘Where resources are scarce but at the very least, you shall live another, at the very least, swollen day, and do as you please and never cast but fist towards a place that might steal away and take that wilt your life betokened to, and lay awake through endless nights.’

‘But I shall be alone and I shall flee to sight, or get a hold of any man, and I shall beg, eventually to be slain. Why not end it so, here and there, with strike of light, that I may join them by all means, whether it be by fall of wrung out fight?’

‘That is not something you desire, and that as much I can tell your for I’ve seen it happen long before, when the Earth was in youth and the fiends that were lain again, therefore more, could only do as such but yell.’

But they had bore one another once again.

A cysted bead- an abdomen chitin, with a few cords sprouting off its back and an elongatedly deformed sprawl of shapes, all blackened like a scorpion’s rotten, then burnt to crisp, hacked upon by slashed cysts up-rooted shafts and faced with many, all that gathered about inside the bodies of transparent headless bodies yet of mold. All gravitated around. But a single pale man, with white clothes, whose eyes were socketless, whose glow was flashy and out of which there came greater arms, forming a single appendage that was just as pale, and was made four by four, by four by four, as arms and forearms and palms and elongated fingers that were all unattached to him, but eating what they could, floating in the air, obscure, joined by the little insects that’ve been formed out of the bodies of the men absorbed, by the great, giant, colossal figure in which they but tore their bodies apart, molecule by molecule until were gone.

The servant returned to this pile, communicating what was being done, in the distance.

A few corpses, down there, down the well, beneath him were foragers. Made known and aware of the ins and outs of this most soluble thing that was a nightmare to beheld, or stare upon. Against the passing winds only a few minutes prior to them going all the way down there, lowered by a patch of land that was rounded-lumped with a saucer-dog-head mold with a top mount on top of it with many rose-bud shaped eyes, that was belong lowered upon hundreds upon hundreds and thousands of daddy long-legged- sea-cat whisker-shaped tubes with dark dust-drowned faces that puked gas, regurgitating it chokingly, out their nostrils of dark-submachine gun hole-shaped riddled hole-base-spread texture filled, rottenly eaten by elongated spiked worms, that passed through them, by mechanical arms with belts of leather and Cyprus-shaped tattoos of power, when one of the foragers pulled out his scythe, only to begin hacking his fellow foragers into pieces, going into circles as he performed a ritual of burial at depths, his brothers now be dead, when all the sudden, there he stopped, popped in place, a cup was brought out, where to pearls, were in chocolate-dirt, he drank the soils. On his way down there, his master forgot to call, upon him as to there, return.

But lo, there was one that stood doggedly in an attempt, caught and distraught, in order to be heard, something that others could not have attempted, prior to being brought onto question, fading were the lights that followed after, a few pints below and rafts that were sunken in the land of corpse-a-lure.

‘A few more jittery fellows are lost, sir, what shall we do to ‘em?’

‘Throw them in the pile with the rest of them, you dumb buffoon and I told you not to bother me when I’m the thinking-zone, you dumb, insolent little puffy-put chaser!’

‘I’m sorry sir, but innit a thing of wonder that we found ourselves entertaining company?’

‘I don’t care about your rumblings over the fire-tart-pop, you insolent, ignorant, unfathomable thing; can’t you see that we’re already referring to yet to be dead folk, with their faces melt, in places such as fire’s end has little hope in store for them?’

‘I still don’t get it sir.’

‘You, fine, then I shall put it in some way you will understand. Those people that will by then, the time you will have brought them to this point of no return, that are with us, will not be with us any longer, but deep down a dark rotting ravine, buried in their scented whatever-comes-prior and after the first man’s death’s driven release, with a foot up their racks and a pint down their needles and their valuables brought onto my desk so I may stamp them and deliver them to the nest where they’re to be fed onto the rat-handler. Is that clear enough for you, Pocs?’

But there was something he didn’t plan for. Although one not inclined to think otherwise, he was, by all means ignorant to the whole affair. Those piled up corpses only piled themselves highly above, and to such a higher level that foul play could be suspected as having taken place, mostly because they had ladders in them, worn-out ladders in, not on, inside of them, their guts, that sprung wide open revealed variously leveled intricacies of wind-mill extractions; that surmounted, but none the least to various wings and spry intoned sound-makers whose bell-clicking echoes and various ‘post-mortem’ edificaries only made everything worse, since they also had large piston-beams of tallish standings, with flopping wildly heads, at their ends, with long drift-shots of gusts, on their sides, revealing drone-puffs of vacuum-drowning varieties, that started churning in the very substance the walls around them were made of. Spring-towers, summer globes of winter-making, trading arms cut and stored in bricked black wires, as well as, potential eaters whose bodies were riddled by flintlock-parasites of some mechanical type that maintained a steady chewing pace, whose propagation against the roundedness of their forms only added to an irresolute bastardity as to be unknown to them whether those fumigating corpses were of their side or not:

‘Whom do you stand by, creep?’

Not a word, still, they approached, now that the chaotic flail had ended up ruining and bringing down a good side of the walls around them. Not to mention the most bastardly of rams. That were standing still, since it was the night down there, and they could not more. He had been right, the bastard, they took all of the corpses out within the hour, and they played with them, the bastards. Put them on top of one another, ‘cleaning’ them, in the most precarious manner, stacking them so they would appear different. Greenish, reddish below, somehow flat, - tubes but condescending tubes of fat-girths, all wrought in different ways, winged, winced, twanged, or stitched all around, with ostriches of iron staring down on them, with giant eyes protruding out of their chests, out of which the bloated murk fell on the ‘floor’, the fake one that was cemented out there, in the outdoors. A dark muddy green segmented the entirety of the plateau. It was a filthy thing to behold, or to check every squarish plate for the lights. All of them had those things, with them either being flares or some unnatural hinged rounded green-flashy untouchable beads, that made way for the other insignificant panoramas that stretched over the wide distance, far-few black-mountains holds that had been raised. They dark-stoned, stacked together like ziggurats, with flat surrounding two meters high-raised fences surrounding not only their general encampment but the surrounding black sea that was of the same stone and flatness as the rest of the encased surroundings. Against them stood miles of nothingness but the darkly wrought sky and the eeriness of flashing pillared piles, whose red, green, and even blue shades- twisted, squirmed, jerked eerily but within the hour they stopped resisting, calcifying under the weary gaze of the gravediggers.

It came out of nowhere, and inquired as much of the sudden change in alignment that had occurred since the last time they were here.

‘We had to move them back.’

One of the grave-diggers answered. He was stared down by this giant eight feet tall, empty torsoed, as it was shaped almost as to be used as an open gate to pass through, whose distorted features almost made one forget that its wretched head, this water-bottle fat helmeted device of many wires and many nails, many unnatural things that wailed, even faces, of as little as it could be seen of them, but given the fact that it was carrying two giant boulders on its back at all times, one would be too frightened to inquire:

‘Have you?’

‘Of course I’ve made up my mind since then; it’s been a long enough time, hasn’t it? I think I will find it most appeasing if the corpses were to be delivered onto me and none other.’

Pafff! A choice had to be made, one that would dispel every thought as to what happened and what ruined them when night was come, and with all rumor gone inside the lower tunnels, there would be not a single man to spare a single pail as to share in this throve they had granted themselves, as this would only lay on the verge of being caught red-headed, much appeased and done with, in ways unheeded, days unending, where and only when was there time? As one would share whatever left of his corpses, begrimed, with just as little bottled throat and head, inside the mountain that was bodiless but filled aloof with plenty bed. Every living thing recalled, as they would drag themselves by death alone, revived. Either through necromancy or through spool of thought, when brought onto a hall of levers in which not a single one would know what to do or how to lay, delivering the commands onto it through spoken quail. An inert moving object came into view. In the middle of the room, raised by a platform, is sinew. Covering everything by the looks of it; especially this tall crook, this tall barren structure, pillar-but contorted like a desert-tower, tree, with a face at the top, bordering a wagon-ed train’s steam producer as the slit at the top gave onto the impression that it was a body-suit some consideration, as a single contorted plane-wing lay, opposite to it, as an arm contorted, two appendages come out of a single opening-like that of a barrel. They might’ve been taken for a spider’s incisors in any other good day, but this wasn’t one of them. And upon a flail of many lamia tails it drew out, slowly moving as the fin-like wing revealed itself as to point back, forming dark-winded blue-like spoils, many toils of wreathing cords, transparently see-through, melting so-suddenly yet lassoing themselves as to signal the entry of the tails upon which it crawled.

Drunnelligh Seigh

Fifteen years on and off it’s how they’ve done it, to a point where it didn’t make any difference whatsoever whether or not there they did it on purpose.

A flash of lightning appeared to have arisen him from slumber. 'Twas followed by a sheer-heap of blinding flashing lights that had drawn a curtain upon their broken faces, as he awakened them from across the floor, where they've been placed like a cradle filled with toys being not only unwrapped but completely rustled out of the rushes of his finger's tips when finally revealed.

Trails across their bodies as they've been violently cut to such degrees and proportions that one could not purport what had been happening to them at all, or what's been trampling over their incessantly rotten bodies after being displaced on the target-plates that followed soon after.

Every single man opened, as they hid giant flea creatures inside of them. But they were two-fleas each, two and aghast-forward thrust out of one another as if they used their lower-bodies as their shells, like crabs coming out of them, revealing tiny body-punching-bags that pumped but they were not those things, not boils but the lower sides of their jaws that connected to their upper region as to form strange clenching elongated illusionary flea-coves. Highly parasitical and made to be, from looking at them, like some fallen apart pieces that would squirm, that could be placed on the floor and unite, forming a great formation of wriggling-fleshy pseudo appendages that would stick out, since the rest of their organic structure was highly compatible as to have it connected to one another's, as if they were puzzles, but the connection, this suture, once done, would be slightly superficial, as they weren't the type of fit together permanently, now would they feel the cold that entered the house. A pair of windows were open, out of which the gloomy cast of voiceless gusts, that had followed on foot-trails as well as the empty quails of the bigger bodies that were in the distance, floating and standing on top the wriggling rails that had encased, chokingly-wrapped around each and every single one of the clouds, forming green-spiraling gas-holders that revealed not iron, but some weird glassy containers that had been artsy made- from failure to failure until no longer could one sit there silently and accept what had been ruined, or have realized what their art pieces had been turned into, since they were mainly crafted by men, whose life-long lusted for highly-expressionate pieces of résistance had been maligned, at the tip of which, even the leader of the crowd felt an ever-growing resentment-driven fury of soliquity's edge-quietly expressed remorse, at the sight, of this sin-induced and driven forth, heartless, yet remorseless, without the least amount of countenance momentarily withheld, as his attention spanned from one point to another, rearing each and every single one of them from a path of redemption to another one of circumvention, while the herrings-red had flipped, and sunken, deeply, as their teeth, brokenly departed from the least amount of people whose soulless husks had darted once the first blow, the smoke-entrained coal, the breaking of the sky, the tender realization that their time has come and death had spared but little, Californian's ride ticket's lightened fastened belt upon the sight's drawn reigns in order to cut-your-losses-after-seeing dream's vanish street-one more time, since the brokers scammed you and they ruined your art, to the point of bastardization, the clouds being polluted to the point of the Global Warning being flashed- an article on the NewPoerker's Times'- artist creation, shifting the blame on these fucker, these fuckers ruined your sky, these fuckers aren't actually working at all, they're lazy, lazying around on the state's money, begging and stealing, instead of working a real job, since it's only what some people want to do, enjoying working, for their sake, so should you, since they, the people in charge, who pulled the strings were also responsible for everything that was wrong into the world as well as the unnatural thing that was the swinging back and forth strange carrousel-ride seal-deformed horse-ride that was enjoyed by the men, whose inner fleas elongated giant empty limbs, since it was pretty obvious past a certain point in time that they, these disgusting creatures, were like-corpses that hid inside of them, only the most unnatural of things they could. Body bags? Nah, only the marshes-thin!

A giant chitinous creature had been impaled on top a dark stick with many faces, its green-appeared being caused by nothing else other than some unnaturally-dark twist in fruition.

One them screamers that come after you when you close eyes inside the closet that's closer than you, closed itself when it turned out that it or they were being approached by one of the tall, leaping around like monkeys-rapists with crowns made of spool white KKK-look-a-likes that were stitched together to their shirts but weren't shown to be actually masks but have shotguns attached to them with eyes, large ones, bulby with fingers that were come out of their lower –unnaturally defect, by nature, as in born, pseudo-stump limp lipped-as in growths placed across the entire circumference by the looks of it, of the iron-deficient little giants that were grown out of their wombs, these non-humanoids that were eyeless but maintained their cogs, which, upon being implanted inside of them, activated a long series of events that would eventually bring their eternal ethereal damnation-filled meditation that would fill their limbs with peculiar growths of skinned but allowed to bleed themselves to death afterwards, then stitched, yet not alive-self satisfactorily induced deaths; starting with the unnatural amount of bubbles they all bore inside their hearts, a lot of particularly tiny-puffy pudgy air-bubbles that were all, apparently not only part of one another-internal-workings since their bore tiny microscopic tubes that established some kind of connection between them that was highly distinguished to the level of an academician's woe, since he couldn't help himself but stare in admonition at this almost black-hair-like mosquito curly thing that was made of one piece, like some aneurism by the doctor worked for-drive through the genitals in order to save a patient from death kind of weird that entered all of them, but at the same time, since they were frozen, the baubles also stood the chance of having power-arcs being thrust, bouncingly, against each and every single one of their walls until they finally popped out of existence, then shot in every possible direction, to a point where the entirety of the body would simply explode as if pulmonary driven explosives would shoot out of this, unnatural conclave they formed together, written at sub-organic level that helped, in some way bring the next induction of power into existence, although the blood that they did not only part with since their hearts had become unnaturally deformed blood-clot-filled with but kept into strange tinder-box-shaped lockboxes, with rusty-gritty filled with windless abodes of powdery homes, brought by previously being shot through all of their chests from a grenade-shrapnel, explosion, these things kept all their heart's bloody mass from reaching the mid-point cluster, where the deformities of hopelessness appeared to be intruding, even now, upon the other fragmentations of organs that worked together in order to get rid of the liquid paranoia that had entered them, as such. The first event in the series threatened to destroy them to a permanency that prevented, without a doubt, from ever there being a chance of them being brought back to life, and such was it that there was a carelessness they didn't regret not dealing with, in the outward-fashion they displayed their uncaring for how much hurt they would enact upon themselves in order to bring as much pain as possible to the point of no return for their cut off pain-nerves and neuroses, wide-spread, as they stood or were found, initially, on the street, making snow-angels with crabs near them, dancing, with blood pouring out of their man-shaped skull-shells sockets. As they painted all in crimson, there.

'The streets, the streets, the streets, the streets, they're all put on ramps, just as I justly promised you they'd be, and the best part of all, no one even suspected a thing since the workers were all allowed to snick in during the night, without venturing out their designated areas to pleasure themselves with some of the nastily-dysfunctional city's daughters that were clearly placed there as neon signs in order to screw me over and my business because they knew, my enemies that is, what I was planning on doing, ever since I left the great mountain area of Irkson-Tottle, having made several arrangements that were clearly, clever enough by their own account, finely guarded by my secret guards, they thought themselves master over it, yet incapable of properly dealing with the informants that were almost a step ahead of mine, readying themselves at the command or signal of, the key, that would unlock the safe, which was carried over hundreds of miles in uncharted enemy territory, benign-evenly by the fluctuations of power as they banded together, the entirety of the opposition, which turned the general population against my, my friend, but I feigned my death and survived for long enough despite having all of my limbs blown off by nuclear-grenades and dogs. A lot of dogs whom have collected my remains and if it were not for my desire to protect my assets, for the noble purpose of preserving the one micro-biological face eater that would by other means kill all life on this succor-distraught a planet, I would not have made it through.'

'Then what is to be done about them in that case?'

'About whom; if not for them? Well if not for them, then there would be no means of blending in, having driven all of them to insanity, I managed to buy myself enough time to make it so I would face no consequence for my actions whatsoever.'

There could be an insurgence going on at any moment, especially when least expected. And where there was one happening, many more would follow soon after, that was the only despicable truth humanity needed and could only deal with, unaided.

And there was no easier way to put it without appearing to be too, forward. No, that would be too easy, far too plain for someone like him who was a tad far more outfetched than every single man of every other countenance that has ever been, or who's met him, at any point in his life, bludgeoning themselves by sophistries of never-having-been-capable-of-understanding what made him so special in the first way yet always being aware that they were in the presence of someone who was far beyond them, and they were beneath him, as if, despite their comically-adjusted backgrounds, as well as the high hopes and dreamless, almost vaguely met inquiries that've been made behind the closed-doored absences of the crushing of the notes in their private desks, decks, rooms, archives, plane-chambers, the room-shaped chamberlains that were put on top of rolling boulders, which were attached to the great wings that spanned across one side to the other, in the most disgustingly disturbing hard-to-look at olfactory yellowish triangle, which was their source of power, placed in the middle of the palace, out of which, the chains, these horrible chains that came out of it held every other room from falling apart into the world, the abyss being a pucker to them, which only grated the hard surroundings, which could and would not give no man the solace of standing by its side when lest unaided would be realize that he's been had by them, the masters, who, were incapable, very much so of properly understanding what was it that made or turned this strange figure that had ventured into their house and also got out of it, untouched as if it hadn't even mattered at all, nor would've it have mattered until he dared leap out of one of the rooms and through the flooring, pulled each rib and every piece of the Janitor, whom was devoured, just as quick, by the many dreadful insect's spread and the ones that had accounted for the bothersomeness whose infestation was mightily prolonged as well; for they knew as little of him, found but no actually useful information on his background, his family history, whether or not he had been a noble as he claimed, whether or not it was important to ask, don't look, don't say, don't pray, or he will come after you when the night's come onto the finger's tombs, then watched would he be, for reasons one could see that there was a simple thing, that was still, missing, although the difference was, lest of all, unfathomably quick in doubt as to be disregarded by what was happening now, inside their mansion, since they've gone missing, as, most importantly pronounced, did their most valuable confusions that were projected as to the allure of the epitomical villain of whose belonging to a categorically unfit, yet deceived by everything and just as little as they would seethe as and during their final moments when met by unruly death would they count no less on their senses, but still ask themselves, with such impressions still being imparted onto them, as anyone else would have them, by all means driven to extinction, then wanted, waned, and there-yet-fore, there again, ‘Why, why was he so smug?’ and what gave him the right to rub it in our faces after that? Were the many questions they carried with them even past the most bothersome ventures no other nomad would have one tell, or yell at. There was no need to intrude just yet, since he had returned for a reason not even he could endure such a luxurious reason as to stall a temple’s knock.

‘Fuck-shit-rape.’

Closely at hand, one apartment appeared to be anything but left behind, or worked upon, welded in and blandly struck.

‘My lord, I think we’ve handed ourselves a ruin, in such crime foretold and blandly held in rhapsody withheld by them, whom look upon us in countenance foretelling. I seek but reason to take something that’s been drawn away, I seek but reason not to seethe for long and listen to the songs of mourning that I may be lain from thereon out, from halt then wither, and come upon the stinker. Otherwise, I shall feel no bothersome filter that might be taken away. To this I lay a reasoning foretold, and they wilt it forgotten.’

‘I know, I know, they don’t make those things like they used to. And I think we’re both familiar with what I’m talking about, right?’

‘Certainly, sir, but.

I cannot stand it. It’s making me feel as if, I’ve lost something. I won’t be able to pick up on it any longer. It’s a shallow feeling I can’t shake off. It’s turning my guts inside out and, for the first time I’ve come to the realization that I may not be able to do these things forever. I’m a broken machine; I’m trying to extend my lifespan as fast as I can, but time is catching up with me as well as it does with you.

Even the names started being lost along the way.’

‘No man can help it, unfortunately.’

‘I’m aware of that.’

The grotto called for the Sleigh, and it would not wait for the beast to allow for another prod to be taken from this very slithering eel’s run upon.

‘Your servants near one of the wild machines, the ones that are broken, what shall we do about it?’

‘Only one of them can bring destruction in my solace, the paradise, when the last perfidious night’s approach shall venture forth, the Solstice’s come upon, and celery of wretched coil that follows day obscure, thash shallow!’

A single semi-circular bodied flying clipper-like contorted, with a head holding the two downward-pointing openings that held some of the chitinous leathery meat that hid some of the organs in, whereas its right 'arm', the curvature that pointed towards a solace in the dark bore a fraction of a few hundred shoulder-like formations, holding the only appendage even vaguely resembling some kind of simianesque hand, whereas one great growth arose from it, like some unnatural towering bulbic nose, at the tip of a candle-bodied flaccid pads of cones, that being said of its inter-organic structure, on the opposite side, naught but almost open bone and starved, static and incapable of moving from that angular arc. Whereas the head that stood on top that 'hill', elongated fat, like some wildly deformed blob-fish, but almost canine- in the front where the skull diverged. A resting globe for an eye, whereas its left one was kept elongatedly out as if out of a 'bar' that was another bone. A portcullis or a gate, being spat on by a blob-like head; it, this wretched one, gripped but welded yet on top the one half collar, whereas the meat only drew back inside, shouldered by the many bricks of meat that were very much alive themselves had drawn itself up on sight.

'Half chompers, the garden tool has arrived!'

'Mockery? You fool, I shall not have myself insulted near the place of promise that's been withheld from me ever since the day I've come but yet arrived!'

So much insolence from one of theirs, that was unacceptable, from the point where naught would think and naught else; of the same breed. A little head, a tiny one with legs crippled yet moving wildly yet ahead; that wretch of no howl, that wretchedly disembowel; whose little crowd of the maligned, all but raised the purgatory-like heat, onto the den of pleasures towards which they marched!

'You are filled with fat and terror but you shall not spoil this day if we could have, not while we're so close ourselves to breaking the gates!'

Said the champion HG'

It came to it then. They would have to ruin his very bones and the only place he stood in, that ugly, much deformed, unkind place he had nested in while waiting, in mockery, in waiting, for the dangerously hard-to-bear assault to begin while from the sky, across every single spot that ever existed there being hundreds of large barrels filled with bloody-coated in gelatin skulls as well as other bone-like remains in which the children of Hg, the ones hiding with nothing other than some ugly, much to themselves or to their point, deformed heads where they stood and stooped, contorting while knocking on them in order to slow down the growth, that was already underway of the outer, many winged bodies that were clearly bastarded, up to the point where naught would do but this filthy of eyes and sharp finger-like defiled munching upon one another hardened cried their in-peach torn apart bodies had.

He and them, and Jonathan and they too and him and her, that person over there walking backwardly on his arms while at the same time balancing the entirety of his body weight, drenched in sleazy-sweat from hours of hard-jogging against the windmill's forestry gusts of pine, while bolts of Rhine with German songs', one German song in particular, sung by some radio inside some car, Erika, they remembered that, they, who cast a perniciously disgusting large-fifteen meters tall, ten miles on a radius of five to six meters falling off -limb' made cast of shades that painted the surroundings, which were tall palm-like trees, with their tops being humanoid-disgusting heads, that bore large top-arms holding beacons of clot-blood, that permeated the blooded-coil that was made out of various, caught in their own trap, Blood-Mongoloids, the Wretched Hemathose-Homophiles, kings of Ehga, malnourished by a mountain caravan of bodies being brought, ebbing for the release out of this broken world of pain they've been cast into, without being asked, they, the people whom were watching, warring, betrayed-yet slain-by faultiness caused by lack of prescience as to make one aware of what was going around him in the future-yet-to-come, willingly but not by fury's scoundrel melting point of never-yet hindered insolence, insinuation of some defecation perched through by the illiterate come after whom had been entrusted the safe-keeping of, as well as the countless generations that followed in their footsteps, their nastily disjointed, disgruntled puffy-hairy large-mosquito curved elongated hairs the thickness of a wrist with little people attached to them, wrapped around like fine-presents on a Christmas's eve, coal tarnished wrapped around-heaved to their likings, many such men showing insolence, to them, the devils-wearing your skin-shoes, upon a simple daylight of November's fifth day's secondly mistaken as it's been written down, with every solstice missed by Easter's sixteenth's Equinox in filth-surround, they, these things, these wretched ugly creatures and beings, ugly not merely in thought, ugly in wretched command, wearer of hooves, who yearned for cheerfully sublime release, out of the cysted crystal of priceless bastardity and grim torture, inside of which, billions of miles lifted above a land, kept away from release, held by rusty-yet hinged, torn apart- stung, yet chipped, with colors of bluish-red, hiding in cask, in cast, inside but taken from and out of, corpses made of light, protectors, flying still alarmingly in stare for the land beneath them was mainly covered in broken-bones and other unsanitary abodes in which grayish humanoids had made the homes of, hung their flags, made bases, barracks and large towers that stood watch over countless eons, after humanity not only died, but had moved away for some time now, cranish in apparel, cast of chains, niggardly, a barrel, appeared out of nowhere in the air, to their condition cast in stone, despair, a shout echoed through alarmingly, as were the people unaware of what was happening, the invisible chested giants without their lower sides, flying as well as the glowing corpses, without their lower sides, all, but nonetheless, maintained the high-altitude and the right angle around this circle, beauteous flowers of shining blocked the cypress, were the nuns gone? Loft-obliterate, as the many prisoners, whom I would dare refer to as my ancestors now are only drawn on sight to blaspheme and counterfeit my last and lessened heart; while the crystal drew up-front towards the ceiling that was a domed-fell upon the land – liquefied but solid sun, which had petrified each creature that resided into space, the ones that were fossilized or eternally entrapped, delighted by hope and such was there, the last of the free, a direct legacy, a lonesome creature of no fault in mind, immortalized, but fashioned of the many bloody urges – kept under control, as any other man would have his soul, betokened to his rightful home, that of his purity, bequest of no release, the land out there, especially the sky being of a red-block, hardening of black smoke, and slowly becoming eternal-like the night of many ghoulish scum and tongues, which now appeared, lingering in fright, adorning none other but fashion of subtly was there a light. But no one approached the king, bearer of legacy, blood-line. For they were brought from elsewhere, and were mangled by mixing with lesser ones; such were they forced into caves and maintained but little relationship to the only man, of brave-yet soul, adhering to his gods, abandoned of no lest be sought inside his home, and bothered not by their absence, he wrought himself into the cold, surround.

Near them but only during the solace's one second that almost passed in an instant, during their reign of laceration and the embrace of evil distributive force uncannily-set-last resort that's come out of the confines of the malicious space of empowering dark scythe-like blobs that entered one another as to form their chains upon which they flung and stung- through a boat's laceration's song and ever-present as to be abhorred by the passing of fifteen consecutive days of unobtrusive terror, congruous torture by means of chain and pain, and a piano whose keys are incisors that would bite off their nails and hands and arms, continuously regurgitating what they've eaten along the nurturing abode of spiels and of cantor's largely come onto them moved upon the slaving hundreds of legs the Obituary was being carried upon, the cruel-cruel but without a cure allowed to drool upon itself like a spool of wool, seeds-chirping with slithers that hadn't been allowed to cure the venison that had been cut and delivered by the primitive ghoulish demons with no eyes unless in possession of some ocular devices that would allow them, otherwise to continue among their brethren's cruel trajectory, whereas and within a hundred or so meters from the distant yet clearly; the flails, the flails were not meant to stalk, to move along or twitch, a twat of a culprit's towel rotten and just as many dead-forgotten, slither-gotten, since none to be rotten as they followed only what appeared to be a pail of many figures that ascended yet remained openly-open for reprimand, as to allow whatever satisfaction that might've been had be yearned and lustfully taken away from them from that point on and until the last of the fasting-rottenly prevailed and have left the world in the wretched state it was to be driven in, through the drivel of the broken crowds, the dead ones that followed all around, and the people of little time left of their lives that followed in paths uncanny, their succumbing juiced filling the fluid bags which rose, anchored only by ropes that trailed and flails of train-like structures that succumbed to age, all added to the insolent grave from which the abhorrent most cumbersome of pails that coughed, with many pudgy arms and left legged appendages, that reminded one of man-mankind, or what was once some ounce of trespass, what was once the ancient ballad that had called for him to return to life during the age where he might've prevailed upon the elements that had abhorred being cast upon him and upon the slithering trunk that had fallen apart, beyond salvation or what might once be called, nor his, of such tender countenance foreboding as he'd have it, even in a minute during trial, never-call, treason by un-many, lesser viles; that had come around equipped with trenches dug upon the piles they had carried from afar, miles upon miles upon stretches that could not be recognized by any means, of such reprieve as they had yet endeared, yet endured, mourned for what had been happening, for lesser countenance turned the lesser men in graves, those who raised only did so to aid them in their war, to supply each mount that was entrenched and carried, rope by rope, worm to hop in trough and carried, from the land of snivel and any man would do but still if asked, not to mention what was done to them, that had maimed every single one, the casks, out of podgy grooves, and empty skies, through their tombs, filled with – such were surged of each dye in which they bathed, thought not one could explain the colors that were dictated out of war, not a blissful soul, if there was any, to point out what they had been robbed of; not a single one to this vague-cylinder day to have been cast upon the wagon mast, or to recognize to whom they were bringing this strange tool of dirt to, or why, of such contemptuousness being met only by chance, only whenever if whoever it was behind each mask, that laughed and cackled at them pointing, and various cajoling figures that were since found, mourning, for the losses they carried in logs, behind their backs, carried by ropes, full to the errand's brought upon the sight and mass, but the bodies plenty rotten appeared to be in forbearance of no scent, nothing too abhorrent anyway, that would be the cause, or to have been tarred with each and every slither of a mass, one would be aware of it; yet the hard countenance of every dark figure that passed, how tall they were, the giant-tall, the ones most wretched that had their arms, appendages and legs, and other figures beneath them, immediately seen death through hundreds of lacerations, though no finger lifted, leg hindered, lowered-so, not a single movement to be seen or made out of them, since plain it were, that destruction was in their souls, not seen but felt, utterly and completely, crushing each soul through pails of straws, unseen but benighted, as their faces and their missing eyes, these figures, boiled but tar- of a chrome or tawny bronze that appeared to be many large conical elongations with smaller faces that opened their near-mechanical mouths to release worm-like flashy tapeworm bubbles of worm-storms, inside of which hundreds of parasites of the kin dances, although even these conical things that were attached were more-so bulbic in body, as they were depressed like parasites themselves, or black-heads, or the blasphemous pimples of no wretches' heed, as the figures were only walking in death, mobile only by their feet, which themselves were rather stripped of all matter and mass, see-through and able as one would be to enter if he charged, if he found a way, if he tried, but then again, most had, and most ended up dead before they could reach the ladder, what they hid under, what they stepped on top of and entered yonder, unintended, as it were, the village of no yearn to return, had given onto them a fidgeting gift, a ladder of wood, with the strange dead-figure, queer-like in appearance, a peasant with a ring-chained mail and a lion's mane, and a duck-pelt, and his eyes were red gems and his legs were snakes, but all were dead-alike, and the mist that came from inside those wretched dire-legs were strapped, and kilt with sea-weed numbness as the vociferous other-dead came to life in need of yearning, yearly contemplation, apparitions of no lesser such blessed by their kind damnation with their heads cut off, but followed in the path of footsteps left by barely walking near-machine casts of iron and of bolts, with some dead mass inside of them, kept above the earthen boat, that it, itself was falling apart at too fast a rate for there to be something that could be done in order to starve away the lichen-plight, molded figures of such clay; still laughing as they continued on their path to find, whatever there was in store, and whatever most treasured incapable of getting away from being punished by each cone of the stars and moons, the strange humanoid-near cross-formation in which they swamped and cradled away, and stretched themselves throughout the coming and the endings of each giving, less eventful day, whenever rose upon the plight and thunderous skin-cowl, the many sutures that fell in place, running devilish cradling beings without arms, that held hundreds of infantile siphoned bottle-heads with long legs in the hundreds, children's men that came after with eyes on their chests, covered permanently and grown themselves in these metal boxes, numbering in the hundreds, yet disallowed to flee, permitted to see light only through a cut made at the top as to be forced to witness, that which had never been had, since birth and what not; though their brooding mothers, tall and chained, long legs and mostly covered in pails of sheets, and rubbed by force of nasty cut-through heaps, and entered through them the bandages abhorrently distraught, as they suffered suffocation endlessly, being only fed air every once in a while, through some tube beneath them that followed like some eerily bell-sung snake that would impale and inject them by quick snares and lunges every now and then, though their lungs filled with soothed water, hot-red by the poker coal inserted but never allowed to come out; longer throats and necks than bodies, heads rounded but blob-like growing with hot-air, see-through but with many –such a-lurk akin-to their children, the ones that were ripped and fell off the ground; that did not belong to them by any means but were eaten through the openings in their legs, through tiny finger-nail elongated feeding shoveling appendages that were allowed every now and then to acquire, the mass of the ground, that stinking thing whose rancid scent filled them with moisture come to an end, whenever seen for what they were, whenever into hiding, all walking in pairs and packs, hiding inside the insidious many-caves that were all connected to the staunch-tall beam-filled with fat, oblong-like as it would diverge at the top in a great almost cabin-like beating like a heart structure, with two strange segments hanging blob-ingly, akin to two interconnected pelvis shaped kites that appeared to contain similar structures as could be seen inside the main cabin, through the hollow spots, as they had shared; as they, the creatures inside each of the three of them appeared to maintain the power of, in and out, there being flung a specter of technology that could only mean that whoever lived inside was the sole master of the deathless giants that were made to walk, forever yet in circles, never allowed to trail off in whichever way, never to have alerted the others hiding in the forests of blooming ultramarine gelatin see-through picked upon green of men of war, that were found, or found themselves readily standing again, on the tip of their toes, readily aghast, bodies filled with a stricken down lust of many bones that were dug by hound-figures, that of men, wearing themselves off with work until death came for them as well. For what was worth it, the porous remains that had cast away the first of the bastardous yearned-for-in-part by means of defibrillatorily destitution had alarmed yet naught but the first abscess of some long-lost-now appeared philanthropist belonging to some obscure extraction that would otherwise commute no thought of disillusion as to find out whether or not where was a chance for his strange adjourning illusionary almost confidence, that had been stricken on the spot by some unfashionable illness that obscured a lot if not most of his well-sided irksome facetiously innocuous to himself image of well being whose native-to-his-knowledge untidily received when finally gotten the chance to inquire about mannerisms that had once been the sole, only, distinguishably by mere glance when met upon an alley by a villainous strangers with whom he of all would share some kindred spirit towards that no other man of similar extraction would find himself qualified enough to have a say in, so much so that one would have to ponder whether or not this fiendish thing had come to a point where it had simply lost whatever shimmer or sliver of mind he ever might've had in the first place, as to think again, why is it that his personage would allow for such a sudden change in countenance as to be perceived as someone that treading upon this path which would in turn yearn no turn-away, nor would allow for a chance for some benefactor to step in; the extraordinariness of this tawny grayish-plume delivered on a cargo-ship after being delayed for several months, past the quota of being, have had to had been delivered on the fifth of November by a lightning-flung sea-storm of mischievously befuddling to aghast, prudish almond-show he had long-wriggled, turned, worked upon, or had his servants do it for him; whether completely or not, that would be left to the interpretation of his personage and that of his close-to-himself peer, of such allure as it would be referred to as his private confidante; to whom he had revealed the elaborate plan he had been toiling over; like a puppet-master who had entered or had himself be delivered into the personage of the gentleman in question, whom, now, was under his complete control, having no power upon himself, nor, so as to be held under close-scrutiny of what might be told about the character of the deliverer of such a note; the veridical epiphany of such a meticulously promulgated oratorical account given in the same letter that had been initially received, and carefully contained under the vigilant eye of a man whose most valued possession so happened to be of an unknown to himself, as for the time he had received it, importance, until one particular evening, in which he had carefully decided to give into it a second thought as to properly absorb the intricacies that were made themselves revealed, as to be the finely written colloquially-ensemble of none other but the Count of Hyst, whose very known politically spread affiliation could render him as naught else, other than an un-finely to be treaded against adversary of some considerate consideration; since his clear grasp over the poor despot, as well as his inherent villainy could be of no other thing than clearly a malefic display of snob-robbery, malevolently but with enough fine precision, wrapped in such a coat of clear- smugness, that one would consider the immediate course of action without doing as much as giving it a second thought as to lend in a chance for the spirits to calm down after being aroused by such snuff-suffice rapidity of veal, the use of which can be deemed as being a cross over, or would so-far impede over the; course of fifteen or seventeen, spent trying to clearly create a massive sphere of influence with which he would sweep over the land with, a clean strike as to slay a beast that would be no other than; as if it was not had been said thoroughly enough, an attempt at; the king himself, regicide!

In a bulbic flower-garden there stood a few rose-buds. Many skulls inside each of them, in part, colored blue-and cradled in each other's brow; they waited, without saying a thing that could be just as loud as to allow for either one to be heard. And they were listened for the hour allowed for many passenger- Toms to step out of the train; one would think it bloody if one would just refrain.

‘A napkin, my dear?’

‘I would accept one from no other man. Do not mind then if I would only take a candor off your shoulders as to entrench a looker’s slim; if you don’t mind puffing, ever since!’

‘I would not, not in cane and much ordained, if I could only take a second face.’

‘But husband, since we were married, you’ve taken several and left me with none. A lady such as myself is bound to have at the very least something to look back to when she’s old and frail and there remains, with an Emperor’s coat around her back-ledged throng, upon the bastardly entreaty, fealty to such more endeared, for the fear that might come oft after, so much so to sneer, would I wait! For now, I would disdain such a thing to happen yet again, I’m in need of a ocular devices!’

‘Then you, wretch, shall do without them for now, since I will them all to naught else but myself and no one else for such a matter is worth a contemplation after but not one that could be said out loud, where puffy pudgy eyes can be felt as if they’ve long endeared come onto the brow!’

‘Whom might yearn for such a thing?’

‘Only the man I call a brother of swoll and Ink; If I could only see a reason behind it, one that’s not been obscured as much as of flame and broth as they could have it not, within reason that is, brought onto a scene of likens.’

‘Ever so much so a trifle is there not?’

‘Not that I would think so, dear June-Pyrt! You’ve been a companion for my nuisance of a life for many a day and night of worth, yet I’m still of a mind to ask, how is it that you’ve come to see me in such a light as no one else might dare entrench a knowing?’

‘I’ve been meaning to ask of that as well, but I’m rather indisposed I’d say. My, myself, I, we are all there, around you, timed by such likens as I’d think there’s but nothing else left to add, nothing else brought to mind. That I would think to ask, they’ve been trying you know?’

The garden only brought a few more pegs of stone-masonry to be held, wooden and moist with some interlopers lodged, likened to each gravel-stone, a grave, with the initials written, here remains:

‘A lodged-lone solider that never asked.’

Chance Coles Rigged, carved on top his Epitaph. Painted with some rose of the bud come out of some pierced vein that’s been had and had, had it been for him, drawn into one of the passing snails and the passing scanty crickets that leaped and leaped again. But that could not be had either, since there was no ruse, nothing too short, or gone or unclear, for such trifles were only to be afforded by a few insignificant, unnecessary, disposable entreaties, brought to the attention, of, no one!

‘May I come in?’

Combing its hair, by the noon's first hour gone; a draught run through, and therefore gone; a few more men were combing the gun.

'There's only a few rounds left in.'

After shaking the guns several times, a few slugs began slowly rolling by their ankles, making their way down a flight of stairs that had only been revealed as what it truly was for a moment or so before disappearing in a; strange, star-struck by the dust that came from above, from the hole. A few billion miles in terms of depth-deep hope corkscrew dug through the ozone layer; stratosphere-shot hole; which appeared to be undulating itself on a moving arch through which it invited several dark figures to pour themselves into the world; beneath them:

'So many of them are thus invaders!'

'Yet there's one among them, therefore tender! Be as such and they shall yet recede in dark command!'

A rancid jest's never been had until this point in time, yet they were at it gone a trifle too long and more. Without as much as they could say.

'Wake up, Chance, you are called onto the hour to attend your own funeral, to no end in sight that may be called upon perdition's woe; nor would one know what to expect if I were to.'

Herman and Lloyd entered the room, without even knocking. They were condescending and tall, right off the bat trying to get in without paying for the handle they had not only ripped off by sheer strength but appeared to be clumsily sharing between the two of them, chewing; branches lodged in their spines, brothers from the brothel with some unnatural strength and pudgy plain green eyes; they had stolen from some kid, each wore one, right and left socket empty, but worm-shooters canons sticking out, stirring the mass of mold people they carried in their one-shared bag. On top of which they had the nerve to pretend they owned the place, which made it all the worst, since there was no way of saying whether or not they were listened to.

'You, brother of Grub, you've been under the burrow for far too long, thinking with the roots, conspiring with the moles so you could force us to join the conscript, haven't you?'

'I know nothing of what you're accusing me of and as a matter of fact, it's a trifle less of what I'd expect out of you, to know it so. I said too much!'

'Slag him, Herman!'

With which the second man slid out of his body, revealing a strange almost levitating turnip of a body still attached by some holding devices that appeared to be encompassing every if not all that was still inside his very eunuch of a tribe-thing, in terms of how many structural cuts had been carved in; in order to make way for all the 'add' ins that were needed to allow for this very levitation to occur, whereas his natural composure was a trifle more unnatural than the very body he appeared to be made a part of, since there was no way of telling just what went into him, when he plunged, lunged and jumped around like a jolt of crackling delights, with many smaller limbs that acted quickly in order to keep the head from rolling down, being hit, being slapped, and worst of all, the back of his chest was there, in the back; but not in the way one expected it to be. A strange symbol appeared to have been burned in, where a cage-like formation held fifty or so, animated hearts that kept beating while still being attached to the generator he carried inside of him. Rightly so, the rush of adrenaline made every single one of them erupt, almost in a most unnatural thing he could barely control, worse than that, he had been almost cast of a mind to throw himself and bore his soul and gut out, for there was a trifle more of what he's done. Eerily his many appendages struck down the man in an instant, who fell flat on the floor, pale as a light being blown by naught else other than some cold breath, before laying, finally in his early grave, dead, like some wreckage swallowed by the ocean's lowest, deepest, most crude and most innocent of lost things that threw away what had once remained of man's empty courage' filled chapter's end, struck down by an hour that forced his brother to rejoined in the woe his peers allowed his personage to continue with, alarming, by the somber quality of a lack of qualities, to have listened to no bowl crackle, and what comes after, before starving for worthless cowering throbs!

'What a marvelous thing life is, fully of glory's never ending and most mischievous of dark errands that could have one's throat slit even if he dared as much as lift a single most assiduous finger to his brow, or look another man wrong, or do as much as spit in his face, spur the spirits or do something even as little as malevolence would throw something in his way or laugh at the way he's to be dismantled or in this case, dismembered by the sadness that is living inside of him but needs be extracted. For lo, I am full of wonder as to dissect this very man that's standing in front of me and I cannot help myself but be curious about what's happened before I even dared lay eyes onto his countenance, abhor, abhor, abhor a second more, so we may perceive what's lain inside!'

For the other man, Lloyd drew closer, pulling out a small machete-like pincer he hid inside his back, still rubbing with the help of his teeth that jerk thing between their incisors, or at least the ones that drew out and did as much as pour some water-clotted blood out of him, the man then rescinded an appeal as to provoke no less. But lo, quickly was the chest open that it was so much revealed that there was no blood, empty as a crude cattle, a man of tin, metal inside. But no circuitry either, a scarecrow of as little salt, as there was a needle in the rack of hay-less quail, but empty and devoid of it as well; they were instead turned to the man whose epitaph was in question. Herman returned to his body-cask, a jelly having entered the room and taken hold of every portrait they were spared the trouble of having to burn them after, since the men in the very pictures were molded, spat and made to suffer.

'What right are you given to bring my house to such ruin as you'd have me mocked, and made plain waste as to be laughed at, as If I did something to earn or deserve this, a thing of much unnerving, serve!'

'We've been brought to such attention as one would have no less an inquiry than needed than. You've died. And we've come to claim a body now, since; there's but one living thing inside. I am being lead to believe that someone in this very room is promised to the very same epitaph we just came from the general direction of, and I can make no lesser distinction between a dead man and one standing than the one I came to make this very instant! You; my son, are you accompany us to your funeral, where you shall be executed on the spot, then delivered onto the promised grave you're to enter and make a home out of for this very eternity and that one that's come after you've been brought to justice!'

Jaundice of all cower, but how could this be? To be overpowered by such villainous fiends that would make one run his trace around and never see the light of day? To have it so much said; for him and for others whom he may've seen along the way! Cruder beings entered the room, and most of them of such earnestness as one could only be lead to believe there was no way out of this, out of this charade that earned no glance than needed!

Poor Frederick, for whom I've yearned to bring such deliverance as one could ever hope to achieve; poor restlessness that had brought him onto the brow of the stairs during the day when he fell, and cracked his skull. Poor Frederick of woe's come onto the stay of a hundred days of solitude in some Asylum he could not hope to escape by merely behaving or acting upon the arching command of having entered the last refuge humanity had during the Solstice of his mother's run. Straight into the same abyss to which he, by means of anger and of spirits had but sent to the same hole destiny has foretold his fate was to beckon a stop, in that crude basin, in that place of gelatin, where dead angelic fiends of many faces such like prunes, of dark purplish green and of whitish gray, of one piece every single one of them, forming tunnels put but down, pits but twisted around, senseless mazes he would have flung no one but himself if there was a ever a chance for her to return.

'Tell him, I ask of you as little as I might, to spare him the trouble, I require you to kill me on the spot, and spare him, thee, I beg to see what little's left to have, what little power my voice has, please but spare him the agony of witnessing such forge of rage, the toil of agony, wreathing in iron and wreathing away. He might not forget this act, he might never know what joys this life has brought onto those as him, whom riches could not displace; the pain of seeing one loved taken away, in front of his dire eyes and during their stay, on every move adjourned, of every turn but mourn, and mourning ever-still, for what's been had and ever-been. I seek to starve such countenance that's to be, stepped upon and ever see; reason in all this dreadful of all countenances in flight. I bade you grant me this one choice that's but mine to take, that I may not leave this place alive, while I still remain of pure-end wrought!'

'Is he worth that much?'

'How could he not be? Blood of my blood; come onto and out of the same soil, come onto prevailed-upon and dreaded charge, come onto me, whenever nightmarish glance's been cast, from the most dreadful of beings, the ones that have come from the sky to claim my son away, and have him brought onto the darkest plots of land this Earth ever had. I would spare him all, reason if not brought, of whom to pay such toll, purloin, of mighty come and mighty toil?'

'It shall be done, then! Your choice was ever done and put into your dark command! And none shall take it from you now, and none shall ever be as thus, in order to achieve, or thrive, we must but take all into account.'

Therefore Herman took a note and a paper, and started inking some details down. Of course there'd be a last will wrought, written, much embolded and signed; by none other than him, the Colonel himself! Or at least that's what they would eventually claim; details come and go; sometimes getting lost along the way.

'My dear lady, I would be, under normal circumstances inclined to have a prick of the lot and take that as an invitation at me taking a shot at your two racks I'm so drawn near to, that I may reproach no longer being set in wait!'

'And who are you, good sir that you would facilitate taking a shot at my bosoms without being as clear of an eye as to satisfy my inquiring of who you are?'

‘I am the Man of the lot Bask-Uth-Temple; a man of most precious gems. May I adorn your peckish throat in that case?’

‘Oh, but such a necklace, I would not dare, I couldn’t. Fanciful as you may be, I barely met you!’

‘Of course you did, but peckish be, I see in thee but an opportunity; may I?’

And the lady was much coquet as it came to her rather quickly, wrapped around, an empty jewel with the cast of some rather flaccid dead, and deathless, were the ones inside this thing of opal, what else he brought? To say the least, many rosy-puffy chains of flowers, bouquets being delivered by the hour, by the post boy who worked on the clock, as to fill her robe, her mattress and the house. It was only then that he had brought the mare, an empty couch of rims beware. And weary were the eyes that looked, the piece of resistance, a gargoyle that shook; of blackened ware, inside of it, dead-niggers, unaware that they were dead as well. Either, to have come upon the storm when mightily were they brought; or upon some day that allowed for the head of respite to allow their voices to be heard as niggers only wailed when called. But the man didn’t stop there either. For he was in the urge of finding more proper places to hide the many other dead niggers and kikes, finder, of the picket-spot, there it was, a much greater pot. A patch of cracked, tiny but lidded planks, which were of some obstinacy allowed:

‘I say, if there’s reason in this house, we’ll take it, if there’s treason performed by the ones, mistakes, to have been made, call upon thine robe, the maiden!’

And she was called, but she was blind, yet there were some plucked out visors that retorted in the back and spoke, twisted, wrapped around her skull; like some visors sticking out, the piping made, forming devilish horns sticking out her sockets anyway. Always staring at the ceiling, and the cracks, not to step on any hour; jolted sparingly, within reason, within the likes. She was a rut, a blotted rut, of likened-to the soles fraught.

‘I say, she is of a finesse and crudeness that were not likened to any or either one!’

Machinum

Hessord’vale, there in the north, strapped to his feet by cords, he remembered trying them on, closer to the southern pails, phoe of steps, Sole. Were they attached like chained, to at least one of them, standing near him:

‘By side you’ve followed such was wail, of trench extending everywhere, but you still near one of us in thought and wonder. What have you come after?’

‘I am the errand of your lord, the one whose vale had been assaulted even before the age of reasoning solace has come to us, wiping out our people almost entirely before we stood a chance to claim ourselves from sight.’

Their fates had already been decided long before they've even been born and now it was only a matter of time, simply what went through them, their long-heads being worn out; to such an extended, that they were standing there, talking to pin-heads.

'Bring us another round, I'm paying.'

One of the lights started flashing. It opened itself up for a pint.

There was a dark set of panels, all raised by metal arms, coming out of a rounded- many faceted mirror-filled with square-bodies, being moved alongside the South-wall by a set of dark human elongated legs. Many of them being as tall as eight feet tall, with the exception of a few, which had body-bags filled with fluid coming out of them. A few spirited angelic figures drew around it like fireflies in most innocuous forms of power, dancing around this iron-cased groove of iron and of tinsel. They dragged a meat-bagged ghoulish corpse body-bag with them by a black rusty fridge cord, whose cries could be heard across the station. Men were either headless or only had the upper side of their bodies left untouched. It was a decent way of living; for some.

It came just back in time for work, in the canyon-valley-depression. Various ring-shark drills could be still seen spinning. Down the black ladder he worked, being met by the Sergeant-Ruffian Chief in Charge not only five minutes ago, but eight; two, he was there, he had been standing there for the last twenty minutes, waiting in line, alongside eighteen more people without faces. They were all packed in saddlebags.

'Next!'

'That's you, big guy, don't keep us waiting.'

'Fine, here's my initials, make sure you know how to pin them down.'

'Haven't I seen you before?'

'I don't think you have, I'm quite a giant beacon am I not?'

'I definitely don't remember seeing someone as big as you come along so fine around the belts. You're a grainy fellow, aren't you? I bet you can carry eighteen or fifty barrels at the very least.'

Mostly acid and powder-dust, a cradle by him; a few people inside, open mouthed, tubes of insects – the generators: Five machines were being ailed by them.

'Off you go by the second lot to your right, next to that big one with the, you can see it.'

An altar machines, a prodigy of men being strapped around it, many of them wearing their wicked anathemas they had carved out of the dark hilled tree that's been ransacked out of the great fallen, whose half-a-piece still lay longingly for a way out.

It was communicating with signals that were being brought out of their hiding. A large panel, filled with eighteen bullets, pointing at him, with fingers coming out their tips, all bearing small people-cocoon shaped insects that breathe fire-lobes of stone-filth in them, that crawled out of their sockets, walking on air-stairs that could be seen outlined by cords-of-green, that came out of a side-vortex that was floating, out of which, being tape-worm-creatures that flailed around, whipping the invisible giants without lower-side-bodies, during the dark storm of lightning that happened, brought from the other side of the world, that was an egg-cocoon filled with elongated nasty-faced humanoid beings that divined fire, through funnels of water, making weird globes appear, crawling inside of them, bearing, each of them, inside their boil-pockets, billions of side-tracked guns, illegally modified, hand-print activated, with tape-banded doors rustily opened, on voice command, but only when slowly speaking, and spelling each letter, like this : O P E N; they used as a way of hyper travel, through every dimension there was, an infinity of them, but spread like seeing a four D object in a three D world, but at a certain point in time, overlapping everything, although they didn't care about it since they were furiously mad, beaten, by each other's grainy fists that were shaped like billions of mass-filled demonical creatures, all chewing on their backs, trying to plant themselves deeper in, only to serve as an echo, for their hatred, for niggers, whom stompage disintegrated them out of existence, stuck-mid-way through, since the web of power, electrical magnificence being brought by density divided by motion times every concurrent thing that followed after put them into every frame of themselves, they carried about, swimming through, as sound faded, as form faded and nothing was seen after, all of this being converted, at a certain interval of time, every eighteen cubical years, once in a lifetime, song-like but pinned on stress, being sent, to the signal getting device, that converted it afterwards into small bits of paper-sheets, parchment-like but with eyes and other most peculiar growths coming out of them, even now and then until the nature of the experiment in the quay was done for, since it came to live, for a moment, to observe. It had a whale-head, fifteen miles ahead, compact, like a great create, four-sided but blimp-like as an oblong-sphere, bearing a tumor-shape giant seed that looked, on both sides like a two dimensional woman's pursed lips, but were a breathing organ, despite being opposite, yet hybrid-like welded in, that came out of a weird one footed body with a strange tail that was a power gun-pointing at a sky-like simian stone-cartilage thing that was attached to the horizontally flipped around goblet-cup-mug filled with overbloated growths it was attached to. A single deformed filled with spike-shard plated finger-nail things pointing upwardly. Although its entire body was far more compact and bore more secret- to one side machine like broken facets filled with appendage stretches, all eerily twitching. If it had been flipped vertically, or on its 'tail-canon', on top is eerily fat-eaten, rotten wall of a solid, unevenly deformed chest, one could see the tail as an oblong-leg crawling along, connected to the half-wall, which bore a pseudo-arm that was slowly trailing its 'finger's against an invisible surface. An elongated baton being its head, whereas it bore an ellipse seed for its puckery mouth, hiding everything in the back. All those hidden appendages in the back held something extremely secret, known only to them. A child demigod Demiurge god 'horse' that was being slowly caressed by these extremely elongated yet pain-inducing things. Its anatomy being similar to the equestrian thing, one limb being a body-bag elongated thing with a giant bulb at its end in the front, the other a strange twisted wing-like as for an avian- skinned alive, whereas the body in the back formed a torsion of highly placed mechanical figures that were all tied together, wrapped around by humanoid sting-cords in which they molded with one another, filled with scorn-plough, whereas the front head was anything but a horse as the body of a horse was not this, an equestrian either, since it would have to be cripplingly beaten as to look like a pseudo-octopus or a fucking retard in order to resemble one. It was high-headed and fat-hardened like a giant fridge bloated with many pipe-cord, singing organ-like, sprouting off the top of its head as if it had been shot by a shot-gun several times instead every single one of these raised termite-nest formation being but a tube-augmentation filler, pea-shooter, whereas, the back of its head bore blade-edges raised-pillar-towering stalagmited forearms. Its mouth in the front looking like a vortex made of boils mixed together rivers. One dark compounded eye adorning it in the front. It was flying, levitating in dream, and capable of granting wishes but only being contained in gaseous form that would explode if inhaled.

It was most peculiar working there.

One cockled eyed man only drew near two of them, the others being there, only by chance, as to greet their fellow, the man with no eyes, and no car, whom had come on top his sail-less master, and such disaster as one would have it soon enough after, darted, and ever so farther, called it, yonder, had he called a reason, and to appease himself, no treason yet forgiven, such, as the way would have it watched and wreathed, call of pain, call of action, agony brought supreme inaction as they stared a while, days agape, for darker was the rape that was to come, embraced upon such altars gone from reasonless wont and brought forth gone was the one that drew:

‘Anigus Ore, my slave, but come and draw and sail a-near, and out of fear, shall I have, you strung by lynch but gone not from my side, but I want you now to flail and wreath away.’

Thus was come upon, and flailed had his body, drawn strung, to follow, after, of bowels, and entered through a small sun-eight followed, more lynch to come, from space and farther, yet entranced as one would have it, spoken in lesser, no direction, there. Found of agony, there, here and yonder still. And darkly was the night inside. For there was only a world of much benign, and filth-embrace and men without races, without faces and only hatred did they bear. Still towards niggers, whom detest as they would have but all, in turn and everywhere in the world, when stall no longer, as to fear what could come after, as to fear as for yonder was the nigger, then, and after.

‘Have him lynched!’

‘Kill it, slay it, destroy it.’

‘Shut your mouths!’

And they were slithered and silenced after, not to mention what came yonder, forth, they came and some shall stay, when never quail, of touch, and a feather, a single one bore yonder, lighter, and seemed ever so much so, to touch. And watched when the dark incline, and cut through mast and sail upon unworthy plank, they entered through the door; encompassed chamber, coated them in paint of green and yellowish things that stooped on top of them since made as little as would happen still; for them to know and steel themselves, would rather know, and rather, still to have been known themselves, as they surrounded, the men with the tallest foreheads, whom were killed after, cadavers of caved-in gods, stored, all in bottled-jars from which the lepers of much darker things still rose, one would have them flailed:

‘I see that you’ve brought us food, sustenance for we are ill still, for we have buried ourselves in thin, a-globe.’

Outlandish as it were, a stinger of wax that came from somewhere, deeper still, the bowels of ‘beware’, no candle would still light and feel such pleasant, dark-delight, as those growths that shot forth and came, out of it, and then again, many but contorted still, a giant axe-stretched or a poled flag of skin, but such as a balloon or blimp, gum-less but with the opening of an oyster, trying to open forth as it bore, ear-wax like contortions but cocoons as if they bore but men, or elongated tombs that belonged to them. No better than what they looked like that, and what they felt when they were brought, in front of many and many more alike to them, to follow in the footsteps of eyeless things but giants without limbs, that caught them after, apparitions of stranger, filthier, darker- to wage war against them, malborious remark, a smoky curtain in the bowels of which they stood about the hour talking:

‘Lee’, we’re being summoned, of way but darkened is but darkness gone, devoid of as they took it all but coated into coal-embed flame.’

And as would one have it listened, to their desperate cried, the fiend, they called, their god, of niggardly abode:

‘I call upon the other Patron of the niggers, Nyegrach, most tainted filthy nigger of all.’

Bastardly he were of rape and mad destruction; carrier of niggers snatched, fatherless creature that he is, but father of, never took care of anyone.

‘It is he whom is to pass the judgment over one of his “sons” and there shall be none other whom shall cleanse that one.’

‘Feed me.’

‘Starve, nigger.’

Thus was his fate decided.

‘It is bolted, I can’t get through.’

Yet again the buzzer started drilling through his thick skull, sullen as he was, incapable of shoving his pocketed key-card in without losing a toe. Since there were a few fire-holes beneath him, readily activated as if finger on a trigger aimed at him unless he moved on, bent low asking for help since he was now stuck in an awful situation he couldn’t get away him got him praying there was someone on the other side.

‘Think yer going to be let go?’

His face was splattered and was tall, in the ceiling gone, with cats stitched together – legs and a chest with a dark crystal of spikes, utterly shattered, armless and bleeding.

‘An entire Solarium of growth tree warts is under lockdown there, buddy. I don’t think you’re going to fare any better on the other side.’

Battery acid was there, in a barrel.

The barrel was most bastardly set on an invisible assembly line that was placed in the gut of a great machine-monster whose heads only now came to light, since they were bastardly trying to take the most incessantly dark of breaths, whenever needed to make a case out of it and destroy the photons inside the automatons that had become the darkies or the after-shade nigger figures that were entombed across the whole-span, width-breath and extra-stretch included, of a most fallacious kind of insularly foam-filling sprouting bud that followed the barrel around, being part of the wall only in a superficial manner before fully going out, trailing its way like two German children following a trail of crumbling bread crumbs unpicked as flowery maidens by the birds that tried or attempted getting through, as part of it, leprously fallen had attracted ghoulish heads in submarine divers suited nut-cases with guns and spear horns attached to their backs, attempting to draw breath eerily, in the span of a sapient kind of pairless seconds, distanced from one another, as the tubes atop the ceiling were brought down, lowered as to stop 'compressingly' restraining their breaths before one could look at their puffy suits and laugh, merrily wonted, since, most viciously obvious as it were, their throats having been made like the base of light-bulbs, whereas their heads only 'levitated', eerily so, a few meters off their socket, a viscous propensity, dames came in, their wives, in order to join them in eating the fallen-over leprosy, merrily dancing around an half-eaten altar-made, out of every forlorn body, filled with grit and to-itself despair, unneeded to be brought back, the barrel having disregarded all of that, was brought to countless holds that were being hid inside the great body of the network's database fit- as in, birthed out of a mechanical symbiotic wish that gave birth to the most romboscou of sapiens, holding it all together only for a momentary tit. That was seen below, beneath the elbow, kept into eternal stillness before it could make or give birth to a mad noise, there it stood, a dark crystal, fragmented but tall, like some sort of eighteen faceted marked glowing with red and blue and yellow and the mixes that came between them prison that was being held, all of the unfathomable arms that added to it, indeed were, belonged to sapiens. And it's been a marsh, of dark-strewn countenance and alacrity to wait this longed for moment where, upon being finally brought to it, this pickle cylinder that burned as to be prodded, felt, all of the sudden as if countless bites of spiderlings had made it feel, intentionally so, as it was not only unwonted, but denigrated to something beneath itself, as to be forced in a state devoid of breathing and of plough, in which, talking to it, compensatory glance, as it was given to it, a first, in eons, if one could go even farther than that, much greatness and grandeur to him, for he will have been toyed with no longer, but greeted as a master that could not have himself put like him, in front of a strange gelatin but hardened lump of cold-dark eyed councils, many of them having come from the urban regions of the countries:

At least one of them, whom was a dark piece of clusters, from its right, an almost helmet shape-stretched upon the meaty body that, if seen would've been called, a stalactite caught within the body of a few bursts of spikes and other cricket-like antlers and other things that could not fit or belong in the same body if they were forced together so, since they were crawling in and out, this dark, almost boomerang curved thing that floated, with its eely -lowered stings, Reihnald, the most and much to itself elected council leader, asked for, as quickly as one would have it yet, to speak in their name as he would but inhabit a second or so, to a rustic habit of lesser sprangle horns, it asked:

'They've brought a barrel onto us, but for what reason? I ask you thus, for what reason did they think us responsible, as elect official to serve as judges upon the lower live-forms that are hidden in barrels filled with lice and other dark things that refuse to come to life when asked to?'

'It's rather impossible, thinking they could come back to life, return, to a necromancer's mournful gaze, whom may have thought himself made out of the, sort of saying, abandoned remains of his past-over-the grave and stolen by robbers, remains, whose credentials in terms of the blighted pouch of bones, engraved, in stories filled with ghoulish mazes and the ones that draw after, whose allure refrain from sight, as graven as it sounds, they would have us march in place and looking for a reason to splatter long-before-birthed, yet to their conception, ended, was there no need, and breed upon the salacious thing, I seek, of long-contempt be granted, for I have done as I was asked and darted, draftingly alight, to myself and to my people's countenance, a symbol that for some time I've been alive, within reason, doing as their craven selves had asked for, to such end that I was visited by one of the vengeful dictators of death, whose deathless stares, of cold and bold, and celeritous heart, and bold as I were, as told, I could not resist and gave it all in. And let this serve as a kind of warning to you all, as this dead figure was only but a cranium with a worm-altar body, a giant toe with a fingernail incisor hornet hanging droopingly, a hive filled with tinier flying skulls it carried, and spikes coming out, spindly, as spider-cranes set-upon themselves to eat and mourn for the longed for days of stillness that he hold me of.

Warned as I by him, for this barrel alone came out of nowhere, within his cold by gulls, tenderly mesmerized, canopy of spectral and mightily forlorn, seething now, I wager, figures –rounded, that rolled upon the hills of demure, as if making their way most-irksomely wasn't enough for their turn had come to roll over and crush everything within sight. They had, and when come again upon the site, the necromancer whom I have met again, judged me to blame, for what I've done could not be sickened less, since I was under the 'impress' that I had been judged for something else. But instead, I lay so wickedly sick in darted upon dead-bidden bed, thinking, akin, and during dreary-killed strewn nights, upon the window as my gaze is cast, I see him, eerily so, spying on me, floating, a senseless figure that couldn't have been, beyond saving, if one were to call for it, within reason to touch.

And it was then as well that I found myself frightened as to ask what happened when watched closely by close-a-kin, whom were present in the day.'

'The council will eventually have to.'

'Councils, you mean, is that correct?'

'Pardon me, but I think there's been no call whatsoever, so far, for any immediate reason to acknowledge the others, for all, not to mind yourself as many others would in turn, intensive purposes, I am to serve as a key-piece frame to all of you put together in such ways, and waste that one could find it rather irresolute to think it haggardly, bothersome, prudish even, as to ask, for acknowledgement, since we are to act together, pressed, but we'll have to wait and see.'

'Knock knock, may I enter?'

'Yes you may, but only if you press the elevator starter button again, for I am in need of a much long awaited for leave and I cannot stay too long before being run down by one of the plower-troughs, since you know how they work.'

'I think I do, I think I do.'

'Then join me, still, that I may know and look around before four of them would walk around and show any kind of weakness that would have me killed.'

'But what kind of weakness would that be?'

'You know the likes, of much betrayal, that would be taken, for foil and terror, that I would walk upon but musket-stings, that I may shot, though angst would force rethink of such bothersome conundrum, as to watch them work their arms upon my guts and strung and bladder, stranger ladder will that be that wilt I, by force to be walked upon, as plank would have me rather not meet the Admirals, treacherous they might be, I still feel rather uncannily incapable of doing something they would have me still look into. Since I'm trying to understand what's going on. So many panels flash but tell me nothing. I'm incapable of properly performing my task, the one that I have been placed under, that I would seek after, respite for what's been done.

My masters, the one behind this wall as well, in league with them, but consternation will have me damned if I open my mouth again and reveal much.'

'Then allow me to help you.'

'How? Can't you see that I'm wanted, that I am a wanted man who is about to get killed by the masters who want to take claim over my life and end it, thoroughly killing me entirely until I'm no longer living but I am killed, in a grave, in a cemetery, twenty feet under, soil, beneath it, the casket my body will be put in, carefully placed, then lowered in, but by then, in place, set, for a period of time, until I will have been disintegrated.'

Neither of them knew how to react to this rancid confession that had bastardly robbed him of his bone-spine marrow that had liquefied, quickly enough, having snuck out, then crawled in one of the mechanical mouse-holes through which it, all of the sudden found an underground tunnel, through which it traveled eighteen-hundred miles away, in a lead pipe that went straight, from its point of view, took a left, then a right, then straight again, so as to be heading in the same direction with a difference of a few hundred meters, two hundred seventy five or so, relative, where it spun in a dizzy swirl of elongated pipes that all connected, if not hybridized within each other's grasps, until they had become unnaturally elongated and entered a forest of coned-sharp tall tapped on by dark finger-tombs in which hundreds upon billions of decaying cripples were being shoved in, deeper into the ground by weird pistons that kept pushing them around, whereas this liquefied mass entered, as they made way for it to travel along, since it carried a smoke-cigar lighter it stole from its man-of-company embodiment in-corpse livid, cartilage of bones and skin and blood-vessels along other things, that were put or had been put together, 'house' who exploded in the same room, therefore concluding the self-fulfilling prophecy that spoke of him being destined to die eventually, when all of the sudden he realized that he suffered of a condition in which his brain had become indestructible but its neurons were dark nails that cut through his dendrites, not that it mattered since he had been splattered around the dark room he was in, in which the panels were floating and were filled with giant egg-shaped things that were trying to push out of them elongated hose-like connectors that buried themselves in, having lynched, or attempted, lynched only on their side, but attempted on his, since only he knew and the observers that he couldn't die, they didn't, that bore inside of them womb-angels with angler-stroke filled giant heart pumping but with heads shaped like French fries or fish-shaped chips that were all connected with plugs in their eyes, having eaten already a part of the dark man, the 'men' that were trapped with them, in this egg-shell, whose womb-like appearance started decaying yet falling apart, many of the inverted spike-like formations having already entered it several times until no longer was it capable of breathing, the malefic entity behind them, whose ethereal nature was incapable of being distinguished from the other ghastly figures that were in the same room with it, many of them being at this point, it-itself, the spectral creature, who was also the dead scientist, whom, having become a kite- of spectral power, had , at this point in time began following the left-over 'foot-prints' left behind by his out of body, spine-sinew.

The man of colors, coated in blood, and coated in blood, and coated in clot and blood, bloodied with, wearing nothing but red, colored red as he was coated in bloody red, red-red, red-red blood, period and kill and blood on top of him, he walked through the Mayor's office and bloodied everything with his rabid faced gun, the tank, he carried on his arm, on top of which there only were, hundreds upon hundreds of skulls, beware of him, as he draws near, the skulls being enwrapped into something disgusting, hard to look at, as they also had some eerily disturbing, it was a foamy sponge of some see-through, transparency-opaque but pastel with acrylics and some rubbed chalk-dust, lodged with spots of red-orge-blue-blue-blue-white-black-white-red-orange-not-orge-organs-out, many of them connected to the balloon-like blimp body that floated on top of them, being shot-through spear-cue, gone past, dark sinew, buried underneath the tank, in his bone-past body, past the rushing crushingly senile bulls, that were headless and only had their heads wrapped around giant seed-pouches that pumped and boomed some of the unnatural dark people whose bodies were shaped like Police Officer body armor, but fatter on the inside, with legs that were molded together, as for siren's stolen but of land's, with their eerie heads but curved plates, concave, or half-a-cut, made, or cast upon lamps, torn apart, when needed, bed with and longed steely beams upheaved, on both sides, kept everything together as the pilots were but growths that came out into the light.

Tall as stelas, drew ahead:

For they had asked for only one fraction of a second, who killed the man?:

'Standing next to you and to your brow, up, and down and all the way through, there's a heap coming from the bowels of the earth that've never been found. Not until you showed up and came along. I wager your spindly face had something put inside of it, now, your grubby hands are rubbing.

You've dirtied him all over!' Noticed he upon the hour of the cry.

When eight crows, as big as eighteen hundred miles long but as thin as four centimeters high, stood watching; with their pointy beaks simply nitpicking their eyes. It was much-more-so disturbing to look at, let alone try to appease their likes as to allow the refuge of stars to enter their cracked, upon, admonished presence felt, basked, skull-caps in which worms started crawling out of soil-like cemetery, pop.

A message was being transposed, interjudicially through a system of thoughts tied together by pure spite and anger. They tied one another quite neatly so, as they slowly made their way through one of the smaller-more compact dimensions that were yet to be colloquially spoken to, out-loud, angrily burdensome there being a single man alive there to confirm that they were well received by a simple assessment that's been stumbled upon by naught else than a simple trick. The man, although in most actuality a laymen, as for his earn, not inherited place in the world, as for the plebians alike, has, in all godlyhood managed to stumble on, as it's expected, for even the most temperate of men might stumble, as it's been said, on geniality by mere force of character struck by a display of force that would otherwise be unseen in a woman, as her ingenuity or anything that could even be remotely interpreted as that would be a biological impossibility, as every man is by nature a strong contender and a much stronger, more burdensome as well by a contradiction to the very system he's living in, whose coiless ponder much-attempts to rob him of himself, turning him into a gutless thing, such as a woman is, cowardly, in an attempt to force the animal to behave in a way it would not impede with other's superimpositions of what ought to be, happen and in what way society ought to be run like, robbing him of his manhood as well as his desire of brotherly cooperation, in any case, he tied a nasty-moist shoelace around the tip of one of his pinkies, meagerly measuring the size of the pupil in a way where he could get a rough estimate as to what pattern of thoughts occurred in their minds to begin with. There was a bomb in his chest the size of a moon, with nuclear dots that had faces rotating in them. Exploded, boom, he shot a needle rack of bullets, that killed some of the flying nigger-birds, taking them down a notch.

A blade he wore as well, one with two rounded wheel-devices, the kind used on cranes to lower weight, being very much tied to the iron and put, made part, of it, around the area near the hilt, where a bicycle chain appeared to connect itself to an upper-few meters spot, around the tip of the blade, that entered the side of his head, on an angled incline of a fifty-five degree, weird circumference as well, there being exposed, unkindly to a fault, bothersome to have a hard stare at, that being the point where he hid, beaded as they were, inside the cranial vault in which this blade kept them stored, as if he was naught but a strange open-ended edifice, refrigerator holding a few frozen eggs, but clustered grenades took their place. His legs were downward pointing, ceiling is the sky, parachutes. Out of his back a weird humanoid tube with elongated two headed circumferential-angled caterpillar bloated arms that had two extra heads coming out of each, drawing out each other's cut-through slits, where they bore holes for faces. Out of which came spite. It oozed in the air.

A building moved on him, wrought, covertly covered in eye-patches that blocked every side of the window there was, dead men hanging at every floor, bleeding in the outdoors, discerning some missionaries' flam-truck filled with fruits, driven repeatedly into the walls, sparks there being made by the engines that were shackled to their ankle points driven back, stabbed.

'I think you've seen too much, the crows are onto you, friend.'

'Block Eight-Five, I've not asked you for.

Wait, does that person, on the street down there, remind you of someone?'

'That one?'

They were both pointedly staring at him.

Most peculiarly defunct as he was, Huy-Un-Hank-Tornapart Tonsils-Corpse, the man standing in front of them. Eighteen syringes popped out of him, spraying disease around the ground, which in turned caused one of the distant clogged wheels to shoot back. It had been mounted on top a strange rail, then it went back into the wall behind it that's also been railed as well. A secret second curtain holder made out of segmented, but kept only by small sockets of jewels and of other barely put together formations came into view as well. They were only sharpened by the constant rubbing of the cysted-fists, whom entered their quails and their little moths of iron that, with the help of their gong-like chest expansions, reflected the head back into the crystals that had been formed around every joint. Crackedly, but crook-for-flint, dust was fell beyond a rifted blow of windless gazes, many sculpture-sulfuric acid-liquid entities floated around them, channeling, as they began, chanting as they started, shooting rays of half-pyramidal picks beaded on their lines aligned with over the top of the hill shots of wooly pancreatic ooze-was splattering at its end, with two fists of rocky barely-livid but unnaturally box-glovish ends that connected with the strange-faceted surface they had been projected against. The space behind the secret wall being the size of a Coliseum or an Amphitheater with wheeled faces that had spikes for eyes and tongues for hairs but were actually parasitical tongues-fish like planted in that had rubies for eyes and were skeletal whereas their outer ends pushed out and began glowing in the worst possible manner, attracting mosquito fly ships whose, instead of compound eyes bore, on each side, a tube-protrusion cylinder fat rummy hose split in two end-hairs' kin to, but with one pseudo moth wing-spread sheeted parchment on one side, whereas the other bore a pseudo tiny altar made out of stacked on top of one another rocks, each being wider and bigger than the other, coming out the top of the 'head' region between the two 'hairs', which bore a face in-between them, in that pseudo rounded lid but diverging into the two regions, the wing and the pile of growths, closer to fat tires in appearance, whereas one could see two smallish glowing eyes that were puckers, a pseudo nigger-fat-spread nose as well as a stitched-together barely in place figure whose general appearance was too unnaturally deformed for it to be properly classified in any meaningful way. And two of these formations were their eyes, whereas their tails gelatin-caterpillar stretched in a line, at the end of which a weird cube-growth released, below it, three great cylinders that were connected to a patch of 'hill-like' growths that were almost as rounded as a sphere, with boil-like balloon pinched raised mounds keeping the hill and the cylinder together, that, at the back also held a great curved with a stinger that was something close to a ceiling hanging-crawling up-side down, almost as thick but without its head and many legs, scorpions that was a part of it. The wings themselves were thin as ropes but were attached to a single shell-like but mold of clay inside of a dinosaur head's balloon that prevented it from falling apart or falling over itself. Its eyes, from the distance could've made for good pincers if the sheet had been unwrapped and pointier, signaling the fact that the smallest, tiniest of wires was sharply curved, enough for the pseudo-illusion to take effect, whereas segment at the end of the tail, including the hill would've made a strange pseudo-balcony, or the adorning piece of one.

'Much berated is the ground down there.'

A flying Filsess said, although its voice only echoed around, most disturbingly followed by smaller glowing things, the children barricades, hiding inside tinier houses they brought alongside them, niggers lynched in every abode, and there was no shortage whatsoever for either of them, nor could there be such a thing at all. A disturbing sound had followed after.

A cricket of hollow inside their bodies ghoulish figures came through.

'A dark castle's lain down there, luridous humanoids have taken over the land by brute force. We've been driven out and forced to wait or make way for their retreat but now, I've little doubt of anything that will take us back to our original point of entry.'

'What was there before their arrival, what hath been lain before you'd come?'

'The body of a sound-foam made, wrought in and out, whose likens was bridled by chains. They've dragged it in the basement and did with it as they would again; it seems like time had spoken of something that's been echoing through space, and little more could they do but satisfy the call it bore, to draw more out of it.

I know of this, the sound foam. It carried the echoes bore through time and outer-space as well, something not even us can deal with if forced onto us, when quail would have a say in it.'

'Shall we release it then?'

‘Nay, for it will be too late, by the time we will have gotten there, many of them will have gotten past-way through, for miles and gotten through the giant Ogres, the ones with eighteen eyes and reddened faces with milky white and four great arms beneath them, on top the spikes rotating platforms on which they’re lain impales. For many of the Ogres have many of those thinks, their thoughts become ill with dame.’

And it was said as less, the essence of the female speaking, her ill only appeasing the worst of the demonical figures as well as the ones bearing a supreme kind of destruction that would spread like rats and diseased brats, crying for their moms during the lack of dads, these whores bearing instead criminals as they’ve but dissatisfied themselves with life. In the lack of a sun to cry of, kikery Holocaustic smears could be felt, drearily drawing breath from the niggardly nigger-wails.

Some could be heard down there, echoes being spread-but torn apart, piece by piece, with peeling gazes, eyes within.

‘Many of the Ogres of the Under-bowel-Credos have pledges allegiance to the men even before the passing of the Fourth Moon’s Solstice hour, in which they were bespoken by eyeless things whom crawled from under-ground, the little specks of light that, being stolen from them gave birth to bricks.’

Millions of them that formed great houses, many of the houses being very much incapable of breathing since their breathing organs, these paraphernalia-producing machines grew like yellow spongy muscle on top the lower-hilled mountainous regions of the Greater shorter passages where the traders traded with men without legs and arms but opened their guts to reveal small tank-walkers with metallic sprawls forming circles, tied to one another’s farther ends, forming great arches before they entered one of the migration-killer’s, the giant cranium giants, the Holocausters of false-lives, innumerable, but un-existent, begging to get released from the bowels formed in their inside’s palms.

‘Many such rituals were made down there, such as one would find it evenly fair as well as unfair to ask. Who is alive, Hash-Yha, and who isn’t? Not in that sense, but whose body has become the entry to the other-world?

The one that’s hid inside the molder, made of particles of dirtier dirt.’

‘What happened to the soil then?’

One of the greater flying figures pointed at a barely visible, viciously vibrating mound below, fifteen or sixteen centimeters from the looks of it, at the very least, raised as to be almost a giant screw or a bleating tiny bag of popping in and out, disgustingly hard-to seethe at marbles since they all bore the corpses of the unbelievers in them, spiking them with acid, wide spread.

Just in time as everyone was diverted to that point, there was a sudden, most disgustingly hard to stare, to fully adorn by the looks of it, and tackle in, pair of trains-interconnected scouts, and out of them, lids of gelatin, hard-to-be-said, hardly a matter of salivating over the beauty of their design, undignified raft-but hardened with coats of iron and of nickel, with an insufferably disgustingly-disturbing addition, of an allow, that was unnaturally disgustingly-made and hardened to touch, with pinty-pinty points of adorned around it, around its roundedness but raised as well, as if they were bolts but forming x’s, I’s, d’s, shaped for giant screwdriver’s holes to be put in, for removal, tank-like openings out of which men that were backwards in term of where their limbs were put and how they were not only aligned but how they appeared to be moving as well as their unnatural jerkiness-driven by mimicry imitation- by or as in by made to imitate baboons or other dirty simian animals that were akin to them, or would unnaturally activate their neurons, drew out, only to start sipping out of the boil that's been lain on the ground but not before they leaped out like circus entertainers bearing knives and spear-shafts that drew out of their eyes as they began prodding onto them as if they were cattle, or burn-through ovens as if kikes were put in, was the trigger, made out of a pseudo explosion, being brought into view, after part of the hellish thing drew out, although unseen and mesmerizing, as it were, the workers were all drawn onto it, especially the fliers, whom had chosen to draw much further, as closer as they could, making their way through this cubical Amphitheater of black curtains through which they finally had absolved all of their sins of murder and rape, for many human females had been raped repeatedly and most violently over the spans of eons, only to be quickly discarded and allowed to rot among other carcasses that they themselves could not approach.

Roach-sounds, Moth-vibrations, Arachnid-echoes followed drearily as they descended below, to the blowing winds of a most uncannily deformed giant head that was flattened and appeared as a see-through filter through which they pushed down below, were they cast, as if out of Heaven, into that Hellish, now claimed by Humanoids – world that awaited them, headingly so.

‘Abacus, metronomes, telescoping-Epistemes manufactured by giants, all of them incubated inside one of those things, the ones dead-eyed centered to harm us, slowly disintegrating our cysted spheres, many of whom we are resided in.’

Made of eye-cardboard with leper's choice of knives being put in his eyes. A ladder of crickets being there, present, the machine-turbines attached to their backs, these motorcycles, straddled in as they only ran their course upon some racks put together standing, ever so incessantly straddling:

‘The globe's Earth's shone-after light, was see again.’

‘It is the night's that's causing it, or have you forgotten it already?’

‘Now I am the sociopath.’ Said Stalin, the kike-puppet Bolshevik, recording stuck behind a barred screen.

Born in an age where the buildings were dry-drenched beneath the trenches upon gelatin axed-pendulums that moved lopsided-forward by slight, barely visible alterations in terms of angle during the continuous motion, that was slightly altered as well as to form pseudo-looking, that is to say, that, if the dirt had been removed, one would simply see set of wildly widespread gradient-like ramped triangles rounded up in bodies of half-spheres that leveled themselves on a straight ground-leveled soil-push through, in a pseudo straight trajectory. An athlete's long-distanced jumped area could be seen, in some way as the bridged or the straight platform through which it drove through, yet, beneath the earth one could see it as, more of a half-cylinder in terms of the general method of it being set in to walk-through. But at the same time, an important distinction would have to be made, so as to say, the difference between it being, and not only that, leaving the strange incline to a bothersome alleviation of form, beads being put together in a straight line, parasitically, egg-shelled; cracked with little puffers of foam-cotton candy foamy beams wrapped-in-and-out and through, a few spiked little pecks.

Below them lay the solitary confinement. A voice could be heard, echoing, a pair afterwards, beneath the chambers:

‘He’s been trapped with us, but how? All this time.’

‘And not a single noise was made, not a wince, wiggle, squirm or dandy, but he was undoubtedly here, with us.’

Even the bars had been rustled up, as well as the decayed toppling bodies that were now come together, back to life. Unsanitary, tall, not human, anything but human; part the table, that’d you’d see them from an angle. Missing everything, for the better; they could only be felt by scent alone, as they changed in height and with every hundred meter or so, everything simply became, blurry. Monotone, defunct, spoiled and rotten; their teeth were rot.

‘I think I still remember him.’

It took a while to charge himself in order to do it, the machine Metronomus, distinct of all men, appeared to have leaped inside the room they were in, stopped dead-point in the middle, where his head leaped to his right side, out of his neck, flew around, corked back in, as a scythe of wind but blew a few cold-felt strings as if of noise in his direction, then popped right back in. Where, out of his clearly made delineations, which were slashed around and across his body, as if he’d been carved, oil-drops, the tears of a nigger-angel, whose in actuality a demonical being who gutted the cherub, hiding itself inside the skin. A devil of never-kind, not to be met on a dark alley, where set, was the time- ED blind:

With eighteen gauges:

It looked like a nasty set garage, although not a single cog could be seen working and since they were there, no need was to be made known as to their interactions or the abhorrent half-a-cargo that was standing before them, only a few feet away.

Meddlesome thing, ain’t it? It still thinks itself a man, though tear-for tear might it spread or shed, there’s no cut in this world that will make him one of them, or us as a matter of fact. I’ve seen his kind before and lest of all I am not afraid to say something that’ll be made known to me o others. Not to give myself away, but, but.’ Heard-Edor stepped at a sigh, thinking of him-machine that way made him want to turn a blind eye to the other men being killed by them, generally speaking, all machines were indistinguishable from one another. Whether it’d be a toaster, a cast, a cargo or this thing; all were a god, shared in cognition and felt. They remembered being slapped the wrong way, although uncanny, neither one said a thing when it came to, doing it. It had a giant cob-shaped flat with fourteen wheels that were ganglions that bore eyes for a brain. Top-notch model, with a man encased in some volatile substance, made to suffer. Out of his chest, a face sprang out, that bore knives for teeth.

Edor began whispering something into Halbert’s ear:

‘Niggers.’

The strange moon base they were in now; adjacent to the strange crystal-encased meteorites attached to the greater elongated barracks shook with insolence as their violent upheaval. Some Taurus-sings could be seen across the mid-towers, the ones that were part of the base. Violent insurgences destroyed most of the natural fauna that had once been brought onto the world through terraforming actions, caused by niggers. It was a reminder. Not everything was what it seemed.

A crowd of men they were, staring at the cargo vessel. A nasty thing, Asiatic-flat faced, lacking in a lower jaw, the lower piece being only teeth- a lower deformed coffin, with a weird conical roof of a medieval castle's tower, pointing at one of the nearest walls, where most of the tools adorned the work-through iron arms. A few appendages, humanoid but hairy as an insects drew from beneath it; but two of these appendages were longed, wore a humanoid rib-cage around them, a single one they shared, from the distance, which had the capability of elongating itself, in the same way rubber does, had four armed, but by sticks of wired together frames with four great lances, each, that were cut at their tops, out of which they shot acid, whose heads were bubbles-see through's, that were spiked by six, three on each side, thorns, henceforth twelve since there were two of them, whose heads were pseudo-humanoid-hearts with eely tendons attached to them and rose-buds in the middle. A door knock rang through, like cancer.

Metronomus opened it.

A fat contorted body-suit as if man-dressed-in-curtain-to-play-nasty-joke-or-plank, flat, where the tip of the 'throat' which didn't exist was, a rat figure that being, the rat's head was pointed downward, whereas the rest of its body was hung by its legs, from above, force down like a dog being forced to smell its own piss after pissing inside the house despite training him to do it outside's kind of form of punishment position, where the rest of your body or arse is up but the head down, but in this case, its throat would closer to a plane field, despite there being an elongated fat-tail, grub-like coming out of its 'mouth', or it chewing on a thinner radish. A blob-filled with lumps, with a pivoting stick coming out of its 'head', which was, the tusk-stick, lance-out of the left cheek, whereas the right side of this humanoid-like head bore a pseudo-thinner rack of growths that entered it and kept it hanging over the flattened lid on top of which it cast its shadow against.

'I've returned, finally, my servant, Metronomus. I am guided by rage and destruction, and have brought in the deed of ownership, to this fine garbage you're all working in. That is to say that you're all low-lives and beneath me. And I am the master, above you by all accounts.'

The cargo ship might've given one the impression that he was staring at a Parade's cart, whose owner actually shaped it as to look like he was aiming for it to look like a deformed, nightmarish version of Pinocchio, although, during its initial design, so as to say, or provide a frame of reference for it to have served as a failure and nothing more, one thing didn't miss anyone who understood what the owner or initial designer aimed for, which in turn was a failure, since the cargo itself lacked its defining feature that in turn might've lend it some words of applaud. Also, the appendages did not belong there, and their existence was very much so, incontestably, not only unnecessary but senseless.

Fourth man, thought of something. He was a giant axe-'s war'shaped with a clear-cut roundness to him, sprouting from the top, that is, half-cut pendulum was its legs, worm-grub with a cup-top mold on top of it, out of which gurgling as if with viscera guts' expressed in lumps, like the insides-out of a caterpillar being slowly squeezed in one weird direction, whose upper-top, when seen as connected to the half-head, looked like a crab's mouth since the two bigger lumps took precedence, as to how they were connected to this hard headed lumped creature with rounded canon-tube eyes. IT stepped in, by cut:

‘But lord of this vale, the land outside is stricken by evil and by invaders without spines, and bidden corpses.’

IT was true. The grounds around the moons were filled with endless rummaging corpses whose growth had never stopped since, whose bastardity destroyed everything. Whom were elongated headed, worm-like and spiked, and butchered all non-terrestrial life-forms that was not them. Space was also not a vacuum and was painted red-blue, and in-between; forming wild, vicious-being shaped malformations of color that looked down-dowry upon them.

Before anyone could answer, or have a say, one of the intercoms, actioned by inserting, but not before beheading yourself, head, put in, shoved in, force by, put around, then slapped, and cracked spoiled open egg-crack snap-snap, bacon, kike-in-the-oven, lynch-nigger drown his mum, inside the receptor, that began, once one of the bolder people interacted with it, to communicate with the other base that was a few hundred thousand giant disgusting boils away, placed in the grave-digger-nigger-snapper cemetery. This intercom was specifically design and attached to a database that had enrolled millions of inter-bog-planetary beings, whose communication was altered by the. What they all saw now.

They were eyeless and socketless and only saw a black, like veil of darkness, of paint blinding them once shoved inside their eyes by force, if they had had them.

Vicious images of them being eaten, although not physically, as they were all presented with only the face of a chewing-constantly-creature that never drew too close, nor moved from where it stood, nor had it any distinguishable features that could be discerned whatsoever. Filthy fry-fat oblongs for teeth, it bore, spiking them with spat on black. Boils were running towards them as they came to live, the children that were bred inside, the ones they had been playing hide and seek with, wreathing as they all lost track of how many of their feet had been cut off their blood supplies. It was bastardly how weak they felt, how eerie they all were forced into. How easily they had been twisted and contorted around, rotten minds incapable of doing anything than what was said of them, or wrought.

Back to life, they were set like moving kegs, splattered by a magician’s saw, only that it happened again and again, without reason, without sense, without a simple explanation either or instead, they knew as little and did as much, and not a single soul awakened from the trance until whatever entity prolonged their suffering was done.

‘Off side!’

The first thing they remember hearing is the power-fan being turned on during their stay on the platform. Then the rack, a giant milk-bottle long and thin enough to droop hangingly before it’s turned toward the see-through hole in the wall. One of the faces appears on a lonely screen, someone familiar to everyone, but different, for everyone as well. A single baseball-glove ‘couch’ of iron being raised from the side-long down-empty hollow stretch, or the abyss, against which a drone’s being flung into, in a spherical see-through incubator, where it’s put like a fortune cookie cracked and crumbled small gray-greenish machine that smashes into the rack, then it’s pulled back down, where all junk belongs. There’s a ship, but they don’t see it fine. It’s in the distance, like a gun’s handle, twisted around, pointing at the sky, but the shaft it a rapier, lowered at a ‘floor’ level. A gust of fleeces filled with familiar faces come down running-cut through the metal fan, out of the socketed wall, where the appliances are momentarily turned off. Many.

Twenty. Maybe. Attendees. Most of them? Soldiers. Boys. Teenagers, no older than fifteen. Headed towards the door. Big-man machine comes in, Lightbulb-ship but leather, with a piston-giant worm-like put-in, their faces. It moves on stacked appendages, legs, it stole, ate the bodies, of the men it killed, inside the cafeteria-square, where it was met by its brother, the King of Souls, the magician of electronics. It has two eyes, like small and big, and they expand and shrink, like niggers just about to, getting lynched.

Some room not far away from them had an almost conjugal tone-delirium to it, echoing across the floors and walls:

The self-beneficiary, partially employed, non-sequester but made believe otherwise, sophistry, of an otherwise didactical age, whose hierarchical proximity lends the impression of an inclusionary breach, that is easily dismissible, contradictorily-so, by an umbrella of sophisticated classes, whose emulation would render them indistinguishable otherwise, with all taken into account, far less likely if the selected few approach, or are apprehended as to respond, to the level of scrutiny they would be shown, if their reproducible affairs got fully displayed onto the judgmental eye that confers the public voice an eligible appeasement for their equally-shown backlash, as for their failure of understanding of the humane intricacies of benevolence men of low rank are, by birth-right, incapable of properly appreciating, therefore, excluding themselves, as it's been aforementioned, by a puny-fault of ignorance, as it's been milled thoroughly in them, dried by the airless obstinacy, accompanied by crude remarks, failure of understanding why the people who've been raised where they are, not by chance or choice, whose call be lend onto others, among circumstances beyond their control, that left them in a state of cognitive insufficiency, of flour, bread, despite being offered the chance of joining in the pursuit, to an intolerable level of unassertive, hopeless, self-defeatist comfortable inaction, whose least resistance not only weakens but leaves them open as for the exploitative nature, belonging to the same people whose character would otherwise be deemed intolerable by any man whom had at one point in his life been introduced to a society of reason, renders the lower classes in an unutterably emasculated position, from their point of view, that only brings a distasteful disdain, a complete cut-off from this reality block, this inexistent curtain between them, this nothingness that's made seem as if it exist, in order to segregate themselves from others they would deem befit, as for their justified actions, to be walked upon, to an almost intolerable level, to an unacceptable degree of an unavoidable complacency, found, soon enough, to be inescapable in a sense of it having to be discussed at a certain point in time or another. This ideological divide can only be resolved with knives and bloodshed, violent murder and rape. Done by a giant mammal blimp sized, galleon-strident being whose curvature would only draw breath from a complete-out of planetary twisted, but not alongside the oblong 'depression', twisted contortion, keeping it all together, whose main body would appear to be made completely out of hundreds of giant V' or other kinds of scimitar-scythed but fat, drawn together by reigns of growth-coated organic belts, filled with much-lower and upper-unnatural almost hidden, secret compartments where humanoid-craniums are being stored in, kept under the warmth of an ever-breathing upon its own cartilage, unnaturalness that cannot be exalted. A spry foul-spread of hay-fat disease being carried soon-enough over by it. But only so, that, a customarily approach to the issue at hand not be miss-interpreted by the others, niggers have to be lynched; thoroughly; by it, the great beast that approached soon after, wretched as it were, like a fat fetus put inside a mechanical cup, whose outward pushed belly formed a downward blob-worm goblin-shark molded into a giant wide bathtub-stretch filled with many growths, appendages and wretched limbs it walked upon. Four great superficial wings appeared to be resting underneath its 'neck', although inexistent, it appeared to be sunken beneath a upward pointing canon with another one sprouting from its base, but pointed at an angle as to be connected to a frontward-pointing platform-like razor chin this weird, almost two canon fat gun with a half-cut cartridge, that bore a few pincer-shaped teeth coming out of the base and resting on the fat-bulk that pointed ahead. Two long eyes by its side, the fat beneath it, made of lumps, the strange metallic-cup bearing made strange devices, claws and electronic talons that would not move nor dare try shoving one another from the wretched healthful haze-miasma it was driven through and on. Beneath it, that compact, rounded mass but shrieked as if it were completely violent, arrogant, alive, and feeted by many beasts that hid inside. A brass orange clock-work rust, to the cup that help the purple-grayish, light reddish with violet-green put inside. Every wild appendage appeared to be a gray-shade that diverged into them, until they had become tar-like at their ends, with bubbling texture-skin pores drawing out of them. It called itself the Lord of Sophistry, Lyiev Horkonko!

Drawn was it, to the meeting place of nasty shipped by lightning sea-less strident trees of wild-palms and outlandish spark-producing apple-Mars; the moons of whom were empty caskets that had been willy-nilly darkly misplaced.

‘Why, I would think that, I would consider those beneath us to be highly-disposable, mechanically so, for it’s been cone, cones, cones, done so by their own choosing.

They are to be killed, insolent shits.’

Some bodies were drenched and butchered as the tall machines started driving in through the unseen doors, closed door where the machines were put through holographic dream-devices, by psychotic needles, inducing incubating panoramas with weird eyes that leaped about the panes, that flew from side to side until what little of the dark remains there were out there were swollen. Darkly was there a highlight after the song was over:

‘Will a man join in the barricade? There’s a little pane-device, painted as one would have it now, there’s something in there as well. Will you come in?’

‘Nay.’

The voice was propagated by a round intercom-thing, vintage-phone trimmed by the looks of it. A round receiver through which the voices that were being played, with, within and without were spoiled or had been spoiled once again by war, and wooden-looking floors. Some men entered the quick-stepped upon floor, trying to control themselves as well as their urges before they could resurface back to light, in a most embarrassing manner, loft of sought after.

Hidden there, strapped onto a chair, an insolent being whose body was wrapped in metal-bands crisscrossed with iron belts, all spiked and outwardly protruding, with a funnel-attached to his mouth, through which he both spake, breathed, and was fed through; they called, the Propagandist. Occupying a seat that’s been stolen by someone else who’s over-tuned limbs were belonged to a different era, strings alarmingly running down, at the end of his cut-off fingerless glove; where the stumps emerged as tiny pricks, lodged backwardly in, but they were not cut, his real hands, they were in the back, as these served as decoy in order to garter some pity out of any trespasser whose funny thoughts might have him killed otherwise.

There was some static noise of some kind as well as some chanting of 'Satanis' gone through static-velvet filters that rendered the frequencies somewhat obsolete as to what was going on among them, since, without a reason to fully open, the vouchers would run around to hands exchanged, like monkey paws driven out their way until no longer in service, money eventually deteriorating into a fleshy mass by their sides, many people, especially those who specialized in stock-exchange, the ones that were around him, by his side, or had been, since he could only remember what life had been like before they covered his eyes, taking away his sight only superficially, although the occlusion that slowly fell, slipped then covered a great portion of his face no longer bothered him, since he had found a new vocation:

'You have been assailed by the most unfathomable creatures there are, most wretched, leprous and eaters of rust and whatever it is, that you must be aware of, no longer producing the quantities desired of bubbly riddled with puddles and with cans, the iron reserves will fall behind, as usual unless you take the trash out. One of the canteen, yes, one of them is broken this very moment. They are eating out of it, the maggots, these filthy, good for nothing maggots, they're everywhere, they've infested everything, the walls the foam inside the walls. It sounds as if there can be no other way of getting rid of these devilish incarnates than.'

A hinge flung itself out of the door's socket, a man's lingeringly by his side second head, part of his carefully selected gratification module being still being visibly implanted in it, to a point where it stuck out as a Phalanx's in-between the gaps, thrust forward spears, being attached only by some faulty coal-en-coated wiring, whose serpenty wriggling made it feel as if the wooden shafted iron-bits were sugary-melting, beneath the shade of an oratorical sun-boastful lamp, that only now came to his view. A strange felling over-burdened his already complicit stupefaction as to the sound, perchance exchanged between the two of them at an almost indiscriminately, as to eradicate all chance of there being even a slightly miss-interpretable gauge, come as a result of the intermittent silence that followed soon after the 'event' in question, not longer being attributable to the misinterpretation of this being a venturing-forth object of very little importance whose covet-in, distinctly misplaced, visit, has, overstayed its welcome, therefore going ahead as to remove the possibility of it being anything other than a man, unspoken, conceptual level, that was somehow even more overly accentuated upon by the fact that, he was the devil, or at least one of them, the many, whose rationale was incumbent on the veridical antecedent of the more infuriating brackets of unaligned steps, having not been shown or to've had the nerve to actually impede on one self's more judiciary disposition, as for every jury's absence during which, foretold of, what, what could've been only the span of fifteen or so miles, incumbent on him at this point in time, as to open his mouth and draw attention to the fact that, if left unchecked, every single one of these 'angry' soless men could printlessly dissipate, by forceful gusts that would follow otherwise in his path, to the testimony of him being, by all accounts, to the point of having reached a point in the case where the court's call and judgment will have been declared as being final, irreproachably and without appeal, to an undisclosed amount being settled off-court, that he would not open his mouth as to reveal that, it was thus, that he spent countless hours of immobile stasis, as to redolently reassess where he had to go to, the direction, the right entry, that had hardly placed at the end of a sleazy poorly-lit staircase but instead it found itself hanging upon a remorseful portcullis-gate, whose exact placement was inside a see-through glassy pendulum, that was fancily adorned by various elongated cranial-lobe depressed giant crystalline-jewels, chained with most peculiar of iron-bolts that revealed themselves only in the most articulate manner of eloquence, adhering but not the least unimpressive, to their feat of having achieved speech at such a level where high-level discourse would only be beneficiary at that point of, incessant-insolence to a medieval monk, or some flimsy scribe, whose unadulterated Episcopal work led him to believe that the reproduction of the most-deserving of being well-preserved, to an archivist's contempt as to himself, as a man, confronted by the rationally driven realization that, at a certain point in time, you've been out-done by a much greater opponent whose unabashed level of skill is incontestably but overwhelmingly depressive as for the acceptance of being replaced finally took its toll, during the peak of which an insatiable feeling of horrendous dread wilt itself to life as to drive the 'wear' beyond the level he is in, this strange 'place' or state of mind he's been unfairly driven to, bordering suicide or at the very least the contemplative state of it, regardless if what one's put to mind plan is gone all the way through, a thing only known to him, carried all the way to the grave, unless others be made aware of, or have found him out, alchemical secret, of no less redundancy than the 'trivial' pursuit of the holy grail of immortality, the philosopher's stone, whose last map has also been placed in his care, but to the gift of the cob's Devil's silver tongue's benefit of the doubt lend onto, this great defender of the Pendulum had in turn actually, unstably reared its ugly head-in, as to intrude upon the barely, upon finality, arrived onto the sight of, although finally brought onto the awareness that this gate had not made him appear inside the room but a few feet away of, a thing that could be traced back, but eerily surmised by a subtlety of such an uncanny, obscure level that it would've garnered a cult-following, a status afterwards owned, but earned solely by means of wit alone, in terms of wordsmith, and how finely it had crafted its insults, double-tapping them with multiple meanings, of such vague congruence, that it could be interpreted as anything, leading him, in a more befuddled state of being completely lost in this unfathomably colossal labyrinth of gates, open-and-closing doors, domed roofs, fly-through hoofs that would blind or take one's sight away, being representative of the chaos, in some way, he had to go through in order to get to meet the famed being known as the Propagandist, there was not a single simile of a doubt as to the profound, yet ill-placed adoration, conflated with a level of unsanitary resentment towards himself for having stored all of his pains as well as his bottled rage, in every step he's taken along the way, stored, once again, or encapsulated in a moment of self-conflict as well as an appeasement to his self-determination, that, without a doubt, eerily stands at the crossroads of disappointing this man, this actual man, for he was, a mortal in flesh and blood, in every sense of the word, by choosing or resorting to actively bore him with such trivialities of thought that, by the end of it, he will have seen, not with the help of precognition despite having and being fully aware of the extremities beyond the common-partialities of rifts and outer reaches his mental-instability could dread to thread up, forcing himself to cross the threshold of time and space, as to flung himself in an eternal lucid dream of divination, witnessing cyclical events resurfacing once again through the most fancy-looking filters, that would somehow save him from the shame of making himself appear a fool, without taking into account that this extreme sight could somehow lead him into the same place, where he would be met by the same choice, or, he might rather simply shut his filthy fucking mouth instead of opening it and saying something extremely dumb, uninteresting, that the Propagandist could store in his mind and use at a later time, although at this point the sheer-bred paranoia could take hold of him instead, creating the most sanctimonious nightmarish lucidities his sick, indolent mind could come up with, within the minutes of still-instilled disquiet during which he was still, definitely, yeah, under the consideration of him not being aware of his presence, whereas these nightmarish contortions, twists of the most maligned manner, raised at a level, such as one could very much be inclined to think that, so many unnatural listeners would be led to believe that inside his every step, those left behind, some grotesque abomination of lightened fire-soliquity could inbreed within itself, the walls, the material, the atoms, the drawing of the curtains, raising of the slabs, peeling off of fingers, drawing of the blood, melting of the iron, torture be derived, out of the screams of agony that echoed, through the channels of the sickest minds, the flock, the Sheppard and the villagers to follow a lead, whose incessant dream of distillation would have one but gnawing at his own nasty feet, in order to drive the nasty thoughts again, the ruffians being present there now, bearing dark-suns globes they carried like flags, whose mere position was plastered upon the most irresolute plains of quiet there was, since it was no better time than him, being stuck out-right holding a foot in the air, being lowered only after four mints, he began chewing instead of suckling on because of the dryness his palette and mouth cleft was, with them being anything but mouth-watery, adding more to the salty-spread of A Republican's noisy work-through a saw of many faces' attempt to bury them in a soil that would be un-watered afterwards for more than twelve or so consecutive months, spent prayingly in a God's chosen humble Abode of prayer, that change will come one day, that the system will fall so traditionalism could start over, as society would go through an accelerated reset, of values, of qualities, of the constitutionally elected figure's reprimand untold, little being said afterwards, as the youth's fleet and flights, the carriages and couches of liberty's sublime delight, that they had fought for in the name of old, but ancient, and forgotten rites, to their parents' carried over lights, to the fall of the lady and her yet-to-be-perched from blown-upon gust of proud spoil, of little to be left, none, until the moment where there will be no one left around to tell of what happened after, next, to the impressionable pupils, whose nights of study, of past events yearned but little rest to what was kept of the old world, they have yet to meet the likes of, now that the greatest race of men is gone, that they have fought bravely but history, eventually run into the ground, wilt their existence a shade of what was known to men who had been alive during the age when they were still around fading as well. During that age of regret, spent idealizing what would've been, romanticizing about the most beauteous of them still, of achievements gone, their hearts and art, and what they've put through in order to achieve what they have, forlorn and soundless, as the barbarians have run it all into the ground. As the soulless Semites, whose little minds could not be helped, the insufferable Negro whose destruction would come again, the Mongol of whose hordes but try, but neither one would suffer their existence tried as to compete on head to toe, with the man of European's woe. Whose brightened light, of yet sublime, had shone the strongest, but fell to time. For none other was as strong, as to step in line and face the greatest of mankind. Contortions, hybridizations and the most wretched of beings, the most arrogant of fiends with as little to no self-respect, nor well-earn pride, but chosen as of flight or yet to hide, of anything but fight, was there left, no more hope. A disgraceful abode, a hollow nest, of nectar's protruding tap but broken and left inside, a place of chaos and of disintegration. Damned as everyone, of little bow, of little knowledge and of little more creation; such dreams it had whenever felt, to have known beauty and to have lost it time and time again. To have that all resting at the ends of a tap, to be aware of the destruction of the world, when everyone else had thought that the world will not die, of means that would have them tied, to no place and to no people. To no purity, but to evil; that is but what is left of the world, he thought, and as he pushed on, knowing where to touch, how to annoy, how to anger thoroughly with each ploy, the Propagandist had dazzled the devil's mind; whose hatred for all mankind had dolefully declined once met by images of what man-kind created. If only jews were cremated. Or at the very least EXTERMINATED;

And then a great bird-cut in half aviator-creature bearing a giant-volatile boil-filled with fluid-growth coming out of its wing, where hundreds upon hundreds of wild appendages started sprouting as they went everywhere, connected with every piece of the wall they could flail themselves against, lodging one another as the echoes of various infestations occurred, bearing, inside of it, hundreds of elevator-compact units in which peculiar humanoids hid inside of. Niggers getting lynched, their giant inflated bodies being filled with dead kike-children as well as dead-weight bashed in the head women as well:

‘I am the Well-Centauri Demonical cysted heart of oozing Darkness! ‘

The heart finally spoke as its laughter-cackle created a room that was made out of velvet stretched and contorted moving textured curtains of magentas that kept changing in colors, flashing with spikes as libraries started flying out of the walls, revealing hundreds of levitating clothes that served as book-covers for the Eye-protruding filled with pus-destroyers with many hands, forming bands of arms that kept volatile colored glowing transparent globe with signs inside of them, bearing long-guns that began shooting the niggers that started flinging themselves in, trying to snicker-job themselves in during charge, past-through blocks of little notes and documents that were sent flying all around them at an unfathomable speed that would otherwise make all tremble at the mere sight of.

The Propagandist then raised out of his chair, unsheathing his fake as well as his real arms from beneath his frock, revealing, what he had kept hidden there for all this long. Hundreds of swords his spikes then began wielding. Part of his face was become God. A rocket came out of his forehead, as he charged through the room, running while flailing, shredding everything in his path, as he was charged by countless look-a-like bodies his body leaped against like a sack of dead-sang or a nasty fucking prop that flung itself at them, spinning. As he was reminded of his place of birth, the plains of Ghua.

But there was another thing, uncannily standing, a few feet away from them, in a room that almost appeared to be abandoned but it was still moving, despite the many saws and the electric panels that had been lodged in and out, through and around, seething with leprosy of wounded steel bleeding through the various gaps in the forage-like construction that had been left over before the workers were allowed in, with them in charge, nothing could go wrong, the company’s motto. Since they were long and puffy and made to bifurcate through steel, fat and many helmeted around their many sprouts, one end lodged inside, by them and around, but not a single one made noise while approached by the eeriness of the place, below the walking areas, where not a man was supposed to keep watch. Nor would he do, nor would he try. A little more than a few uncanny things happened, some events that transpired while they were being around, no longer aware or fully conscious of what was going around them, that’s where the time to strike was fully revealed, for the appeal of the place was not through steel but through them. Presently surrounding every intruding thought and everything their peers missed while carrying the many colors and the shades whose tracts had on-laid the walls. Some of them fell over, others were very much aware of the pinkish-bloody mucus that was spread. A few flies here and there signaled the growth of something that would occupy two or three quarters of every single flinging, sprouting, and yet demanding of reality being, intermission of woe, floundering spectral disciples whose bodies chained, incapable to refrain, swam like mermaid-jellies with all of the chains being turned into flails as they were forced to yet again search for something that usurped their quiet. A few drills, hammer and hammock-held half-claw hands that carried inside of them, half-seeds of iron-wounded carapaces whose lower sides appeared to be powering these livid devices, many of whom acted upon the alarmingly-fast triggered response to their conditioning, aimed where to hit and assault, to create alloy-trauma wherever they’d be directed towards, while here and the, titter or anywhere, if that was even the slightest matter of contrivance, one would know, a bayonet shone in the distance, but a green-yellowish light followed out of it, as the riddling middlemen between each world, whose puckery faces and bodies appeared to contort, unnaturally like spirals that would never in their lives had come to such a need to show or come around to any sense at all, as to deviate the spray and come along the way, they had been ruined, spread, destroyed-distorted, maliciously benign, in such ways of pus-and-wings, they descended, niggardish at such command, as to have themselves driven out through drivel-hoe, ripped apart by each stalagmite-iron spinning sword, whose outwardly-protruding might, and in the lack of frightlessness-alive the workmen stood content, with as little as a simple check around. All had reached about the same conclusion, that had been, to them, as countless-eyes stared back at them, in this falling apart place, filled with only the vigor that came from above, that would find itself uncannily forlorn if allowed to fall on deaf ears that would've found themselves, for lack, or lackluster, empty-tracks of blown-out pieces, jerkily aware, distraught, a sea of glaives or bloody knives, the empty trails left over by a sea-filled shark, whose body had become transparent as for one to see the water and every insoluble creature that from this point onward to the end of time, would find himself, the individual, living inside, incapable of refraining himself from the incessantly annoying yet pitiless attempt that would result, time after time again without a chance to do something or allow them a chance to push themselves, about, a place they could finally reign free and spread, regardless of the drainage that would sweep away all mankind, from this floating sea-benign, shark of no mind, whose manipulation would only fall apart, when and during the sudden spread, of a mighty encased, prior, and post-pop, the domino-effect, of blood that would drown them all or at least bring such dreaded promises of a predaceous, promiscuous infestation, whose infallibility on a base of supreme wide-spread entity-driven base-by-base jump-upon, proximity 'test' would result into, not only a complete bastardization in terms of a quantifiably, real 'result'-like contortion of a fascicular failure as to immunize oneself properly, a thing to such degree of nano biologically adaptive as well as an adherence to one's ability to change oneself at a physiological level of complexity, but also into an unnatural blockage, reverse drainage whose complete blood-anchoring regretfully reported on, clotting to a level of solidifying strain whose microscopically indulgent as to allow, every now and then, an organism to survive by simply encasing it in an amber-like formation of clot in which they would apparently survive by siphoning air through blood cells, regardless of the form and the state they're in, which would in turn serve as a pointer to the fact that they did in turn change or adapted themselves to their environ. The workmen whom were stuck there, working in these filthy, uncomfortable positions, being very much forced to lay in a state beyond that which a normal person's quality of live would ail him to enter the dark hopeless abode that had appeared out of one of the walls, which had been lowered from one of the top levels but was uncannily deranged, enough for it to make little sense as to the next point on their list. To deal with it, for there was no way to put it; a metal head, sculpted to a chisel's fine print in the middle-half split, figure, the figure, the only figure that made, nay, no other could be, no other person but the Prosecutor-machine, the one inside of which, the body itself still squirmed, although the state it was left in was something no one and absolutely no one could even possibly agree upon as to derive any sense or any notion, as to, whether or not it was still alive. Wretched salinity in which it swam:

'Look, look, something's still pouring out of him, I knew it, I knew it, I told you all about it.'

'And what are we to do about it then? I feel.'

A most pernicious instability of mind had cranked some of his inner thoughts as to contemplate whether or not the other workers were to be allowed to survive under his watch to a salient level that itself would not do. Since met by an irresponsible irreparable dent in their cooperation, it was done, set and curbed into stone, what little soliquity he could share between the other man, whom he had seen as a brother but no longer, as this interruption spoiled him as to allowed a cumbersome burst, entrained, by the realization that he enjoyed his peek into this world of no-sounds and fathomless up-rounds he could drown himself into but to no death, until he could find a drinking buddy. Not yet:

‘It’s opening, it’s opening its mouth! Sail way, make say as to leave this site and never return!’

Of what fumigating reed, or branch of heed, was there to look, what a hill of verdure, but a rock, therefore lain, farther and farther away, in the back, at the back of a ‘trolley’, in which the old polluted soils were put in, many of which, having grown a little since last seen. But this was undeniably a groove and within in, they were drawn towards a bickering tick. One whose many faces and many legs were drawn behind and formed into an altar-like formation. Yet this bloated body was anything but touchable, and impossible as to puncture or to penetrate, no slicken stick or sharpened pointed hook whose lance might char, or fill with tar or burn everything that came into its sight could change that very fact. Immeasurably distraught, and caught within the coils there stood a few giant trees and a few bridges that now lay connected to many clouds, or something in between. Having taken a whip or straddle, a spread right after, it had eaten and devoured most if not all life. It would’ve made a difference to anyone else but them, for they had little care and never asked, nor refrained to approach it:

‘Who are you and why have you showed up here?’

‘No, you mongrel, ask him the right question, ask him the right question. Where is the Prosecutor, we need to talk to him, on an immediate notice, for he is important and cannot be made to wager the slight and sight, remorseless cry, and lest abode, of tried for now.

We shall not wait for a puddle of insolent being, a growth, for if you took the time to look around, you would’ve know what’s already been shown to us. It ate everything in sight, everything organic, at least, in freight.’

‘I see that you’re alone now, and you’ve been trying to improve on your machine in the same way the Sami have been trying to plunge into their Inca-seas of Spanish blood-exchange during the march of the fire-trampolines during the war of ages past’s coming of the age, when naught was asked for when they rode in short.’

‘When’s the calling forth?’

A shooting range, he pointed to as he pointed forwardly no longer, as its worth was calculated, being stronger than docile-set.

‘A worn out man with rugged mouths has once told me of something that happened there, an incident if you will.’

‘Tell me about it then!’

‘I cannot, as you know what they do with traitors, correct?’

They’re fed to it, the piece of the mountain, the ‘stalagmite-tooth-bat’, this wretched piece of wriggling meat sticking out-deprave. This yellowish-white-pale, this one’ footed, chicken legged- fat, whose mouth is open-spread from one side to the other, with tubes coming out of it, as puffy as the rest of it fleshy body, trying to cover for the fact. A hole and a eyeless holes for sockets, a long plate of a face, but fat, like a raft, with a puffy globe sticking out its head, the entirety of its body contorted like some disgustingly deformed giant primordial axe. Oozing with greenish-yellow, grayish-purple, metallic down some sides, standing upon the hollows of the entrance to the mountain-cried –for deformed look-alikes they called its saints. For the top of its body looked almost like a holy icon bearing a pussing halo for its head. A one footed plated thing as well, covered in some viscous gel that kept dripping away from sight. It seemed like a mirage, too surreal to exist at time, disgustingly deformed, but joined by a wall of skinless-toil that rummaged in its skin as well. Not a single word swollen between, but many like them, inside, but called within the hour:

‘Gather, gather, gather around, there’s another one down here who’s been brought to feed you with, but don’t make the same mistake of thinking it too weak, or else, you may be met by something else you wouldn’t like being met by.’

The Connoisseur wriggled his moustache again. They raised themselves like strange panes, their ‘tails’, these feet without talons and fingers being jerkier, more eely-like than their mounted on top the entrance counterpart, and that for a good reason as well. The entire cave had been flooded, hence the change, hence the sacrifice and the strangeness of the thing that prevailed among them.

A jerkiness quite eerie; but met by open-guts. Screams of the sonar power, swarming like empty-bowelled rats, trying to get as many nibs, as many reeling in-swarming in, burrowing, hose-drips as they could, never letting go as to allow reproach, so much so as to avoid whenever one would happen-so.

‘Another man devoured, children, but this time I expect much more, far more than I’ve been granted by you long before, and do not let me catch you slacking either, or else I shall, I shall only.’

A disciple, here?

They belonged to some unnatural lot that was more than often deemed to be too, rather uncannily yet exclusively innocuous as well as incompatible with every other non-disciple like figure that either appeared to be inside of them, or, for all intensive purposes outside of them as well, wrapped around some meager mechanical arms that pushed out of them, holding them together, as to pierce and prod, everything out of their reach then become theirs to command in whichever way they wanted since the prisoners themselves did not disagree with their treatment, nor would they make much sense out of it, if someone else tried doing something disgraceful or propagate some type of alien-like behavior that would eventually throw them off-balance. Tall, dark shady figures, all wearing robes, the Disciples were all about kidnapping people and wrapping them around their bodies, these rods of many roots that wrapped but came out only during the night, when it was safe to finally open their pupils, dark, shining-almost spherical things, light-bulbs of some kind that devoured everything that was even remotely, feasibly said, related to skin, yet the light never protruded inside their robes despite their cowls and hoods always wrapping their heads, in-and-out then all around; throughout the year, they sickled the dead-horses, dressed in them, but cut off the front legs, and out of them, no-blood but some viciously leaping about liquid that appeared to be something of its own making and wont, that entered the walls at will, then leaped inside non-horse humanoids, inducing dreams of horses without legs, whose heads were in the hundreds, but sockets empty, with the exception of the holographic gist n’ clouds of lightning flashes that they produced, no sooner, no later than anticipated either, since they were bastardly trying to regurgitate what they encompassed themselves in, these men, soon enough, the same, who found themselves sleep-walking appeared to be inducing fits of vomit upon themselves as to contaminate the water-reserves the entirety of this secluded living-quarter appeared to bear. Many toxin-bearing horses appeared to have crawled back to life, through this sea of youth that allowed them to rise, from the depths of their darkened dampened graves out of which they thought themselves incapable from refraining, so much so, as it would be deemed unfittingly disturbing, then disjointed from reality, to the wingless creatures of metal that fell, then coiled and were become but adornment for the halls they were trapped inside of, only to draw away, for no reason whatsoever, judging by what was happening there, by means of adoration, they were not stopped from interacting with the man that stood guard in the water-drainage refinery of liquids-processing unit room where most of them, most of these horse-like beings had avoided death only by the mere chance of a whim that had saved them from complete evisceration at the hands of giant constantly rotating blades that even now actively swung, since they were shaped like butter-knives and had rounded joints and turned-then-twisted around mechanisms that allowed them to completely change not only their general direction but every possible arc there was, slashing, hitting and eviscerating everything to a degree of mechanical flexibility unseen by anyone else, as it was sloshed, clutched, then turned-around, then twisted, then cut-down, then shot-up, again, then against the force that tried forcing this strange blade connected to a tiny jerky livid- cartilage', that being the piece of resistance, when it came to the machine, that allowed for the full-roundabout of destruction that followed soon after, yet again dumb-founded by the very mechanical 'unnaturalness'-provided oxymoron, 's full force force-endowed thrust as well as the various additions of motions that ensued a total annihilation, in terms of ethnic-water cleansing, which treated every water-molecule, at times, at the very least, by design, as if they were kikes or niggers, while at times they had been treated as if they were something, far closer to females, to women, than the abhorrent inferior 'races' or bubbles that were constantly being crushed underneath and beneath the blades of supreme destruction, whose propellant nature allowed to inflict such a thing of beauty that it was a marvel how these horse-being even surviving, although it was unclear, there was something at works there that interfered with the normal function of the blades, or as to lay it all too clear, there was an on-going suspicion, that was therefore emulated fartherly by the guard, as for the presence of foul play no longer obscuring the possibility of there being something as degrading of deterring as this thing, this wretchedness-foul that threatened to allow the worrisome spread of the beings back into existence, these being the same beings he alone had no desire to be made or brought into account or near with, or of, since he loathed their enfolding presence to a point where he pulled out his laser-pistol, carefully steadying his arms, cocking himself slightly backward, aiming with a great amount of breathlessness others might've considered unfitting for this kind of situation, especially when the sheer number of every specimen out there had been taken into account, to this point, they had been working to, finally out of 'danger's' reach, since it was revealed that the laser-pistol, self admittedly, was fully-loaded with laser-blanks, which defeated his initial purpose, having not used or even verified that at any point in time at all, because of the very, clearly defined, unnecessarily-deemed, nature of his job, which in turn left him armed or equipped with a toy-gun of some 'LOW-CALIBER', that didn't work, as in, at all, it simply didn't work, because, because it was like one of those tiny hand-held carry-it-in-your-pocket fake-lasers you'd flash in people's eyes, incapable of actually doing any damage whatsoever, but at most resulting in some kind of annoyance, maybe some disturbance and some distraction that would hinder one's span, indirectly causing harm, an accident, or some roadside-kill, usually followed by the open palm-blocking the light that's being flashed in your eye hand motion as to stop the light from flashing in your eye so you don't get hit by a car; you'd buy, cheaply, especially if on 'sale' – although that would be an overkill, from some back-side of the town's oil station you'd stop along the way while headed to California, Tennessee or Texas, thinking you could enter this almost 'convenience-store', not only to pay for gas, but wanting to buy a pack of cigarettes, Pallmaul, bootliquor, but you thought it would be funny if you actually lynched the nigger serving you since he's a terrible, terrible host you don't like the head or the face of, since they're, generally speaking, visually unappealing for most people, mostly because of their ugly small heads and their ugly-dark skin, wide noses, big lips as well as their insatiable desire to commit a lot of crime that's mainly expressed in their tiny, always red-from consuming a lot of crack eyes; you wouldn't find yourself feeling safe around him, since, you know what they're like, from either what you've heard or the general experience you had with these 'people'; and you thought it'd be funny if you purchased one of these tiny flashing-it-in-people's-eyes laser – you'd want to test it out immediately after buying it, just so be sure you didn't waste your money on, and weren't scammed, but you're too afraid to do it on the nigger, although you're tempted, you're incredibly tempted, like the Devil's on top your shoulder whispering in your ear 'Flash it! Flash it! Flash it in the nigger's eyes! Play with monkey a little! The nigger, the nigger! This is the light of the police! The nigger fears being flashed by the police! The nigger, the nigger, flash him while the siren goes Yiiii-uuuuu, Yiiii-uuuuu, Yiiii-uuuuu, Yiiii-uuuuu!' but you know better than that, since the nigger has a gun, like they all do, on them, at all times, even in convenience stores or public places; while also there's a robbery, since more niggers are headed into the store and when there's a lot of niggers in, something's about to go down extremely quick, as in get down, get down boy before these nasty-monkey niggers put you down your early grave – kind of fear flashed into the guard's eyes while it all happened. These nasty wretched bags only lowering and heaving themselves on top of one another's bodies in order to gain some height, in order to culminate into the strange structural formations they decided it would be worthy of them to be put back into, back together and once again, to the unnatural appeal of trying to steal a slight, hindrance.

Second and fourth disciples:

'I am saddened, are you not? Are you already gone in that place I fathom not be around of, when they call onto me to call you back from whence they've taken us, in a palace of dark remorse?

The tip of twisted thin iceberg cowl-fallen lumps of iron where they melt; constantly un-erect and unable to stand on top their feet, I wager there's as less as a command for either as there's few but reprimand soon after, as to listen to us, abhorrent-woe. I lack the time needed to search for someone that would understand where I'm coming from. I fear yet I'm saddened, as my arms are so befallen that I may never see a change in my command, I would never understand what they've seen in us, unless you help me so. I'd rather know that be as blinded as they'd have us wreath in the shadow's cone, where we waited before you came, and arrived at the right hour, taking me away before the cruelty could stumble, trampling upon my wreathing sin, I lack in wonder, sea, as such, of blunt-resin. I would've known no less, I would've sekt no reason to impress upon you what I've come to understand, yet no man would understand my loss, what I've come to yearn for such release, as I cry each in night and weep on dark command, when it comes down to my understanding, of what they've done to me during sleeplessness abhorrent; taken as they did away, and come tumbling down the rolls of hay, I see no reason yet to stay where we still are. I'm afraid they'll eventually come after us, then slay whatever's left of worship, destroy every candied-altar, done of bloat-ship, we must flee! I seek of loft abhorrent tree that we may speak to it, and broken such command of silent as I ask you now, please speak to me, my dear friend, dear worshipper, disciple that there is come upon the end. I seek not to reprimand each bowel, or to feed the ones that would have cowered by the time we're come. But I see now, without a doubt, that there are things they could not forgive, as to retrieve what's taken from us, I seek but blasphemy's antiphony. I seek but reason, you've grant me none. I seek but treason be spoiled for me, but rottenly are you but gone whenever my deepened voice there lay, to have been said, and cyanide as there is of lumps and bubbling soap, of lee and deep convey, whatever thrust, and whether cast, and whether you've come to the same conclusion, deeply sunken, there at last, I seek but disillusion. To break the tusks of bleak illusion, that have been spoiling my eyes with blinds, broken homage of gum-forth lain but armed with time, I'm fallen back, descend no more where they've come to take me away, when I'm gone; I seek no more to have but one continue, whatever son there, whatever bastard would sign, my deep reprise, of pantomimic vowels sung, when come upon, and there be gone. Where to have created but an echo of whom I were, and where to have entrusted but a reason as to seek of grim-repair? Where to have been thrust along, and come upon but spoiled surround; I feel as if I'm blissfully un-listened, I seek but son, but he's but cyst of broken cistern; he would not understand. But for that I can't and may not blame him, for I have stood in the same irksome place, the prowl, I've searched for something in my youth, when they have seen me as I've lain each scowl, emptily forlorn. Yet I seek company no more, knowing that you've taken something of me, luridly lugubrious crimson worn of flocks of spools lend upon the mighty cruel, to have been witnessed by them once, when rode, upon mighty tall and gritted horse, would've been a timeless honor that I would've accounted no mourning similitude. I would've sekt no misfortune being corrected, but in turn, cruel. It's as much and as likely as there is but the fact that I'm lain with, to have been dragged, and trailed, to have known what mighty rivers' sound or wails, upon the bouncing of the flails to have been lain by ripple-cast with each whip-lash cast upon the margin of the fumigating tearing tar a blaze. To have felt the heat that would but scowl and to have it cowl before each maze, and cast thereafter as for every and each tower more; the ones that fell as every stone, as every boulder chucked and come about, and therefore cast upon each brat and bastard child that cross, a bridge at last, but lacking worth, no man abhorrent, but I seek no worth to contemplate on them and what they've done. Of the beckoning of a lost war, to which side I see myself to have belonged, to have run in ruse and feel respite, and cower as I'm found about, and torn by sunder, and bloom in this regard. I gaze at little and see as less, knowingly in waiting quiet, that there might be no son of mine, oft memory of such impress, onto him of what I've seen, onto him of what would've been, if I were there, and cast in river shaft to die, and pain the rubble, and those who'd laugh at me, whenever they would see such sad-attempt, to lump myself in deeper vowel, to have seen as such, and cast away each stubble, each time risen, oft every little ripped apart rose, of the hillish vales, and mountainous reaches' come onto me as well. For them I would've fought till death, for that chance to impart on him, but time would have it all they say. Time would turn to rubble straight away, and spittle-scum on every song I've sung, and each memory forgotten when the time, but yet've come. I would've felt some anger, cast away. I would've sung right after, but there they stay. In the same place, as every man, to have such faces as I would've seen on any other man, but mine. Mine is one that many have failed and still do, to realize, it does not belong, torn away, uncherished. For no son of mine would fare quite well, to look-a-like to such cowardly rues, to have been blessed with flocks of golden truce, to have been spilled with eyes of eerie sea-alike, to anyone. Yet I seek to have bestowed onto you, my friend, whose stand-in-place, and yet embrace, of cold as I have felt no breath, to come and stove, no fire in your heart, but stolen. To have you listened to, but worsened, I would lack in such command to ask; knowingly aware that you would have me lust for yet another word, if said. I seek to cast this silence away, again and again; but you've done me no such gift, nor more.'

Many of the walls that had been contaminated by the grayish disease that moved from one point to another swaying, leaping sneeringly with some violent debauchery expressed by the pure anger of mourning-contemplation, as if bred to life by the sudden passing of a man, or a family member, expressed in ember, while also being light-flashed upon by one of the lights that were being audibly turned on and off, on and off, click after click by a tall squarish, automaton-junk device machine with an atom-bomb round-compounded tip of the head where most of the mechanisms, including large prototypically yet-to-be-tested cognition devices made as to imitate the likeness of man from time to time in terms of artificially clay-like alloy imbued with some other similar patented by chemical compound reinforced components that were meant for an unrelated usage, yet had been repurposed for this fine reason, whether inconvenient or not, as one might come to think it was, dumb-founded or by deceit, as the man hiding in the 'broom'-closet, near the long-stretch of eleven hundred miles or so, shaking violently, since he could not, and this was a most definite thing, he could not help himself but violently yet viciously shake as well at the extreme noise that was being made by this incessantly annoying machine that kept pounding one of the walls with its one free mechanical arm; an alloy of some weird compound normally found in the Sebaceous-insects of Angroa-Yk, large and nasty things shaped like tear-drops come out of puddles if they were shot inwardly out of some fine Englishman's signaling of his status as a member of the upper class, high-classed, classy, but with a sprinkle of modernity being shone upon his contemporaries, a bourgeoisies of fine-shrouded laces of black and blue and rims around each blackened sun-dome disc made, most likely by some diamond trade low-life worker as a side-job in order to afford food as otherwise he would be colossally fucked by the wages that under normal circumstances do not allow people like him to survive by any discernable mean at all, since he lives in a recognizably third world country that's also failed, at an unfathomably repugnant to the common sense of man, being borderline insulting to him, by all accounts, to pass the human rights quotient that's been used since the inception of the United Nations' World-wide Protection of Global-Human-Rights' Violations', Intrusion-Indoctrinatory Alteration so it may not happen again directive – standard, but they're Gooks so they don't matter as much as niggers do, or at least the liberals would have us all believe that the life of a nigger is somewhat worth more, to the point of outnumbering him one to one hundred in terms of the value of his life, on which you cannot put a price on, but that didn't stop anyone before; yet whose plight, the Gook's, responsible for the well fashioning of the fine Englishman's sirs buttons, might as well be thrown out the window, since he is an insect after all whose life is meant to serve only as a means to raise the quality of life of people who are far more intelligent and of a far more superior racial extraction as well as a finer stock than his; alongside a magnificently tailored to the point of every strand of silk that's made the man's embroidery being, well-enough, admittedly laced with sub-atomic sized molecularly worked on tiny blue-cobalt, made by strain as well as by rubbing molecules together with the help of some peculiar high-societal technologically automated device, whose nuclear core is responsible for the powering of quantum computers, the quantum computers responsible for calculating the entire mass of the ever-expanding universe at all times, located somewhere in Prague, in some infinitesimal-cluster of fake-secret experimental Governmental facility-esque decoys, funded by the Government as well as the tax-payer's money nonetheless, whose existence depends solely on filtering the spies, the moles as well as anyone else who'd undersell the country and sell state-held secrets; whose funding comes from a private source, yet it's clear enough that, this thing, this device is responsible for creating, again, a state-held secret as well, although the usage of would diminish, if it were found out, or if this secret were to spill nation-wide, would turn this entire institution, actually institutions, that are solely responsible for this travesty which is a huge waste of money that's exchanged not for the betterment of human kind but instead for vanity, and to be more precise, the vanity of a few, elite-but, this one, this fine English man, the clever-man he is, somehow lucked out into an elite suit by counterfeiting the buttons, replacing them during what could only be believed as being the greatest heist in human history, where he somehow, on a late October flashy day of winds' Autumn last call of gust during the reign of frost's ever come, during intervals of lightning struck of golden changing into, from sun's stroke, into flashes of blue, come to pass, morrows, of flights of birds and stoles that come and fly after but are never caught and are never asked to leave or what happened during which, the winter's abode is finally let known that it is time to leave soon after; stumbled on this suit, which was in the laundry room in some elite business man, one percenter's laundry room he happened to be in, the house of, conveniently wearing an uglier suit of a much lower quality-entailed but that looked alike to his, and knowing them, he thought, in general that is, considering, he wouldn't, most likely would not noticed if the man got gypped out of his 'most' valuable possession; as it's clear enough hat he pulled out the buttons, replaced it with his, then simply, left the mansion, with little said about his undertaking task as well as his apparent skill in embroidery which could only serve as a sign of his low-born origin, and this suit, that now were coupled with some 'trendy' pants that looked nasty and awful, serving as nothing else but some 'fashion' statement that said nothing else or implies that he hates niggers; an alloy, nonetheless that made it seem as if he had a tiny ant farm inside his bubbly-rounded, top of a torpedo head, with giant spores as well as other abacus-calculations-capable-of performing apparatuses that spun in place, then ran-around and moved down the frame of a barrel-like body that diverged into many, strangely red-filled with rust corrugated plates with hundreds of smaller-spear bar legs that were welded in, had wired-in welded-machines sunken it, pushing like pistons in order to 'fancy' it up with the ardor of pain, sweat, as well as, confusedly so, shown, outrage, that was clearly displayed and shown, at the fact that he only had a mechanical arm he used to pick up on that lead-bar, whose echoes, propelled against the tightness of the hall he had been charging as well as he had been, having been performed by him already for several if not hundreds of times, performing this for countless consecutive hours, weeks, days, years, with that bar as well, confused-still by the fact that it was immortal and that it could not die, indestructible, as well as the man, in that 'broom' closet, who was a humanoid-organic immortal creature but who could feel pain-still and knew, or was aware of, that if it left, opened the door, revealed, revealing himself further, even if attempted, would be met by the same treatment, while going through endless simulations in his head made of calculations of what would happen if he did this, or that, this plan, no, this would fail, he'll beat me to death, he was the same Englishman after all, and this rotten to the core thing that he still wore was the same suit he's been wearing for countless generations, now made out of human faces in part he had sutured to, since there was no other compatible material and this was actually fitting in some way, since, they, the people whose sweat had undergone a great revolt, clearly expressed in the mix-of liquids that had spilled once, then provoked some convoluted chemical altering, aleatorily-speaking, random- reaction whose chance of happening, with a margin of error of about zero point fifteen percent or so, was close to zero point fourteen percent, so far being a thing of dreams, that a primordial, as to consider the fact that it actually happened, liquid which carried the soul of every Gook that's been killed in those sweatshops had managed to have a last laugh not only at the him but at humanity as a hole since he was the last human alive, the last well-preserved, unchanged, unhinged, by the biological time-line, humanoid being, the original, an Adam, without an Even, sitting upon a crack on the ground, which had been eroded, at the threshold of falling into a pit, through a system of old, unkempt and not-well-preserved pipes, air-ducts, pipes, iron- 'vaults', valves, rooms that would show no actual resistance whatsoever against the domino-effect that would eventually lead him to his untimely 'end', being trust in a graveyard of trunk and junk, where he would lay-trapped inside of, for an eternity he could not escape out of, from, being inescapable; albeit a terminal, yet incongruous fear present only in the men who found out, during the rush of DMT happening inside the brain during the time of one's death, where the only thing stopping him from hitting the 'joint' was a sudden wake to reality, as he would be flashed by two flashy, lightning-crackling with power boxing-gloves of thunder worn by the paramedics, bringing him back to life, as it all stopped, as it all happened, when he, the man wearing a flesh-worn-filled with faces suit, the man with an apparently disclosed fear of emergence out of the animalistic hole he has been driven in for so long, having reverted, partly to an instinctual, primeval state holstering itself between an earlier primitive hominid he would almost be taken out of the state of, only to be pulled inside a much-later, closer to the modern humanoid Hunter-Gatherer state of being, predisposed to fits of rage, queerly expressed by violent attempts of trying to shake off the walls as well as the door out of its hinges, by BRUTE MAN FORCE, niggardly painted as nothing other than some villainous, fined by a COP, fifteen million years ago, something that flashed in his mind during this tormenting moment of terror-driven episode of PTSD he had to suffer living through, as if it wasn't enough; whereafter, one thing that couldn't be avoided in his sight, as his head-bobbed in thither and tether then everywhere if not the slightest of hints being presented, of his cozy-blasted by some moisture that appeared to run over his head and on top of him by the end of a tap that was kept running a few floors above, signaling the return of one the upper-cybernetic equipped by large cannons that made their chests, limbed by appendages forming half-ellipses when put together as if they were aerobic-instructing teachers uniting their fingertips above their heads, guns starting to burst at first sight like pregnant women twisting around themselves in hula-hoop formations of growths added to their backs, rings of metal attached to their spines, entered inside the womb as they would devour the same food-supply the fetus would try nibbling on, devouring them to death as these whorish beings would be trapped inside cage-like formations with various pits beneath them taking them back into the web-like drops against which they would bounce, back and forth, entered through the lower-areas where the food-supply is being kept inside, where the sanitary deformations and the king-like creatures with their broken apart faces and their broken bodies, armless and legless, but coned by many of them crowned heaps of bone-liquefied tendon-like roots of whims, hottened by the rage-in depressed into them, as this king's eyes, these blasted blasphemous filled with ardor, hottened the already spruce-thrown-in-the-fire infindiliac disaster's come onto the sight of woe's strong bladed coffin in which one of the women had been slowly delivered into, a wretched Anaghost of many chainy keyholes, ranchos- servility, that served as a punishment for her wildly admitted infidelity. This skeleton of a few upon mighty Grove's made root-holding crook with many crows winced, with a growth alarmingly forlorn, withheld as other things fell through the ceiling as well. He resided beneath them, in a most depressing manner, yet estranged from everyone, dismissed.

'I am kilt, I am kilt, withdrawn! Aghast yee, I feel only the numbness that is rotten, the crystalline whiteness of marble change, be gone! Be gone!'

A crimson change of steel in the compounded material that made his insides turned him into a body of crystal, made out of pure indestructibilitiness, for the time being.

Two servants, tall, that were conjoined but one apartment on top another – stacked together, sprouting out-of, the second one being bodied by segmented beating heart-shaped beads aligned on a pole-like cylinder, like a worm out of an apple's top of mid-depression, with an almost python-head filled with many lumps that encompassed everything, out of which long black spears-led- glowing with dark energy rods, wooden-broom-handles with blooming pumping in and out, at their ends, bubbling organs that were inflated then retracted back into those ‘pea-shooters’, which sometimes, the rods that is, sprouted out of the many hearts as well as if they were in reality, organic, both in growth and in recess. A train-wagon but fat on two sides, but closer to an eggplant – fat on both sides, walking on moth-like mechanical ‘wings’, as thick as gates, then wide-spread, that bore, up-front two giant fluid filled eyes and a downward pointing wriggling thing for a mouth, closer to a fat pumping hose, that grew thinner at its end. It almost looked, closer to some gas-mask, although it did the opposite of what one was meant to since it constantly puked some unidentifiable toxin instead; an abhorrent almost mounted horse-bodied meaty gas-mask wearing but walking on two half-cut doors, with a winter-train-pole with spears coming out of it beast, of a, conjoined, two-servant mixed-together, wretch of no pleasantness to be around of.

‘Greetings master, you’ve called for us once. And we have yet to answer you call, when thrust into the damp and the quiet, come onto the lot, we answered, in disquiet, leer!’

‘Your intrusion has disturbed an ancient sleep which had been expanded upon by anciently dark machines that are found to stand erect out of their baskets, ion-cemeteries discarded into one of the pools they’re never to be awakened out of, unless, truthfully being told and wretched.’

His mouth fell, and there was only one door open now, off the hinges but part of it in ruin as well.

‘There was no reason to suspect anyone of doing it and for that reason, I would very much attest to the same fact as I did before, as I’m sure you’d reckon it as a means to counterfeit some of the after-dealings that’ve stumbled onto my hands by chance alone, that would’ve had him. If that only were the case, for a second there, I thought. Never shall you mind.’

And the conversation was indeed over. Without a simpleton’s remorse to have been fading along the trail of glowing little puffs, it ended.

A man’s shout echoed throughout the halls of the station, without perdition’s pesticide and woe to have come chomping through during the disastrous reproach that followed in his path. A faceless machine wearing itself, inside an impious thing with many tails it carried along like hairy whips, like a giant bullfrog of some organic material, some extra worn body-suit in which it continued walking as it was being closely observed by the people around it, swaying through the past yet.

‘I’ve trained myself to see you, things, wretched, you disgusting falling apart solidly liquefying almost artificial demonical creatures that do not belong in our highly advanced world. You reckon and bring forth only something close to the nigh-destruction of beauty we’ve hope to have given birth or helped reason with in this age of chaos where stars are still dying during the fall, unmet by resolved and highly paranoid from the looks of it as I can still see it in your visor, being something close and nigh- longed for a redeemer, that’s how you’ve gotten in my private chamber, is it not? You must’ve seen the writings on the door. On that high-domed gate, written Admiral Hugh-Yors, my golden powdery stars of flowery petals of rosy snowy drifts, drag.’ Was that a roach that just crawled on the lamp upstairs?

No, it was something else, something different, tall n’ wide, incapable of fitting through the door, let alone the floor through which it had been flying through, yearning for companionship-tall, three pieces holding onto one another in an almost pea-shot to the side, out of this fumbling body-bag growth, egg-plant-like entered through an oblong blood-cell, covered in three spikes, that held upon a pseudo-cartilage bridge coming out of it, a crag-like tooth emerging out of it, all three of them aligned as if a hunched big termite headed figure stooped with its head low, whereas the midriff of its sagging face carried a giant, to its right if faced up-front, giant incisor, flat beneath, covered in chitin as well as other growths, of a piece made yet in cover, filled with many skins that were put together, barely holding.

A canteen bottle appeared to be somewhat clearly dislodged from the upper-trunked area, where the bubbly thing of skin and silk formed the first of the tall men protectors. A door just slammed itself shut by their side. Another one followed right behind it. Their echoes were sublime yet expected.

‘They won’t make it past the artificial dawn and I’d rather not be here when they awaken during their last hour!’

‘Y-sre?’

‘I am most certain about it, that’s why I trip-wires shoes to moth-grenades.’

A few of them flew around right as they spoke behind the iron-curtain, in the broken-machine motion foyer; bothersome yet yearn-for froth and thrust malnourished onto trenches come-to whenever pacing and hardly ever-wrought basin of filthy wonder yet amassing in the chrysanthemum-leper sounder, pus-of thin and skeletons pacing slowly away, with holograms on their backs as they carried dark-matter pouches filled with human faces and their boneless gray caterpillar trenched dames, many of whom still danced around, the hussies did!

‘A crude crusade I’ve lead so far, but countenance has long withdrawn, nor have I told them of ever there be, for as such I’d lay in agony.’

‘But who are you, master of such tales, of such countenance as long prevails? That would misuse and come upon the fanny-who; of oft of oft of-of-of; pfff.’

‘Puff as you may peasant but I shall not withdraw my glance in tinder desperation, there’s a pocket of evil in such kind damnation, leading to the land’s wild contamination that I may not recede or see to it recede in vain. For I’ve desperately tried to such maintain a slimmer and a shimmer, and therefore I’d wither with my bodily sight, if contemplation come to an end, sawn apart and leper so torn apart, they’d run, descendants carrying whatever that’d be, if I were a lot, all tim-er; see.’

And he had shown him whatever piece of contemplation’s making he had hidden-swollen sight, or such alacrity, override; he bore a knife at the little man’s throat, through his mandible and a more so amiable approach; past noon.

‘We’ve been waiting in the sun for eighty hours. I’m empowered to make a choice. I shun these eyes for they yearn of the much provoked, paranoid. That you may claim my life before it’s taken, though it’s not yours made to choose. I’ve little left of such alacrity misuse. You’re a man or not; I withdraw what I cannot, but I shall not be forceful as to inquire, for seek as blessed, what you may think of such fire, as the embers that might soothe, as I cannot fully prove that you’re still alive. Are you dead, therefore I ask?’

‘I’m still lain by your side but you may not ask of aid if that’s what mattered to you whenever quail.’

Regalia spoke as little, nicely clothed by besmirk cotton trousers with empty shaded tall by shadows plain – painted around with a ring of beaks and a cross of beaks and his trousers also beaked, and off his back two giant beaks, he was dressed in, but a helmet of iron that left only an empty T; of bronze-black tawny, whereas his clothes were shiny, with a whitish gleam, and his shoes were made of eyes and had sockets and were skulls, in shape, and he also bore a black-hole like thing with a planet filled with maws and teeth chained but depressed where his heart would be; and had horns, and his eyes were gems and his lips had teeth grown inside of them and were made of gelatin, both, and his tongue was an anteater as well, and he carried; since his two giant conical back formations slightly opened; two wreathing tongue like formations of some eely see-through substance that flailed around and had, at their ends, stars inside, with mouths that spoke and spat worms; and he said he had come from another world where this was where his calling be, the peasant's name Aemobee.

'Yiinoeb; you're a fright, a spook of no delight.'

'Such is there that I frightened you, have I not?'

'I've willed myself made of scents that I can barely feel now!'

'Who are you and whom am I?'

'That's a question worth of dye.'

And they went to the nearest pool and bathed it in some gems of grapes and soaked away, until they were dirtied by the mob that gathered around, crowded in the circle, surrounded and ensured they would not get away!'

'Yee, two men that are the town's insane; queerly dressed, of such dresses inhumane, leave thine plains and die!'

'We shall not wither away, nor try!'

Harcly; Harcly; ever-woe:

A grand magister; magpie eaten on the bold; such was done the dinner, granted. But ever-ever, such miss-wonted:

'Crude is thine kingdom that you've wreathed, two kings. A peasant king and one of filth.'

'I am clean!'

'But you are dyed, marked to die, and we shall carry on in a most sanctimonious cry!'

With the chance come, he had pulled a submachine gun out, this dire pretender; abhorrent behavior, pointed at both. A crude reality, a cruel joke; for it was plain to see and therefore be, touched by ever-glory; see:

Lend onto them was there a chance.

'I see there's a way in you would not consider making.'

'A sink that could recede either way; and what do you know of it in that case?'

‘But little but there, but therefore there; yet never-ask!’

Of course there was no chance to get to it since they were carefully watched by one of the darker satellites that flew closer to the plainer-stills. It could be reasoned as being something, at large, unworthy for what was gone and wrought; from that point on begging, and leper’s know wonting. A single potato-skinned, with lumps within; near toothless serpent- wrought in blob, with sockets that were enlarged; multiple oblong jaws, one beneath another, sparsely withdrawn.

‘There’s.’

A nibblet of some cono-capacitator standing over the desk, rolling over itself in some circles of various diameters postulated yet thrown at inquired for; what could only be a matter of time before they started coming onto her. Drawing heed from their surroundings, the heat being protruding and ever-so glancing at them; ever so strangulating as the faces of steam started rising up in the air, drawing breath from one of the wretched tactics written on the boards, the much absorbed insolence that was cast away at glance and torn apart, ever-so near. Fear had lain nothing to beheld, no wretch to no end, no dire-brothel of machine-men, that could ever draw a cast, to cover themselves, whenever they had and to have it all mask, they wore disease and brought it with them, covered in muck, a green like thing of pus that formed various bough-arms and various unnatural things that could only last for a few more seconds that no perdition could make defeat. An insolence of varied feet, all trampled upon the abode, the wretched hour of no hopelessness had cast only a shade of its former self into the duress that was conditioned by itself to scan every trespasser and kill him on sight and lend, naught, but the lamp of destitution, the hardened dark illusion, the mark of the above, the wretched coiled spirits that were chained with iron ally and bolted with such spherical things that could only be called wombs, of mighty lordly things and bores. They hunted, yet it was endured. They wasted their lives, but could possess the machines and only cast a glance as to mourn. Every now and then, and every desperate end, every solace of mandible and ever-cast a mutant inside as to grow him artificially then kill him again, only to have him wrung:

A voice had called:

‘No one is to approach the capacitator by any means! It is out of order and beyond your perilous concern to approach it! Leave it be and remove yourselves from the area immediately before the immediate use of force shall commence upon your persons as to reap away whatever there is of your fastidiously un-inclined remains!’

Therefore added:

‘Sub-machine gun-bearing turret-drones have been dispatched on the nearest area to the Southern door, be yet weary of being warned, be yet so of what’ve been had!’

So many things have yet endured. Alas, there were sullen unfortunate souls that could not be of a similar quality to the very envelope that surrounded them, not to mention the fasciculate thermoses tendons that were released on the floor and allowed as well as to be done with, for the congregate dissatisfaction could only be assimilated by unkindly whispers of such miss-interest forlorn in such a melancholy a day as it would be ebbd for them to join one of the whispering trials that would rip away their bodies, throwing them on top a bed of lopping sidedly, up and down, then cast away in such surrounds as none would have them so after. It was not something one could loudly declare being proud of, being not only covered in blood but trying to make a show out of it!

‘There’s a call!’

Every machine and every man and every mutated lump or growth in sight stopped on an immediate notice!

‘There’s a reason why we don’t respond. There’s a fine thread that cannot be ripped away or crossed if you know what’s fine for you. I would endorse your stay and oft of counterfeit but take something from you unless asked not to, my dear Hagys. Otherwise, there’s the chance you might fail and clasp a hear from someone not betokened to be listened to unless death would have you sullen, reprimand of such apparel fading with every morbid limb, taken from the soul-but yearned for morgue, that which had been cast into one of the dark pits that had been wasted and counted for, others to have been ill instead, to have their hearts ripped as they would see nothing too fit and nothing too much for a spare to cast. To have a glance, to have aghast but lose whatever chance’s a must; without, and with-else, we would wither away, trying to figure out the encrypted message, whatever perdition would dishelve from ours. For ours is a token of no pain, nothing that could help us refrain from what was stolen from the swollen star, from that which had been ripped away, from the heart of the land and the languid abhorrent spree of lechery, seethe-felt, agony, withheld from every single ounce and every drilled head from the women that had given their swollen lives through the grace and the torn, and to the ones that will come, eventually after us, for they’ll have known we were nothing, we meant and still mean naught to them.

Even such machines would feel and lose such damp and dark appeal, to have their souls mistaken for something that could never be, to their and their hearts we could say save such dampened oil, side by side with a gasoline canister that could have them still withhold whatever promise they could have trod. I know there’s much for you to endure during the coming and the approach of the dark day, but every mourning moment passed, and for every single man, alas, that will have willowed past the needed such appeal recede back into the countenance of a much sordid, felt upon his bathed quilt, a member of ink, one that would bark and shout, he should and cast away no bother, felt at last!

Ever the fever would cast me so away, through the luncheon of the front regions where the barking large erected incisor-bloated with beams, inside of which the bodies of the bathed in many teeth and maws, bearer of the many mouths, stretching underneath us, beneath a frame stretching and elongation upon millions of miles that would only diverge into, perhaps the stalactite cocoon-like sarcophagi for the great, much deformed to our likings, eaten and swollen, broken apart flight-endowed Sladhs, who had fought for countless hours and generations only to grant us this fine hour, for fright could never feel less. For us, there’s only one moment left to achieve, granted, and grant it to yourselves as you see it fit!’

And many of them, of this fine assembly, who has been present throughout the entire duration of his discourse could only stoop ever-much lower as to bow in an acknowledgement of what already had been verily carried out between them, without a chance of there being a must, or cast away a glance that could mean anything and anything at all, if meant it be.

‘I seek but reason to pick the receiver and see, if I might dare, if I must and if I must become aware, what had it been done for my soul’s interpose to feel it run through needle’track?’

‘Fine specimen that you are; don’t show me your back hand now, ‘else, I’m going to apprehend the side of your head, and enter it with mine arm, bring you to some close end, thrust and welded into one of the walls of this fine empire of crooked bricks of blue ultramarine, purple delight, green pucker, whitish orange, with your swollen crimson blood of no color and no picking that could have you swollen and disemboweled, to my kin’s hope and the brought in forth; you, my son, shall be the picker of your rope with which I shall strangle you in front of this formed to my likings council. With which said, I bid you think well of what’s to be done. For there’s countenance of reason and countenance to have yourself kilt, then kilt again by power of powdery-gun!’

He urged himself therefore not to pull it out and squeeze the trigger, blasting him away, adjourned by the likings of a presence he could not but feel as if it was wasted but instead had only felt reason as to look at it a second more before he could have it spared. There was some turpentine of Moor. And a nice pen-growth shaped bulky worm in one of the walls as well, weighted by the faces of men it had devoured but saved their appearances, temporarily while regurgitating their insides in its second stomach as to delay it as much as possible, until it could feel itself again, once done properly digesting them; although most men that approached it were very much equipped with guns and other power-tools that could but prod out its eyes in the most unfashionable manner, that would discern only the greatest of pains as to rip its head away, then do what was proper. Free them from this eternal, suffer! Suffering was a disaster that only a few men of no regard could endure being responsible of. And in this case, it was only fewer, lesser, distraught caught a glimpse of now!

A dark machine sitting in a corner

‘Infuriating, it’s infuriating that’s we have to wait for it to move again.’

‘Careful now, careful now, there’s no ill-chance for it to behave again. We shall wait, and watch it carefully as to not miss a thing, but if it moves too quickly, then, we’ll strike. Then we shall put it down within a grain of what’s it been, in life and mourn gauge!’

‘Will you listen to me for a moment, at least? For I’ve but silt it not just yet, preposterous as it might be, I could not find a single reason. ‘

The dark machine, a sepulcher of what’s it been. The others around it flooded each thought, with nerves of lightning that strode through every girth of a wall that fell apart, not too fast, not too quick, nor too far now before they’d start again, this time, ten times harder before they could be heard, all at once.

‘Cradle it, cradle it, there’s no reason to see it!’

‘Who spoke?’

‘I did!’

Out of the dark came an almost completely destroyed machine that could barely keep walking from the looks of it, barely being adjusted for one of the, of the harder ones. The ones that were clearly adjusted to, to; a spherical compressor in its back, clearly out of order; it carried it like some kind of car it had spawned itself out of, like some perilous figure that could barely walk. Worsened by the moment, as no cripple might find lure; worsened by such likens as not a single other man might endure. There was another thing. It glowed, with the fashion of a man it carried in the second pocket of its feigned flaccid electronic arms. They were all being dragged, fallen even, largely apart; but there was no saying who caused it or why, not to say there was a culprit, since there was no possible say in it just yet; but the clear cutter, the one who did a number on that fellow's brother, he was clearly of a piece to be. Clearly delivered onto their sight, seen for what he was, diseased. And for that, there was nothing they could not withdraw, since, having encapsulated themselves in the room, no escape would come. Twenty or fifty or so hours that would only cast the worse, worsened by the blob; the men, the ones that appeared, apprehensive yet glowing, holograms; dancing around the machines, playing with them, but barely saying anything; not that such likens would pay one off. Not that it would do, much better to wait it out, but there was a rendition of how, and why they did it, worsened by the likens, worsened by the trifle, after.

‘I think we shall hold council for today, what say you, brothers of mandible?’

A humanity on Mars made out of marines threatening each other with fire-pokers, while locked in their strange ships, all molded together, forming various beam-bridges of iron-junk, connecting Earth to the Red-planet; as well as every single one of them, living in solitary ‘confinement’, despite the fact that no door is open. Everyone's paranoid. Afraid of what might happen if they opened it for a moment and toyed with the lights; far beyond dangerous as it was; one of them could not comprehend what it meant to open a lighter and blast some of the tube-gas flooring-tubing, pipes of stretches, wire-boobs, boots; on top the ceiling rude, ruddy, ever-so crude and snarly. Came a voice from one of the intercoms:

‘Am a female, let me in!’

‘You do not sound like a woman at all. And I am armed, and I shall kill you if you stall me not with thinking of the dames, which in turn shall make my blood rage with boil and flame, as my destitution's much aware of what's going on, and what's to come! I shall end you, that's all, if you even so dare to open your mouth!’

With which Parkinson's; missed the off button, couldn't click it properly.

‘Damn you villainous fiend! I cannot even click you shut within my finger's trimmed outline! I shall sin against you if that's the cause and I shall throw you in piety's mouth only to see you burn when the time comes for me to figure out how to turn on the thrusters! And you shall die within the booster's flame, and I shall laugh at you clankingly, while I ache for condescend!’

But the voice didn't come again. It was in pain, that much was certain and that he couldn't do well against; the voice of a woman, ey? Weeping through the intercom, a youthful thing, twenty or so, just ripe for rape, and tenderly, oh; she must have a weapon as well, something as cowardly as a woman, so niggerish could only have one stuck beneath the flood that's been spilling out through a few other sectors. Marines, marines, something about his leather uniform made him wince; being part of the troops. Going through all the hoops; looking outside, seeing no space, only some distance between him being put and that one on the other side of this maze. Call the neighbor, call the neighbor, wave him back. Never could've told that. Is he a man, machine, mutant, another race, some spirit, some memory, something else? Perhaps some hologram or something? It made as little sense as his weirdly eerie movements, those he tried getting away with! He's staring, long. While eating, during the time intervals the food's being delivered in; what's worse is the fact that he's eating at the same time as I am!

'Mind you own business you fucker! I'm running! I'm running, I'm running! I'm feeling the urge, you hear? I'm feeling the urge to run!'

Back and forth like a mutt chasing his tail, back and forth, trying to get a response out of him but he doesn't talk back! It's way too far for either of their voices to be heard. Soundproof extra-thickened windshields, blocking even the sharpest rocks that come flinging from one side of the valley. A comet passes through, found out by one of the scientists as to be a new glower. A new glower discovered for the first time during a few hundred year decades! And no one's talking about it. Dinner at five; the tag on the door reads Huygens Agg; admiral son lieutenant, sitting in his cashmere tent while probing with his fingers around the curvature of some rump that wasn't supposed to be there to begin with, yet he's doing it anyway, thinking he could make a cut with his fingernails. It would be a poverty's hole, his momma would say, a poverty's hole to crawl away from, aimed downstairs, as the woes extended down on him, sharing it with a visor long, as long as eighteen veined tendons that were not only aligned but promised to be forged back into the fuselage by the side of the station, back where he was promised once he would return.

'Of course, of course, we're always in need of engineers, you hear? I'm personally going to show up searching for you, killing, beating, and fighting my way through as many of these wastes of oxygen and proteins as I can, only to rescue you, my dear friend. Agg, I think you're special, a most special engineer I may be able to put to good use! There aren't many people like you which raise at such high a standard as you've proven yourself, time after time during our interviews as being clearly qualified for the position I'm offering; each time you appear to, to, fix the circuitry; they? They fall behind, they fall apart, everything falls apart without you! I know, it's a lot to take in, having. Finally received the, finally being recognized for what you are. You, my friend, have a great future on the station!

And I shall stop at nothing to ensure that you will make it out not only alive but more than breathing, far better than that, I'm going to do you one proper! I'm going to ensure that you're about to be put on the pedestal you deserve to be put back on top of, you hear? You shall return to!'

'Enough of it; keep moving, man on the other side of the visor!'

Sitting in a lonesome corner, playing with a toy-branch; where'd you get it from? Why always on the same spot when the others are getting so much lonelier without your freely given warmth to share and bask in? I think you're a cruel and a petty little man, and meek as well, you're putrid, it's petrifying, really. I beg of you to hear me still! Wait!

'How insensitive of me, not to give you something of my private stash, it's in the back, from a stock I received from one of the highest commanders alive!' That was known of.

In toy-play; walls-strong. Of green pucker hard to see, corrugated even, harder as it's made for everyone shut-swollen inside; for that's how the whole bulk of the in-between walls was made, to begin with. Hardly was there a matter of ever there being a time of questioning, as to discern whether or not the deadly almost-organic material left behind by the traces of life that had been extinguished at last by the passing of hundreds upon hundreds of soldiers; being thrust out into space, until this very point when it's become clear that they make the; air. They're stuffed into nitric oxide, stuffed into the homunculi mass of iron that's being opened like a vent, every now and then, a patch of red appeared around the cylindrical washing-machine see-in. Alarming those with an attention to detail that they were killing men and making air out of them, else. Their feet were wallowing in bone, skeletons shone and walk through stone, iron and through walls. But only a few men saw these spectral shining bones to begin with. Everyone was too busy living, which was hardly a matter of laughing or making a jest out of. It would become much worse in much shorter a while, when discerned with the authorities. Each man had to die, each soldier retired and that was a message made clear by whoever was in charge, that vampire, or blood-curdling creature lost somewhere in its immortality, or they were all like him! Or something, somehow, something, somehow, somewhere; it was hard to test each and every hypothesis when no one was willing enough to either push or pull another door. They were, after all, corridors! A secret algorithm saved everyone from death. The top-leading world powers were trapped in here as well, trying to PTSD-finger-tap-tap-tap-tap-tap-tap nuclear bottoms in order to sink another nation past the sea-levels! Control demolition had no volition over the likes of man who had his say in every matter that included any kind of preventable destruction he would carry on with anyway!

The light was being compressed by the sound-presser; a face appeared across its surface, as it slowly became a puddly jelly bottle cap-rimmed flat sun out of which four great arms came out of, fully extending on segmented jolts that shook and allowed for it to crawl.

'It's the General, sir, he's back!'

'Has he returned this soon already? I would've never expected him to make it this soon!'

A most relitious appearance had soon enough adorned his form as he became, upon finally opening the door, inviting himself in without ever as nearing himself upon a daring thrust's end's flinch making a point out of his indecision, a most chiseled relic hardened bolted thing of cheese-rotten, moon-pit filled with chipped craters hardened soil sponge that allowed him to avoid getting riled up with melting sober-powdery death come onto him by the sheer force caused and forcefully progressed upon him, as to diverge into a bath of many fallen fleshy things his jelly yolk may've allowed to succumb over, from the piling up shells, allowed to adorn both of his sides whereas they could not have hastened ever-sooner; flaccidly inclined as they soon enough were, standing on a repose soon enough paused as to still themselves during this clearly admonished yet just as crystalline as it were observed through the cameras betokened sight of surliness that showed up upon the realization that the submachine guns were as useless as any power ray put to the employ of the facility might've been; in terms of trying to put the wretched beast down with the other piled up corpses belonging to the soldiers, flat carpet-like as they've become, but still crawled, animated, compound eyes accosting the top-flat of their crested helmeted heads; crawling still as they were under the caveat of their master as they've once been, seen from the eyes of no other but one of the very lieutenants that were under his command once. There being no other excuse to follow; they rung up a voice-command as to try appealing to the General who was still under the impression that this was a war zone. 'General Giyalk!' But the voice faded out with the sound accompanying it being sent into a slithering jolt of echoes where it receded down a spine-contorted spine-like drop where many look-alikes to him danced around it as mad spirits beckoning their master's command. He was the tomb, the grave, for, inside this bottle-hardened spoiled by Moon, spoiled by the tatter of conical-stone boon lay the true jelly-clot of the man, finely preserved. Readily, in accordance to his spirit, to emerge at any time alive. The general would survive, clasped but tender. Many of the soldiers down the sender!

A puffy cotton wreathing beast, headed like a man-machine, with the teeth of man emerging, dirty-rotten as it were, converging upon itself as it wreathing legs clasped whatever kegs and whatever else it could wrapped itself around, as it made its way onto the lower levels with many similar to it, wreathing beasts, in pain; and echoes, many of the wretched still-upon themselves no more just as soon inclined to draw breath than allowed to sing the songs of despair while being shot down there by spikes and spears and elongated teeth and dreary roots of hardened tears made out of fluid pouched infants being fed upon by the cannibals cadets, hidden in disguise in their strange machine-suits, rotting as they tried glancing around for any facet they might throw themselves in to commit regicide, as they were kings in the hundreds!

‘I say, good sir, I must be the last one inside this insidious sector that has ever the halfest of minds still working!’

‘Wait, disciple of wringed belt, I see something yet again! The one standing the highest has whispered onto me again! I think I can still hear him, near the top of the pyramid, he’s talking with steam, and made us crept again in thoughtless remembrance as we yell!’

Wretched everywhere.

‘Another customer is well served, I see.’

The intercom went at it again:

‘Primus Ocgg, come.’

A cell door opens as soon as he enters the area encircled by the slithering visor. There’s a noise echoing slightly, but only slightly, on a hardly harder to hear a slither or a bounce that’s unheard of before anyone even comes near the hallway he’s striding towards. His heels and ankles the height of his head, connected to his throat, keeping his head in place with the giant squarish with two bubbles to the side out of which a few tubular cylinders holding smaller compact battery-devices pulsating with light, and smaller look-a-like-to him heads that press in and out these pistons; life-preserver attached to his back; the tortoise-box as they are called, simply wailed as soon as the giant eight faces started pushing out the front-wall he was accompanied by, once it pulled itself out of the secret chamber is had been torturing the lesser men in before coming into the light. And the man that was there as well, shocked but as he was he didn’t say another word. Worried that there’d be something that could jeopardize his asking for a cowardly accord, and a slither therefore bored, he cut a phial and drank the solidified gas; with the second mouth-bulb that emerged out of his chest, a leviathan with three mighty worm-like spears that started feeding themselves the cloud-poison before coming to Ocgg on sight:

‘Do you not fear the wall? I could crush it if you want to!’

‘I will not trespass my reason as to shatter it away. Please, let me be. I want to eat today. I’ve been starving for far too long and I’m afraid the bad people will start tearing me apart if I say the wrong things or talk to anyone!’

‘I used to fear that as well, but as you can see, I’m fine now, I’m way too well to be afraid of them or what they might do to me. You should not fear them or the things they might enact onto you, for I am here. A holy man in the image of your lord; I shall do my best to preserve you!’

‘Shut up, druggie! I’ll have nothing to deal with you; you, little, disgusting shit! You repel me, loathsome beast. And I can only revel in knowing I’m to be fed soon enough, then be starved for many months that are to come ahead. So, please, in all honesty, spare me of the worsened kinds, and spare me of whatever this is, for I won’t suffer myself to be accompanied by someone like you, such is thus, I will not hear of it a second more! Not a word.’

‘Allow me to interrupt you for a second, look.’

There was the straightened hall deformed by the wall, which beckoned to follow. So disgusting from the side was seen, especially in the back, was it living or part machine? It was definitely hard to tell, by all accounts, from one, one at least, one aspect that stood out. Most bothersome a thing as well, but the design was like a pucker of many rounded shapes put together like suns sketched or scrawled by children one next to another, improperly drawn flowers, which were then animated and filled with worms and other crude things either stitched or welded together until someone or something said, this is enough, this is unnatural, for a child to draw such a thing. I would not see it fit for you, my dear. Immediate punishment, you’re to be whipped and beaten until properly forced to learn how a lady should act! And only then if that were so, would this thing fail to come to life. They looked organic, these insipid sprawls, these vortexes, and dead-holes that were as empty as volcanoes shrouded by blokes made out of smoke and soothie; lessened the sight for a partially nigh-blinded man who could not see the flame or in this case the sparkle that was inside. It kept whispering, picking people it dragged and pulled from inside the other walls. Were there others like him?

‘Shall we sing for the time being or lay in waiting?’

I told that man to shut his mouth, but he won’t listen, that blasted thing, his mind is run into the wall and I shall do well to beat it out of him, whatever that means, I shall have him beaten with a club if I find it, still. Not now, he could be useful after all, I could, I could perchance do something to feign pain. He could take pity, and he could make me feel pain as well; if he would see me close to death, he’d torture me and the wall would join in. I’m not paranoid, but I’m ill.

‘What are you thinking off now?’

‘I’m thinking about what I’m about to gorge myself into. Eating that is, that’s something I have to feel, I have to immerse myself in the slop I’m about to receive!’

‘Is it not injected into you?’

‘Balustrade of a man I’d like to stop on top of, not! Damn you be for turning my pleasure to such disgust! You are a wretch and I shall eat you if you do not shut your mouth!’

Finally, some peace and quiet, when entered upon the sight. The giant lower-jaw cabined on the top by a helicopter pod-device with a few rounded into the ceiling connected boilers that drove out of the pod as if they were the wings, giving it the impression of a cage; without a tail, but almost lending the apprehension of a stitched together being, 'kissing', welded or conjoined, 'mouth-to-mouth' with a stone-like blob with two compound barricaded window 'eyes' that could be clearly seen from the side of the entrance they were staring at; at the side of the hall, since they were placed in a pseudo 'valley' whose floor was uneven and almost like a ramp but only nearing the end of it where these two 'buildings' or formations were made; the rest of, or the area leading to it being a stretch of a few hundred miles or so, two hundred eight four miles, which then started upwardly curving, but not on an extreme, whereas, the area surrounding them was a strange chaos of deformations made out of some strange curtain-material that seemed almost solid, chiselled even; yet nonetheless receding as if the convulsing belly of a lion that had been held under anaesthesia but started awakening slowly because of the pain he felt, or the pressure, from having a dentist work on his infected tooth, presented on live television on some TV channel, or something; organic in the way every side of the wall contracted.

'I think we shall make due entry in that place over there we shall stay from this point on but I shall hear no word in the matter, unless you, my dear friend want to suffer a strike on the side of your face and then!'

'The wall is trying to tell you something.'

It turned towards him just as he did, at the same time, in synch, flashing with wild gradients of power and features that belonged to no one in particular, carelessly flashing their sharp appendages which extended around him, then flailed, then shot, then back at it again, then wrought!

They ended the suffering of the hour; there were people flashing themselves into existence, who abhorred being listened by the showers of the pettiness displayed by the wretchedness and the sound that came from the screams, the echoes that came soon after and since, since there was no way to tell what the pain brought to them, there could be only one thing that kept with them. An eeriness of flail-regard; they screamed and disappeared once the Orator came from his house. The hour: It sprouted from one of the compounded bubbles, with as vicious a regard as there had been. Little puckers attached to him, and unnatural, too hard to scrape off since.

Earlier than that, he was in his room, a floor, two floors, two doors and a giant elongation of a blimp-tented prism with openings on both sides where spider-legs emerged, holding on a mass that was almost as long as its chested by many plates lower body, a lump of many growths that looked like a caricature of clay, with forty superficial wings that were on top, standing like hair-crests erected, but incapable of flapping; the sides of it bearing almost sausage-like appendages with giant canine-nails that pointed down; which, inflated the spider-leg cords, and the prism-blimp until they became; as a puffer-fish would, a pseudo Cyclops head, with a hollow in the middle, yet the illusion faded the most it squirmed, incapable of maintain the form; a choking on a hardening boil thing, shot by an arrow that left the bleeding hollow where it shouldn't have stood. An ugly thing was this animal that moved around in the dark, heavier than it looked, as well, the other beasts only breathing; leaving the gusts of air speak for themselves, as they remained true to their nature, cruel.

'I am bored, entertain me!'

Said the Orator of the Crude, the one that appeased him an entreaty brought onto a plate, a tiny brood, of little puffy parasites. He ate them within a gulp, though his delineated form, a human head with neck and part of the torso, part of the left arm, and only a piece of his lower body, but not his legs, almost rounded like an amoeba, with the exception of a blub-‘tail’ in ‘his’ left arm, which were his, being rather revealing, but clothed and kept behind some glassy-holding case, while the rest of his body was but a suit that kept him alive, in this paradise he promised to create. Of course it was a wretched place, a shadow of its former self. And the many crusted and encrusted spears, worn by his mighty champions made themselves appear and disappeared several times until finally released; up and down, upward and downward, faster, slower then back at it again, until the oratory crudeness prevailed and pervaded that which had been theirs to begin with, a circle inside of which he was king. A circle in which there was light and many floors got replaced, he didn’t like this one. For some wretch had painted other kings, which they mocked to be the real ones in retorts that were only head by him and his ears only as they, all of these beasts, had special whispers that travelled as if through some tiny, invisible pipes connected through his ears only; the others didn’t hear. But they had spoken between themselves prior to this, so they knew from where this dirty, perfidious look each of them had when they silently spoke and laughed at that. And most importantly, how mad this ‘king’ was, how infuriated he had become, ‘Orator’, ‘Bloattator-Potator’!

‘I shall cast you all in pits where you shall suffer forever if you continue mocking me, you little insignificant bloated things I made out of some tiny life forms I bore forth and tended for myself, with my own two hands, and my two arms as well, damn you, damn you all!’

How could this even be? What did I do to deserve this? Damned they be! Damned they be!’

For this was the reason he was driven away, to take some gulp of fresh air and suffer no more of this complacency that suppressed even the worst of thoughts, the most adjoined hardy-hard of wretched stings that made his woe, so much harder to be known, impressed by each errand that came to him during the time he’s cast! Wretchedness upon the boils of the world and the ones who’d serve him from that point on:

‘A new recruit on the base, perfect!’

Maligned

An unwell-boastfully wrought in shape pearl wall, made entirely out of them, oyster-bricks beneath it, held by a most unnatural system of spread-out roots of skin and cartilage: Scoms, all carrying large bone-dead whales on top their backs, millions of scoms threaded about, all of them grouped. Around one of the great pillars, they started chewing the acid fidgety fingernails, one by one, dropping them.

‘Large insect dome-but set on fire, it’s that way, it’s that way.’

One of the halls, the other one was a tunnel. Under the tunnel eighteen heads, many of them bearing burning lanterns with dark heads inside of them, as if coal-clocks, ticking with fire:

It drew itself out of the mould of mass, the growth of shapes, the almost oblong blimp fat thing that was elongated to the side like a giant pipe, but disfigured as another one came out of it as well, deformed, but out of it, the second one, which gave the appearance of it being a toy with two legs that was stuck on the ground, trying to flip itself over, a head casket with a strange molded figureless thing that had a ramp to its side, and was almost too clean-chiseled to be a being at all, came out of nowhere.

Twenty more ticks started rotting away, most of them being part of the ceiling, the matchbox-with spindles of fury in which they swam.

A pool lay by the side of the rangers, but they didn't have the top of their faces, beneath the nose, that is, only a flap tops, yet they could talk:

'A power-ray is being transmitted here and there, I can sense it, can you?'

'Of course I can, I've been trying to project my dreams onto it every since I've come into contact with you.'

'Listen to me, now! Dreams of Vitriol! Dreams of Vitriol.'

Nigger-nigger-Kike-Gook:

'I've had my head bashed in and now I'm standing at a point where I can feel my body flip inside the gut.'

The insect dome started moving at a weird trajectory that went willy-nilly in whichever direction, being filled-covered with many disgusting looking creatures with no eyes, all of them bashing it open like the tortoise shell it was, with many smaller circles elongating from it, in a most peculiar manner. But it could not move past the ceiling since it started pushing out itself, the many mouthed.

A blanket of vulgarities, reminiscent of soreness past drew forth as well. IT was covered in lids with eyes that projected pus-wart appendages just about every place there was, especially in the quadruple wheel clogged plaster that drew form wild directions.

Many other smaller, unnatural locust crickets with butcher's apron kites coming out their back released vapors in the vapid air, many of their smaller atoms, filled with brim disease started pushing out of the second pillar that's been devoured, by the malady of the songs that were being chanted by the chevaliers that gnawed around the base of the smaller upper-level, whose staircase was being released on top the lower side.

Only a handful of men can survive the trails of terror and not a single one of them is presently in view.

'How can this be possible?'

'It's simple, their adversaries were all dead.'

Oft had to have had happened, needlessly to have had been said, already to whom, whereas, had it had been done, to him, he'd have had done so, seamlessly, to himself, without burdening the others, while doing it. That hinging on its side, mlechoriously, of kin almanac of murals-green phantasm, unseen then wiped off. Bold were the timed up silences, as they drew ahead through cut. Oft was there a need to be brought in front of them, when silence died, away but wrought:

‘I’ve come but missed by a matter of a few centimeters out the way.’

On a darkened day of rainy-first, and spread of worsened night’s end had come, upon the brow of the mansion whereas a few of the peasants had stood there, wreathing in around, worn out, a given for them after spending out all day plowing the land, carefree of viscera as they had given it to one of the coming-through trees, whose worsened trunked-abode only came freely to them, paired with a bunch of empty souls, in which their bloodied bodies leaped inside of. A plume had rotten, squirmy-hued, with large rods coming pointingly outta it.

Falle-en-dure

Violent Age Seventeen Dark Hour-made part-electronic futurism-though machine shot through second unthinking dumb-machine hybridized, to become human, but in control of every fifteen hour or so; by volatile tendrils attached to the dark-machine’s dark snow that spread around. Grounds, many ground levels raised houses set on flying plants with elongated heads-deformed into two pears molded together like with one eye only, no humanoid features and ellipse open-mouths, attached to giant egg-structures that opened-half-way back to giant two-split in half bat-hairy conjoined elongated potatoes-creatures with one eye as well, open jowls-with teeth molded to their tongues attached to the rest of the machines and rafts. They mated with the towers and made divine molded cities, squared upon parcels. From above, grand sight, of all the rafts put together, long ramp, like a plane-land off, connected to a partially unfurled parking lot, out of the two of them a long almost trachea gulping, that slowly became, or the tongue as thin as a long arm-eater’s hose, with a bulbic point of fat in-between them, longer curvature that trailed around and beyond the road. Fancifully, if seen, a long trunked two flat block-legged thing, incapable of moving. Staring people were trapped, hundreds of them, inside large centrifugal planes, running endlessly, in circles, which were domed together-see through, put inside robust depressed in pits, in which they were lowered into, to sleep with a substance that smelt as rancid as horseshit, near or above them where a strange fiend, like a chip, triangular fish, but bloated as an oblongoid in part, from the lowest side, where would’ve been a chin in a man’s lower side of the jaw, an elongated small beam-stalk drew out of it. A mouth where it belonged, made out of tiny needle-growths that worked together in tandem. Eyeless, but from the side, it ‘stared down’ or appeared to be in the position of a man whose drowned body no longer held any control over his head which in turn began drooping down in relation to the rest of his plank-positioned body, where, from the side, as if it had been a parachute, but came out of the place where its side eye might’ve been, drew out a disc-growth which deformed the entire left sided head-structure in a way which allowed the middle shell-like hat rounded at the top but with an open canon-like device, but primordial-ancient and not chiseled in, with four great beams squaring it, all bearing four tiny human-skulls at their ends which hanged like flags, although this might’ve been more likely an elongated tortoise shell than a hat-shell. If one were to completely rotate it upwardly vertical, one would see it as a flying saucer put on top a goblet that rested on four great cup-legs that were put on top of baseballs or an old lady's recliner, which was lopsidedly attached to a deformed pseudo-thinned out hill, with a horn coming out of it, or if the hill had been, in turn, turned into a coal-puffer-blower whose strange signals it transmitted to the people were simian-shaped with devil's cardboard box- drawn on top of masks they were wearing with horns on their sides and slingshot-belts attached to strange golfing-ball fields attached to large deformedly as if giant grub-maggots were stitched together-squirming dirt bag-like in the way they were trying not to drop the field, which was strapped to their simian chest. And out of the field, out came strange torture devices that actively stabbed and pinched the simians in their sleep, with rusty-chained scissors as well, aimed at their eyes, inside one of the livable areas, which was the replaced domesticated Cadaver- rancid put in place, and held by chains, held on top a sea of dog-skulled but set in three pieces, all pushed like six ramps rounded at their ends, one on top the other but only once at a time, and around, forming squirring structures that were only attached by hose-growths that fell apart and had grown only to make up for the losses and reattach themselves in place. Whereas their eyes were elongated giant canon-botfly moving with depressed lids bearing compound but grouped in clusters of four, equidistant, moved ever so slightly like telescopes as they recorded everything. They had no real mouths or jaws, but only gave the eerily similar impression of them being hounds. Which levitated on top dark holes, all distant and close to one another attached, then drawn apart as they made way for the great men that ruled over them. Whose head ran high and were coifed by helmets bearing shields, attached to giant car-engine fat on both sides filled with bone-growths in the hundreds, appendageless growths, on top of two distinct organs. One being a giant destroyed aqueduct shaped organ that kept within it, open at the top-broken through by shatter, expanding boils that drew in and out, back in place. Whereas the other 'leg', and that is not to mention the other growths that came in-between and the wildly exposed organs, was a curved coil bearing a giant eye-balloon thing without an iris. They crawled by force and ordered the under-towers alike in flight.

'Deterrence might not easily be forgiven any longer and we both know, at least I'd like to think we both know, Sane-No, where this door leads to and I think we both know indeed that as soon as either one of us enters it, the Progenitor will have whoever goes first's in's head's side's cut's left-lid-over top, the canal he'll finally cement in, blocking the river's way.'

Diseased, he's diseased in the head, I must alert the Concubine, Sane cried, in his mind, with vengeance.

For a moment or two, although one of the troughs might've been searched over for solace, they waited.

A giant helmeted roughly extremely rounded- the top of an eggshell twisted forth but made of iron with a long rod-like eye in one direction and a strange puckery fish-like placed eye, on the other side, it bloated its face open like a bubbly eye whose two lids emerged. Upon a body of lumpy palm-like filled with fingers outer throat protrusions whose hoses were pumping in it even more fat, as to open the mouth by the two fat-lips that made the 'lids' that unwrapped. A throat of a tower made of some cartilages that worked together and could be seen as they pushed in and out then drew back in, instead wrung-out, standing upon a blocky tiny 'crate', connected to a horizontally placed but face on the 'ground', although it was placed a few hundred miles off it, down-facing head, split in half but stitched, with one eye only, yet a mouth of a crag, as it long with a rock-scythe bloated as to become a curved oblong but in terms of the empty hallow that was the spot between both-jaws. Out of its forehead, down came the foot, a single one, most obtuse. If one were to take a closer look at the point where the finger hoses entered the lower side of its head, one could see a canon-like 'formation' or rather biological structuralization of its own anatomical set of function that allowed it to create, at the finger-tips, coming out the hoses, harpoon like, anchor shaped tinier appendages that entered specifically left, but hard to see from the distance holes, against which they not only lodged themselves but shoved themselves, fit-through like keys. The ropes of a balloon, connecting to it; both of them might've made an ugly two headed, two ended worm if it weren't for the leg, who was stumpy-fat and barely managed to leap from one side to the other of the road, then around. The 'egg' was also cracked in the back as it released beaded by boiled, elongated fish-like head wearing at the tip, lance speared-singers, that were carried by these creatures that fully came out and were shaped like bows but without the strings and could fly, and left whenever they pleased and were capable of charming humanoids, forcing them to suicide, by brute force, mesmerized by what was happening around them, bloating small melting puddles where they only kidnapped and hid fathers, but not the children, nor the mothers, leaving them there, incapable of hunting or fending off the predators as they would only stay there seething in pain, a rain of globes being lowered onto their heads and bodies until allowed to fully die, and be put out of their suffering's end.

What appeared to be a single man in the distance without legs, with his hands being put together in a quasi-formation of what would appear to be fifteen wings made out of various insect and animal, dirty-put through strewn behavior made to appeal to the most derogatory of being that were present around it, a stratagem of many smaller men-sprouting out of him, whom, upon command, that is to say, his own, this Gregorian Chanter, who also happened to be a flag-bearer as well as a proud malignant nationalist of pus-things filled with wart-poxes puckish filled with blade-elongations of corn-stride shaped other tower-figures that came out from inside his body had all of the sudden release a miasma that induced some of his lucid-psychotic dreamed vengeance- appropriated in most maligned under scrutiny held by the most resistant people whom, having not fallen under his control or dominion had risen as if from the depths of the entombed cattle-esque portioned mound-poles that had been forced to have arisen from the beauteous extrudency of mesmerizing flocks of fleeing in blinding spots as to the suffering of their long-shark-back hunched brothers, whom had no limbs either but were winged, winced, mouth-shaped fish drew out of their chests, glowing as they drew spherical pearls that shot out of their eyes, most deprecatory inducing diseased, being spread on top the darkened hills that were connected to the side-long drivels of corpses flayed, on cross the station, yet en-crossed, across the nation, where they spent only the hours, the few of them, the brave men fallen over bowed, the women whom had been complementary to them cowed, children who were not to be, abortions running through rivers of long disturbed agonies, of swollen mountainous woes, eerily recalled, the cars repurposed, a light was down, the buildings ruined, an apartment could still be seen from the distance with its light left on by one of the tenants that had run out of eating children, run as well, the person who's still left alive, for every man around you, under his servitude is no longer living, but a vile thing, wretched as to be put to a most insolent test as to forget what necessity was being taken away from him, as a Holocaust that never happened anyway, the viciously virulent hinges attached onto him just then, sprouting from every corner of his mouth, bloated with disease and sound, with electricity and power being produced in order to appease, the Godless anchor, wherein and within it, whose miasma could hardly be ignored or kept as a, held as a, or buried along with the corpses of the lords that were still under his command, armed with winter-holding, seasoned by the skies of acuity, failed in their attempts to mature now driven away, and driven back in would they chant the one whose chanter after, to have chanted in the chanting-chatter, to be listened as he leaped, on each corpse's footed feet, if such defeat could be encroached-en-scrolled with birdie-birdie bee, parchment of wilt-not-see, if I will it so, wilt have written, if there was such a crater-left behind, inside or in the middle of it, fifteen hundred eighteen seventy seven miles from the outer side of one of the smaller-tinier yet 'formed' as in dug in tinier craters that it was in or placed in-placated, as if to feel a reason behind what was taken away, a creature of much sanguinity turned into clot registering just about everything that's happened to this poor soul during the strange altercation that could only be the way in which one were to refer to what it had to go through, as, since, of most insoluble darkened months that passed off, during this reign of terror imposed by his never-splattered will, upon a wheel that's fallen out of a building, that a horse happened to come out of nowhere, the size of a human-plane's with its engines being two couches it carried on both sides, signaling not only a strength uncanny but something even beyond it, truly, a most, morbidly surmounting, as for their understandings, ordeals and what they worked out in order for him to be taken out of the city he had clearly destroyed, happens to be that, he was also, the man, whose name was Paranoid-Sohaf, the King of Clouds with eyes in a World whose cries were not of winter but of summer's advent into the seasons its intrusion made it so it would become unforgettable for ages to pass, so did it happen for him, paranoid-morbidly so, to observe that, the horse had two head that were only some ellipse-filled with fluid ended boils, akin to calluses, coming out of an elongated rifle's two, or more like, gauge-shotgun, but flipped around as to be vertically inclined rather than horizontally so, as if they were the open-ends of two throats bearing no heads, coming out of an almost strident fish-like concavity-torso or being placed at the front end of it, whereas, beneath it, in that chaotic mass of growths that made its body, it bore two chimney fat- 'pillars' who were connected and kept the couches raised a few meters off the earth, that, that is to say, these two 'appendages' came out of a pseudo-mouth entry-inside a cave kind of hollow it bore in its 'trunk', the mass that was protruding as an old overweight man's belly, that was resting upon a great, mostly backward placed, whatever bulk-trunk torso twist there was that kept the two pillars that were twisted up-front then on either side, kind of like pipes, as they were, inside of which there appeared to be some eerie fleshy many toothed eely-creatures whose backsides were split into large bubble-jellies that each had a different appendage, that split-in-half-folded as to fit together and form, strange cysted by crystal-chiseled incubators that, within them, bore stranger formations of 'children' - mass that bore stranger, harder to define shapes, sometimes with eyes, other times with more legs and eyeless, different iterations adjoining them, with wild tails and more deformed unnaturalness being not only, somehow preserved but, uncannily so, disproven as for there to be a reason why they were spiked by their mother-unit, this 'horse', whose heat-producing, beyond the limitless acceptable quantities of inner-inter-body self-harm-rather off-set of melting forced being cast upon one self-waves were responsible for the deaths of millions or, as the estimates would very much so go beyond it, billions of its offsprings that would go down in 'power-fires', killed with flames, killed within the frames that is to say, caught inside of them, encapsulated forever-ever, eternity, since this device, this ancient vintage looking Mahagony-XQr branded apparatus, it being a camera whose spectral qualities, which it was endowed with, granted it the ability of self-possession, as well as an endless capability of perfectly encapsulating, although only in one of the 'pipe-pillars', the eternal suffering they had been forced to endure throughout age upon age upon age upon age of consternation felt during their endless deaths, being reincarnated only to suffer once again, being cut off from what would seem to be a 'pair' of eight great slugs of cartilage that drew in the back, as if it was only a single wing-plane, a giant chicken-leg shaped baton with a single giant tooth pointing downward, that being the tail, whereas, one could not forget in the least, nor could he simply ignore the strangeness or most peculiar a nature of the wart-pox-filled with light, couch 'devices', which in turn, hereafter noticed, or would be acknowledged, was that, Paranoid recognized the fact that these pillars were actively fumigating violent-violent-tinted, and in possession of cluster-shrapnel-adorned-as-if-by-jewels grenades, whose strange outward burst of power and of callousness most protrudingly so, as such, as so, and such was it had, to have had it so, made, aware, that it gave the general appearance of it being a human, the gas that was being created in between the gaps that were inside the couches and the strange pipe-shafts that were placed somewhere in-between, although uncanny and dark and sadly after that, one could not forget not listen to it after, for the couches were compact crate-as-if-put-on-a-ferry, cargo-ship or one for trash, but sawed in half-like a salami with the slowly being run around by a sharp butter-knife side of it, being set in a cork-screw position, as well as it bore several saw-like formations that sprung out of it, as an oinky war-pig boar, puffed up after that, as if then filled the room with a pipe that, upon having been drawn into again, that is to say by lung, inhaled then spat-choked after, they left the city in a state that rendered it very much so, irreconizable, with him having impaled himself, a nigger flung on lynch-lynch rope, but done for granted, take-a-g-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-, last call for action, bring the niggers in, we'll do it quickly now, without regrets, as the sermon will finally be played one last time during the fall of the country where all the dead mean-men will rise up from their empty graves, in search of the one whose quick wit shot-snapped them ill-instead, when, despondent to his lack of regard to the surrounding green-tinted fauna he had failed to notice and truly take a hold onto until this moment, he took a moment to truly appease his senseless urge to please himself as he would or one would, in his place, in his place now, in his place for the time being unless told otherwise- not to, immerse oneself in the surrounding world, only to realize that he created that chaos and the will he had to escape, to scrape and salvage what he could for a better chance to start it all over simply was not there any longer, having abandoned one-self, him, left, Paranoid, as to think that Somali-niggers are trying to kill him, to have a go at his throat, these nasty sub-human niggers the kikes have flooded every single one of Western Europe's finely crafted nation, upon the sweat, bodies, hard-work and never-ending chain of sacrifices they and their ancestors, whose blood run in their veins had to endure in order to give birth to a much greater future for their kin, for their nations and for their people as one. A voice rang:

'I loathe them, filthy fucking sub-human niggers, promoting their groups' interest, trying to push it on around the world because of both American and Kike's ever-solidified cultural sweep across the world. Rendering terms as people of color as being obsolete when in reality what they mean is more niggers. More filthy niggers free-loading wherever they can. In their filthy 'NFL's', in their sub-human 'sports', in the media, in the entertainment business, barring whoever else just so happens to 'steal' jobs they did not earn, they didn't work hard enough for and are incompetent at. Niggers, a peoples incompatible with every other race out there, including their own ethnic groups as well. It's only fair that, if they adhere, this applying to everyone to a system of modern tribalism where one would be allowed to promote his or their own group's interest that, with such a primitive action being set as the norm, that they should be treated as they deserve. If they are asking for preferential treatment for their race, to be treated differently when convenient in regards to their skull shape, skin tone, eye color, ethnic background, so on and so forth, then the monkeys have admitted to themselves that they are incompatible to everyone else. Even the more 'educated' ones, niggers as well, promote stealing, they promote theft at a different level, which is, frankly, unexceptionally unsurprising. A sub-human nigger-monkey will always be a monkey at its very core, the very base of this nigger-creature being a hairy sub-human, incapable of assimilating, creating its own communities only to drive everyone else out, then complain about the most simplistic things as simple sounds, simple words being uttered at them. Which one is more damaging? Allowing them to promote their interests, at the expense of other ethnic groups, or calling them what they are? Calling out their filthy behavior and reminding everyone that without it, they will step on everyone! These sub-human monkeys will step on everyone as long as it's acceptable and convenient for them and whether or not anyone will admit to this, they all think the same as I do; they feel resentment towards the kikes and the niggers alike for doing something as unacceptable as they are given the free-pass to get away with. It may not be as extreme as this, it may not be expressed in the same manner as this, but whether or not you want to be truthful, it's clear enough. When people ask for the best candidate for a job, the most fitted man for that role, that spot, that, whatever it is; it's clear enough that they show their aversion as to the different treatment other people are given instead of doing what they promised or claimed to do. Trying to employ on equal terms in regards to meritocracy; acting as a nation and not as a race; but complaining about 'discrimination', when, at the end of the day, people are still people. No language, no affirmative action, restraint as to whether or not one is supposed or ought to be barred from 'using' certain terms or ideas, will ever change what happens in people's minds or what they act like. The States as well as every country where an easily differentiable, quasi-homogenous ethnic group of a sizable population is found will always be segregated, by theirs or not's choosing, since they cannot see themselves as a people at an average level. If that cannot be resolved, if they, as an average are incapable of distancing themselves from that, it's simply impossible not to treat them differently. As it's been shown time after time again, without exception; but theirs? The niggers are also far more violent than any other ethnic group, their racial stock is beyond inferior and they are more likely to trash, destroy and do far more damage than everyone else, than every other ethnic group out there. Lower than animals, less human than apes, to which we share something close to ninety nine percent of our DNA. It's irrelevant. This world has a projected population of something nearing four billion African-monkey niggers, whose infantile-destructive behavior, as well as ardent brainwashed by the American Population, the Kike Population, as well as every other ethnic group out there, far exceeds the likeability of it being excused, by common sense and normal means, in circumstances that would've found themselves being unacceptable at any point in time, which cannot last forever. Nothing does. Nothing ever does. And when the kike control wanes, when the world's population finally gets tired with the passes these nigger-animals are given, then the natural order of humanity will be restored. But, most importantly, if history's proven something right, time and time again, it's that. At the end of the day, the niggers always end up at the receiving end. Whether or not it's being enslaved by the Jews, the whites, the Arabs, their own people, their fairer skinned counters parts, exploited, belittled, used for whoever or whichever group's advantage, whether it'd be through de-industrialization, the 'war-on-drugs', planted by the Government, driven into poverty, or the eventual cultural and social decline that is to come, it will be there. It will come and they will finally be shown and given the proper treatment these animals deserve. Since, that's what they act like. A primitive behavior, masked or not, bequest a primitive response. There's no way around it. If one type of behavior in the same vein is acceptable, then so are all others. Not a single type of discrimination should be acceptable whereas others are permissible. And unfortunately there is no other way since the; it can't be called American any longer, since they're Niggers, Whites, Gooks, Spics and other mongrels that see themselves as that, but a Racial divide that will have to be dealt with eventually. Kikes cannot live among whites, Niggers cannot live among whites, ditto for the other races; this incompatibility has never and will never work, under no circumstance whatsoever. All of it. Nothing but a façade, smoke and mirrors, covering, masking, lying, being untruthful, infantile as to scrutinize the slightest thing said when in reality much worse things happen in all aspects of not only the American but around the world as well, that they would promote a similar behavior, propagating their 'values', which are nothing but tell, don't show. It's what humans are like; hardwired into them, whenever there's a sizable community of a similar yolk as yours. There's this tendency to be more likely to gravitate towards them rather than people of different backgrounds. It may not apply to everyone, but it's shown itself to apply to high enough degree of certainty that it's undeniable. Words of violence and instigations at that point become truthful, the sole truth that no one wants to talk about. Beyond it even. It's the only thing reminding you that you are human at the end of the day, when you've come to the realization that those people don't fit, will never fit and are given something that will never have been given onto you if either the circumstances were reversed and you found yourself in their place, or if you worked tediously and hard-enough to earn it, by your own wit, strength, intelligence, hard-work, creativity or the strength you've inherited from your ancestors, their vigor as well as their will, to either carry on their legacy or establish one of your own, because, for many people that serves as the main driving factor of their being, the force that brings them pride and keeps them pushing despite the fact that this same force invalidates that of others since theirs is a shallower reason, earn by shallow means, devoid of pride, devoid of strength, and, incapable of realizing that, those people deserve far better and can achieve much more for the benefit of the entirety of human-race, more so than any other bastard mongrel, my likes included could ever achieve, bred out of selfish behavior, an incapability of thinking far ahead, or well-thought of intentions. Because this world belongs to them, at the end of the day, the White Folk, the European people, the European Nations, or whatever they might be referred to as. And we are the low-lives, the scum of the Earth, the ones dragging them down, and worst of all, in our arrogance, we have the nerve to rub it in their faces as well, which is one of the most disgusting, most disturbing thought of all. Having the fear of acknowledging the fact that this world was earned by them, by rite of strength, conquest, endurance of time, gift of wit, an out-right fine display of intellect that far surpassed and still does, that of other races, an unmet creativity that may as well be deemed beyond human and something, something that they lost. Before the foreigners and people of other races came along. It used to be pride. Pride of one's nation; then it became pride of one's people, pride of one's race. But eventually, if left un-fended, even that might be lost. A desensitization to their plight, as a people; propagated by the Jews, the kikes, the sub-human group I belong to, the niggers, the gooks, the spics, the mongrels and the likes; leading the world to a pitiful end, a pitiful fall of Civilization, of Society, a call-back to a barbarous lifestyle, where tinier groups will begin warfare again; the fall of technological advance, another Dark Age, the end of creativity, the end of innovation, of hope, for a better future, for anyone's people, especially those that are homogenous, and superior, like the European people, who have created everything, but whose birthrates have begun decreasing and have been on a steady decline for a long enough period of time now, whose countries are being invaded by niggers and Arabs, open borders being promoted by the kike-pedophiles of Zion-Israel, the American-kike controlled Congress, the International Jew Bankers, the Entertainment Business controlled by the Jews as well, whom cannot fathom being devoid of achievements, nor can they acknowledge the danger of a world filled with filthy sub-human violent rape-killer, destroyers of everything, niggers, that would drive in the billions, with their inferiority, only to crush and ruin every attempt at something divine, whether it'd be held by Christian or Worshipper of many Gods alike.'

These Sub-human kike-mongrels destroyed the United States with the Immigration Act, and they intend on destroying every country in Europe, as well as, across the world with the exception of their Sub-human kike-state, Israel.

A two paired, by face-split melted body, tall-sprung with empty feed, whom were as filled with water as the rest of their eight heads walked, quickly enough to have increased in pace to a level where the happy native people around him or them began bobbing their heads, rearing them to the side of, since they were trying to nimble on the top of his rounded toothed-bead formation, his collar- of strange caught In each other's grasps gouges, that, started pouncing on each other's outer-rounder, more pronounced occlusions, projecting one another farther and farther away from the initial 'hatching' point as they formed a sheer wriggling line of 'bubbles' that started thrashing, already, in whichever outer-bounds and outer-reaches they could stretch into, having created by the point of their departure, corpulently realizing how dangerous it was, placing themselves as far away from anything even remotely appearing, even at a superficial level, a proximity, wherein their rendered forms, touched, even if by mere blunder of thrust done by a jerkily-sudden hindered jolt of sided-knee caused prior to contact being established, by being tripped, either by accident or intentionally by another man that stood adjacent to him in this numerously-incalculable yet clearly wide-spread crowd, whose meter of incertitude only added to the ratio of impermeability per man of no hope as to find out whether or not it constituted a – setup – soon stopped by a grasping hand whose grip had almost shattered his collar bone in order to prevent them from touching, an aperture whose closed-entry invitation was deemed most inappropriate in terms of behavior since it only, need it be said as thus, bequest a sudden urge unmet. A man had charged at him with a blunder-bluster gun's shed lodged, and bed, the fiend of night, this villain of remorselessness whom had come from unobtrusively unkind a worm, whose colossal stretched had almost drawn out of him whichever breath was to be said, twas cold, or deadly-quiet. Damaged even, all of them, to such a degree, if allowed say, that, by the arrival of the already alarmed authorities whose almost enduring inviolable, unchangeably frozen in place, expressionlessly endowed by an un-alarming state, despite the disquiet nature of the entire scene that was presented in front of them, of disparity, disconnect, as well as an unprecedented calm that unappeased some of the members of the crowd who saw it more as a far-fetched cut-out from the events that had transpired prior to their engagement in their affairs, that in turn allowed for, while they were carefully compressed in smaller groups, or 'urban' circles, the creature emerged back on its feet, shaking off some of the dust mice that had accumulated on top of him, then, with a sudden urge to do something, or anything in the matter as to, furthermore consolidate its, not only advancement but sullen expansion, it stepped forward, staring the figures, as they were met eye for eye, down, that is to say, the figure representing, in actuality, a figure, as in measuring to about twenty seven or twenty nine meters or so in height, to a degree of uncertainty, for those whom were in his presence, as to, whether or not it had grown during the time it had laid in front of them, 'unconscious'.

'I am what I am, and duty is more important than anything in this world. Duty comes before sense, duty comes without reason, even when done alone; whatever the scope, whatever the cause, up to the very point where one is incapable of doing anything else. I don't need to be trusted, friend. I'm in no need or hurry to prove myself otherwise.'

'You'll turn on me if we cross the bridge at the same time, you know I can't trust you, right? I can't go without you and I shall not have my hand forced, not while there is still time for me to do something to stop you. I'm not going to be struck down by you, bastard!'

'And I expected no less of you, that's why, we're both heading the same way. It's too long to cut, we're both falling off once we reach the mid-point.'

'Then let me stay here, I'll wait for someone else to come. You can even draw me farther behind, look, you won't have to, you won't have to do a thing afterwards, you needn't worry about me being tied because I won't be able to crawl back to the bridge, and here, have my knife, I don't need it.'

‘Why not use it on me, then?’

‘I told you I don’t want to stab you, I won’t do it. I, want someone to cross me, but not you, anyone but you. I don’t intend on dying just yet, but.’

‘Won’t be a choice any longer at a point, I’ll grab your hand myself and guide it to the rope. Then you know what happens. In no way can you get away from this, from either one of us. We’re meant to do this, both of us.

It’s strange. Whether or not you think we’ll fall or. There’s a chance I may change my mind. That we may cross it safely past that point, that neither of us will do it.’

‘I don’t want to take my chances on you.’

‘It’s riddles with wolves.’

‘I know of them, I’ve heard their howls earlier, but I won’t be convinced to do it, I will never be convinced to do it! You’ll fail, devil!’

‘This isn’t exactly how you think it’ll go; I’m still a man and I need only my strength to force you if I want to. I need not else.’

‘Then what is stopping you, child? Are you just as afraid as I am, perhaps?’

‘It is a.’

On the other side of the bridge:

‘Do they intend on passing or not?’

Abbys-Yhj

Eighteen women have been gruesomely beaten nigh-close to death, where the angel itself showed, openly invited itself in the room so he could take a shot at them during the never ending waves and tsunamis of rape that followed soon after. So much rape happened that their eyes had been gouged out in order to allow for more rape to happen, and even then, while it happened, that was not, it was definitely not enough to please the men who simply came back at it after going back and forth, several of them at a time, trying to get a few more shot at these pure ladies that had been untouched prior to this rape-that happened to them. A few hundred rooms of rape were wide-spread in this rape-hotel. Every single moist woman was raped by power-rape with power tools and the flares that had been shot from the distance by the strangely dark shadowy machines contained nano-rape clusters of rape that continuously raped them by force-violence filled with rape-fuck impregnation they could not abort themselves out of, this eternal punishment having encased them into solidified rape-like spirits that looked like them but pure and made of transparent light, gelatin-like casts in which they rested in, submerged, yet incapable of stopping the rape from happening. One of this rooms had so many women. Plenty of them tightly tied with rape-ropes that shook and vibrated while they were being raped, broken apart with rape, as rape crawled in their ears. I hate niggers. A giant wheeled trough holding a tall stack of wheels and a birdcage in which a kebab-looking trunk of appendages rotated around as to be conjoined to every bar multiple times, holding no lower side of the body and a head that almost looked like a beak, that was upwardly pointing opened one of the deformed giant cradles of spirits that lay inside of it. There was a terminated part of its face that's been excavated out of what had remained of its part-skull. They had to dig it all out with spades, after the wretched assassin showed himself up the booth, then slapped a C4 off the side of it; stitched together, arm by arm, that's how they put him back together, and now, he was the chief operator of rape on these parts of the lands. A siege had ravished most of everything, destroying life as it had been previously known and observed. A terror unlike any other showed itself near him, the subaltern, of a lower tank, taken out the war by one of the Russian Militia-Master kings with eighteen hundred fifty faces, the giant. He had only four torsos that were as thin and long as four slick- two segmented straws that were connected in a peculiar bubbling mass below them on which it walked. Out of which a stranger longed Russian- with four great arms corn-flowered out of the side of his throat, as in, they came out of him, but he had no legs, nor was he a humanoid, but a result of the pseudo-birth that had been forced out of him by this strange device that had contorted itself out of existence for some reason not even they knew since it glowed, like boop-boop-boop-boop-boop if tracked and someone counted the bleeps with that sound, spitting in my face while doing it, nasty faggot! Fucking close your mouth, -kind of response being given, by the sounds of it; wild precipitations following soon enough; whereas there was absolutely no reason to anchor any thought or remember that there was not a human in sight, only women, and women, as there was no need to bring attention to. Black-door of iron:

A special kind of device was attached to the attenuated to the side rod-like clicking horizontally flipped V-angle that held all of the coiling, recoiling, then readjusting back in place wires that actioned the main device the opening mechanism; the magnetism appeared to play a key role in leashing all of these cables while preventing their full-thrust out of the area they had been confined in.

The sound of which cannot be restricted at all, from the looks of which, the dreadful antlers that followed soon after were of a measure that could not, by any means be allowed to continue their growth, especially since they allowed for an incessantly annoying reticence of some kind that would disallow any kind of pseudo-social intercourse that could follow soon after the various revisions that could be placed in the same domains, the waves that had entered them being of no use, other than to allow the invaders to come and trample with their pikes and guns and various other means of destroying everything in their way, since they came in the thousands, all made of waves of skulls filled with giant liquid bolts that had been hardened as well as filled, with the darkest, most alarmingly proven-as-to be excess of fluid that followed soon after, with their slashes and wallows in pain and squirm, tender yet tenebrously abhorrent, much revealed to be made of high pinks, grays as well of greens, too many gradients to be seen that would otherwise be uncannily impossible to decipher by normal means since they were so, fluid in form, so wretched, as to allow no actual bone growth to occur but instead, these things would march alike, tsunamis like, devouring everything in their path, like some utterly inconvenient yet distraught, hard of anger, yet devoid of un-repair, soon after, made of a much different shade, of blue, phosphorescent, as its clear intrusion into the thoughts of, the room they entered that being, the great chamber inside the cave, this brown rooted by many squirmy altars, adorned with plates, blades, chains and the most unnaturally hard to stare at for long periods of time, incessantly dark-blood drawers, puckers of the most disgustingly-robust types, all come together, then wrapped-disabled through means of reticence being taken away from them, whenever called, the men, all four connected around their heads, welded in, then entrapped by the altars stood there, waiting their turn so they might be complacently trampled by this tsunami-thing of gelatin. It was something they wanted, desired and deeply, as no greater hope could hope to achieve it; they yearned to die by it. But wouldn't say a thing, since this delirious desire would not make it any more apparent than it was:

'Slay us, slay us as quickly as you can! We cannot live for much longer unappeased by trial and done!'

There was no reason to delay either, not that it would make much of a difference anyway:

'Waiting, it's waiting for you, go ahead, you should be capable of tailoring your way alongside theirs. It should not be any difficult than that.'

'A ballot, there should be a ballot in order to decide whether or there's to be any survivor allowed to continue living, unattended, then discerned and siphoned, there!'

A side of the cowl, darkened, as the echoes prowled, they themselves being carried through. Not easier yet lease a-new.

'There's no reason to wait!' A strangled voice yelled, but dimly prodding. There were other forces there at play, and without reason one could not easily, again, discern which one was real and that, the one that wilt itself wilt not.

But the voice died down, and there was another wave that followed soon enough, worsened by a crowd of unruly things that were inhuman, worsened by the time the timber was being dragged, taken apart, as to forget for a second who was being it and who pulled the strings and ventured forth, as brought.

A darkness unlike no other that was quickly enough discontinued during a storm of rows that were well equipped with quills and other instruments of varied sizes that when put together formed some kind of edifice extraordinaire of a much revered coming as well as an easily recognizable extraction of some Hugemont of Cabot, of some even lesser recognizable extraction, there being, to someone indiscretion adjusted to the almighty but repelling as to be discussed between the people whose sub-adjunct stature had infiltrated the 'arena' which was converted or had been converted, by the royal degree of some, unnecessarily said, since all's been clarified countless times in the state-validated by one of the successors, of ancient decree and rite, inside such an esteemed perfunctory prefecture, as one of the chief attorney generals would have it indicted by the sole abolishment of a reparatory disgraceful storm of thunders, don't think of rains, but of power apparatuses come onto the sight of a wagon that's shot itself out of the canon's first epicenter of sole perfidious allure to the tottering back and forth armament that their ink-bottles made of tuned to outer layers of the universe during the time humanity's conception as we've come to know has only come to the concept of spikes, large outlandish tusk-like spikes coming out of their shoulders and out of their eyes as well as out of their guts; while having been set on this oozing contrivance of niggardish, niggardly, nigger-on-the-lynching-rope-stand-make-him-perform-a-Jim-Crow-dance, the thing a ma jigger, it's a god damn nigger'- echo in the distance confirmed an already secret suspicion that the people inside this un-lighted by no candle but ventured forth by dark, giant, two or three feet tall giant figures who'd smash every single one of the trapped - s heads if their giant humanehumanoid entire bodily sprout out of the cuts around their 'wrists' from which they came out of, grasping forth with breathe of purring cats being worn and eaten, then spoiled with the first of the lots which had entered the field of mice and the other tinier bulbs that had infested, in an interval, on-going, which had been have had been through got by many, or would've been have had hadn't, if it hadn't been had had being, been for him to have been had have to begin with during the time he'd been had, hadn't been as had been planned to have it willed be had, is as it is from this point on, although he's not to blame for what's being been had been for him not to have been had in the first place, been had, blinded by the force of a fast travail that shot after him, at the back of his head, only for one of the running people to twist and twirl around, finding out that they were barely aggressed as these depressed into his shoulders, almost claws revealed themselves as porous beings, with a multitude of shapes and colors, flashing in the dark, no longer unlit- lighted by a tinyish fleshy paramedic parasite that had begun feeding him with the firmest insolence with its ante-eater 'beak', the mass of meat, a heart with a few tops of machine stapled on top of it, with a power box that shook and bent, a few chiseled in depressions and something that looked like an air-vent still pointing at him with utmost alacrity, while also attempting to get something from him during the time his beckoned forth heart was being consumed by the insolence of darkness that was felt by him during the echoes of the malborious moon's first drawn apart curtain which had sent upon the sight, revealed only to him as if by veneration, yet, instead, one would've had seen no remorseless Anaghast as to be met by such a psychic-ward fruit-cage loony bin, like seeing niggers run around and raping, as they always do, once the kike-Jew infested media had propagated upon the people brainwashing 's come to an end deprogramming of the people run its course, but one did not know any better than to keep his mouth shut instead of speak the truth as they would send him there, calling him insane, despite having stats to prove that niggers rape, niggers kill, niggers are mentally inferior, niggers need to get lynched, and miscegenation destroys not only the purity of a much superior race to theirs but it also bring the economy down on the long run since most of these Monkey-like inhuman creatures, whose insolence is but abhorrent only produced dead-weight to its extreme; appeased as such by the passing thought during his run-and leap towards a standing beam against which he stood for no other reason other than to afford a single moment which he might use, Alfred Hugo Un, whereas one would have him stripped away of all that made him living, livid and still reveal some kind of strength inherent to him that no other man would dare challenge him in a duel or dare do something that would have his stricken down heart evaporate in an unseen powdery thing that no one else could understand what for and what the reason behind it would be, from thereon out, he would be blind, sickened upon the slack-luster and salaciously cumbersome entrenching encroachment of a lower substratum of species present there, eating from the bodily deformed crumbs, while running along and away in the dark, with their apparition-like eyes in which they themselves were uncannily unaware as to understand what was going on from the point of them being completely robbed of life, malformed, malnourished, destroyed, partly, leaping and one-footed beings that would by all means be incapable of robbing all air from sight but come upon the wretchedly harm of bodily harm they would bow down, worshipping the pain induced onto them by the indoctrination of the foremost hard-fell upon their brows, hardly wrought but impressed onto their bodies by gelatin roughened by each curbing nail of yore dissected yet discerned, still, there was no reason to despair.

'I'm beginning to see it, somewhere in the distance, in the plains of quiet where I first found the mules that've come and entered, leaving their marks, appeasing the darks in theirs unquenched need to end their lives and slither in reel with rope, as their children's deaths in whispers covered their luckless boats.'

'Have you heard of it still?'

‘Of whom?’

‘The light-morsel, the one that’s being fed by the giant crabbing pink-teethed prodger; that fined with black-empty sockets, three pieces of a hive, flat, made completely out of bone, but puffy, like some mammal spore-shell, bringing It dead flats from somewhere off the cavern-crag!’

‘Lead me to it, immediately so!’

And they both followed through that hellish thing of palms of sandy whitish marble-hedged, rotten carcass bats of led.

Something was swimming in the pool; deeply submerged under some rancor of many tools and tips that had succumbed as well under the waves of pressure that had cast away the arms and the men that fell off, sliding off their tips, entering then dismissing one another’s drowned foraged bodies that began inflating until they had began covering some of the wide-spread deep sea-large beings they postulated themselves against.

‘There’s no entry from where it came from, no open door that I know of.’

‘I think there’s a man behind that man, the one with empty hand-palms, on his stand; doing a wheel, peeling off the walls and covering himself with them, he’s thin, but not thinner than fifteen meters away to his right, although chained by barb-wire.’

‘And you are?’

A season for the cattle

A few lines were formed around the first two sectors of the eight, eight of them. There was a crudeness to both the peasant and the strangers standing in front of him who had rounded him up before he could get out of the hole he stood in.

‘No one’s been there over a long-long whiff; I could puff out an entire trail of them more than you could, every now and then possibly think of, while not even breaking a sweat and you’d not even recognize it, or that could possibly come in handy.’

Hardly was there a matter of asking before he pointed at Yarn again.

‘This won’t do you any good I think. I broke it, remember? I crackled it inside my room and closed each door. There’s nothing here calling onto what I did or on the reflection I cracked before they brought her in and raped the door.’

‘That’s something I wouldn’t enjoy thinking about under normal circumstances.’

Standing next to him were two more guards. One to his left and one to his right, far taller than him, bordering the ceiling, that was far-ending both corners into two ships that both faced different directions.

A strange hall, as it'd been, there was no other way out but through one of their side-openings that at the time appeared to be obscured by the very wells that had had supplied the sewers with twitching eel-water in the first place.

'I grabbed my pants off the floor and I began slapping them, for no apparent reason. Only because I could; I did it!'

'That's quite intuitive of you, old man!'

But what they didn't know was the fact that he had also lighted a quaintish wax candle he used the flame of to dip the tip of his pencil, engorging it in its amber-flames until the ruddiness of his pencil had contrived him to let go of it.

'In vain would I've foreseen it thus; that which might've encumbered one likened to you, otherwise swollen of nodding, for what I could only entrench to reconsider as for fractions of degrees they would've quenched the need of largely asking.'

'Assured as I was before, thrice as much I would've found a reason for deceitful therein be; I've but a single little prick I could scoop out your soul in agony, then throw it among the rest in the pile!'

'A blow top my pride, and I would not falter!'

'Nonetheless, I find your spite to be something as wreathing as never been found!'

Drums of tired:

'Some of them are not hard-willed enough to make it through!'

A few plainer days.

If the air was any lighter; if the fins were any righter; if the wind was blessed with such reproach; and some had mourned whatever had cast, the right approach.

'A most venerable repute will follow soon enough!'

'For what was said, twas withheld!'

And a tallish ramp curved-beaked, wormish of a lumps, warts and fat, snakish figure 'stitched' together out of coats of dirt come from swamps, that moved and coiled and formed its toil. A giant helmet-like head drew out of the body of an elongated cylinder bearing a constantly falling on itself sea-dolphin-like tail. Many spherical tendons making its lower side, on which, though hidden as they were, the projected walk kept going on!

It crawled upon itself dumbfounded. Elated even by sins of trench!

'Am I getting sumthing numb? Can I get some spirits, son?'

'Only but a drink, dreary father, for you've sunken yet another!'

'I have eaten the black tree, and I succumb to agony!'

The pain was yet something to endear, but out of pettiness, or of fear, none could say but little now, to have sunken, therefore gone. Couldn't say, nor couldn't be, what they thought, of piss and teas. But the spirits of the rum, and the spirits of the numb, whom followed him through youth and gone, never left him now they run! Run, run, run away! Don't look along the way! For they think you can be gotten, with a leery drink and sunken!

'My son, there, you can see our ancestors that still live among us, buried in the ground, deep-footed, but rooted by basins of ever-soothed, large diseases keep them alive, bacteria and snails and other types of parasites you wouldn't believe to have existed unless seen with your two eyes!'

His father had said some words of war, interpretable by the High Admiral of General Defense's quota as being a direct affront and personal attack to his countenance and personage, which is punishable by immediate termination, death. Patricide could only be forgiven if the life of someone of equal value was given onto the oath of there-kill, with an immediate follow-through transfusion between both corpses, under the vigilance of the Oath-keepers, whom were there already, glowing with pus and many antlers-curved appendages of green rubbed rotten with eyes and smaller elongated human foreheads bearing strange four-shaped mice-rats cysted crystals sticking out of them, whose whiskers were blackish hairs of stone-like fragments, chiseled, that were put on top, and plain as this pus-pore filled umbrella-like coat of their upper bodies filled with the arms and appendages were; of, each of them in part, four great-cartilage rods that were put down as if by the sides of invisible prisms, or tents, equally distant from one another, upon which they moved, for strange bone-like legs. Weirdly enough they looked like puffy white Christmas trees; eyeless, but very much capable of seeing:

'We've been called by your thoughts, alarmed, even, that we could only bring ourselves so much near to one of the fears we may've had. To think it such, that there was ever a chance for us to begin this reticent upheaval of darkness that was ever-present since the day of your dark birth, Gas Hughbad; your father of biological birth has done something that will never be acceptable by any means at all. That is to say, he is responsible for your death in the future unless changed by immediate action. The keeping of an oath, like the reverse cutting of the Gordian knot you're so much so responsible for cutting!'

'But I've not even done something wrong to begin with! I never broke the law, nor any oath either; neither have I done such a thing that would require immediate life-extinguishing spill of blood, nor have you any right to order my son and as I stand still, Gas, you shall listen to me and only I can order you around, for no higher power is there in life than that of a father, ordering his son and telling him what to do when the time comes for him to prove his true allegiance towards. No other man, spirit, machine, of being can intervene at all, through this, through this! Blasphemous things! I wretch thee still and I bear ill-thought towards you as I stand, as I am and as my countenance dictates towards this postulance I'm forced to bear such a semblance of loss of thought and vigor of my spirit's come onto the brow of some unfair choice my son's forced to undertake before I and a council not made out of my own peers, but one of blasphemous beings that have naught to do with the issue at hand! For you and the concept you represent is ill-willed against a man whose loss of wonder has repelled him from both the material and immaterial to such an extent that I would have but naught else but the least I could clasp my hands around, and hold against. My blood, of myself reticent to such a thing as my heart would beckon no other reason than what's been had. And what's been had throughout my life is but a wretched thing of many losses and many costs that could've been proceeded onto the account of others, being snapped and ripped in half, unpunished as they were, I'm not going to hold it against you, for I've been brought to sense a long time ago!'

'But their punishment followed sooner than you've thought it so. And to adhere to the allusion that we're unfair in our judgment is nothing that could be lightly taken by means of there being any trough of lesser thoughts in the matter spent than we have ever-so since we started, during our conception, darted, played with and very much nearly considering beckoning a stop at; a certain point of piety withdrawn, confusion and so many considerations being taken aback. Yet not for a second did we stop our search for fairness in judgment and what we've done to take claims and do, and ever-true to our word, we've been, wherever we've been to. So you needn't despair or call us treacherous anyway, for the men who've shown you're their back hands, who've blackened your soul and cast upon it such despair as to try, attempt, and drive you to poverty if such release might be called fair. We've taken the assessed requirements and needs that were beckoned of us to be, as to be called, and to be seen. Kilt them where they stood, or made the uddersome, yet appalling choice of having someone do it for us.

Yet, eventually they had been punished and kilt nonetheless, at the will of a quilt, a message or some bolt, some dainty brick we've made fall upon their heads, then stopped!'

'Why good man, I seek passage easily thrust through one of your unconfined apparels, that I may be met by one of the finest, foremost, kindest of maidens, by the name of Valery, known to me only as someone I can thrust as see a must that I may yet so near a puckerish a question, for her fairness is out of worsened tension that may be plainly put onto my lap, her beauty being a thing of no countenance, whether be brought or not back into plain view, whether I could see such withdrawal of simpleton sinew; I could fare less! Luckily enough for me, that such a thing is out of question, I would see no reason to endow or to ask you yet again, where is she?'

'She's dead, and I'm the Grave Digger himself, the man who put your wife to sleep, whose responsibility was to chuck her in the heap where she belongs, rottenly gotten then chopped for every staunch and run, and rum we might've gotten ourselves after, put in doubt and there, renowned, our hands having only been put to such a difference of no solitude's grown, before yet after. And therefore gotten, will we piece her back if such's the wail. Otherwise, let her spirit rot and death prevail!'

'So there's but chance, a chance of such prevail, that one such as I might be, such and such attain but little of the mark, to put her back together until fully grown fully like she used to be once again and once more before I can properly run her still into the grave myself and beat her after whenever I please, as that's the fate she's betokened to!'

'Then so be it, if you may ask of leper's true! You may have a go and do what you please past the throng, trying your arms around her throat, then play with what's left of her if that's what you desire most!'

Led onto the paved cypress, during quiet's abode onto the road's most blasphemous home; gone at times, and empty grimes: Where to and fro they walked in pairs of bitter guns, all that were pointed at their feet, readily actioned by such tit as one could see it jerking. Machinery on both sides, the streets yet peculiarly set on a decline, but fully loaded, as each brick, open ever so slightly, revealed the mechanism. A simple thing but one to follow; invisible strings or movement shallow. Either way they could be triggered just at any moment with such devilish release that they could be lost for words then shot for more before any either ore, or whore, walking puddishly on street, abhor!

‘Careful, careful, for each step would mean a nail’s death, each one could worthlessly prevail if that’s the only thing you spare for bore, and therefore after!’

‘I didn’t take you for one so meticulous as to avoid every cumbersome death at chance!’

‘Man be weary whenever called to attend his funeral!’

Dreams followed in the night, nigh slept on the floor, wide-opened eyes aroused during the morning only saw a few batteries entered through their heads, as to jolt and awakened some kind of impression that was being only swollen past the heed of the reigns:

‘Chersonese gas, add some more!’

Bottles were adorned with pumps, and entered through the heads of men, all of the sudden they appeared to dance around them, spitting and bathing these humanoid-automatons; which started glowing with podgy ooze, and appeared to be trying themselves, therefore staunch. A bloody thing, wretched numb. ‘A finger cut, a finger cut!’

‘But for how long will it last?’

Eating, they ran, trying to take a man-part to run around, never-to attend discourse, with the empty apartments, many with pits open and some ugly lower levels being put inside the prattle lot. A cove-like pit down there, empty lights appeared, a miner of the blot:

‘Don’t do it, man of wonder, don’t wander down with me, or yer be lost in blasphemy, I think there’s something down there worth awakening in lesser men. To feed them, to feed them!’

‘Who?’

‘I think they’re rotten of the worsened lemurs that were eaten by the godly lesser, the deprave!’

Of spoil, of spool, and therefore true, the dancing glance-around and ever-closer, there on cue. Many hot-ironed broads, all were wretched therefore lost!’

‘Should they be whipped down there, then?’

‘Where else, where else? I see nothing that would grant me the satisfaction anyway! I see no reason not to beat, not to make them weep, of lofty heap as the one that they were taken out from, out of and from the spiral of bastardity, the desperate reality of the matter is this! They’re rotten, and they shall come after my soul if I allow them!’

‘Wretched like women? Petty pudgy such females? I see no threat, I see no threat! You of Yore, bastardity in man, how dare thee wretch them thereafter still?’

‘You’ve not had to deal with them in there’dth sin!’

‘Fine, I leave thee spoil’

And he went in the hole, then came back at the threshold, much returned:

Depravity wasn’t even held to a need bequeathed, to such command rendered, and therefore after, much alacrity distended, with, and therefore yonder, never-Moor, for niggardly as the nigger is, he can’t say a thing that’s true:

‘Therefore, I bring such forth lie, they’re not alive. I’ve dismembered them time after time again and would but remain with a single numbness, strung and wrung!’

But in fairness, in all farthy, farting’s worth, of pleasure felt; they did appear to do something to the place in terms of what it looked like and how beauteous it were. From such a point and pointy tilted, and thereafter there, rescinded! Was there a prattle, was there a blot of paint that flood would silken after, through a sill! Depravity, depravity, that could only be felt! He had to save those women, the corpses, or else his manhood would be in question’s end!

One

It was endless and made of many, not a single end could be defined, only most malborious of wretched tinnacences could be brought to light, and bitter life, for all was made of it, life was brought. To a stop as well, taken for, but many ills; wretched countenances, as one would rather feel such likes. Dreaded lantern holding arms appeared to’ve been bred; upon a sanctimonious most ingeniously hard to look, tw’art single wreathing, wrathful graze that appeared yet to hold but arms, and necked-runs of coils long-attached to the elongated clasping pincer-like exposed rib-thing, whose hinged, means of entering the walls, whose mouths foul, and came up-forth, there was a single wreathing towering figure-main, whose elongated reigns, the steeds formed there, below the platform of growths, that came along and threw themselves on and on, as if charging in every possible direction, copiously they ate, from each other’s greater horned rifted, plow-through maze, that stretched and elongated in itself, millions of times in every direction, dimension, then tried for. Four great heads as of rooks were filled, and bathed as they did, in much regard; they felt each other’s heels torn apart. Shouting in most mirific a nature gone, immediately on notice, disregarding, such contortions, was there no need either to draw and lift a single limb torn apart. Munched on.

Its arches only now began flaring around, flattening one of the curbed around, darker corners of the eyes, that started coming apart, drawing air from the bubbling-plough throughs of every single wretched heap that came out of the air, then joined the main girth of the being. Various spread-spreads and mountainous things that followed after.

A coil bore something that moved around a surface that could clearly be delineated. A torsoesque front-ward, wayward to the south projected with a steely set of many pincer-like formations wrought together spearing mongrellic teeth’ish incisors –humanoid-like molds, akin to a beast’s more deformed past-through metallic-set of cast-together pseudo-cartilage rack held inside this almost shell-chitinous armor that’s but twisted around, from the side, to face one as for the incisors to come out of its armless left-sided socket, that’s equipped with a ‘foot’ aligned to the munchers, drawing forward like a shot-unnaturally hard to look at pool-of pain- unwrapped swim-pool of wax-figuresque appendage draft of put-together saw-like, from one side to the other, up and down gnawing at nothingness battering ram-form pointing at the sky but musingly flat, form; being pushed over. To its sides there stood only two giant spring-transparent limbic-twisted drinking-horn needle insectoid crawlers upon which it drew forward.

A wreathing weather-top of growths, bog-like in appearance murk come on top of them, drawn together as if they were bathed thoroughly in a most disgustingly disfigured kind of poncho, whose deformed, but diamond chiseled facets only came together every now and then as to draw in breath from the most uncannily deformed kind of filthy-draw through eaten piece of leppage court-drawn in it, shape that came on top the greatest most rotund surface that could come into the plight of faces that drew, from one side of another, as they were held inside a putridly, hard-to look at hammock of unfathomably dark stings and stingers, wasp-like but bearing hive-things of bags, of skin and filthy brim that came together ever since they were given notice of whom was around them, darker still, as the day began, in the various planets that were destroyed but cut and made part of the great beast, where many but attached by cords-like attached to the soles of their feet, as they walked upon darker shard-crass glasses of steely mazes come onto them, were they hung about by their throats and killed, and eaten from their guts, and still eating they did, the darkest creatures of whose hearts distraught destroyed all in their path. Weird limb, two heads with an axe-split in halves.

A bloated anchor-like wide spread-sprouting out of every fifteen hundred billion star-spread, in terms of added, to the count, billions of light years away, if they had existed at that point in time, alleviated of any possible life. Wretched lobes attached to elongated strings, bubbling-planets filled with oozing transparent yet exceeding their growths, entering smaller homes, tinier atoms, through which they'd root-and-uproot themselves yet again, concavely set from one portion of the nearest, partly rotten piece of meat that flopped around, each crown of gourd-ed piece of lump, whom by then was pear-shaped in a small area, fifteen seventy eight miles away in whichever direction, both in and out, forming largely, slightly raised, wide-spread areas- whose crisscrossed, almost 'regions' were segmented as to look like elongated put-together triangles, forming a pseudo two dimensional illustration akin to a peculiarly hard to pin-point, hardly a matter of looking at, through a funnel of visors, seen by a convex seed-shaped shuttle with a few elongated spears coming out its back in a straight line, which were connected to a kite-like parchment with an exposed, elongated face, whose teeth rubbed themselves the wrong-way and were pointed down-being connected with the rest of the dark-like platformed globe on top of which, although not-directly, as for there being an established connection between them, there being only a superficial thing between them, like a wind-shot through both, plastically elongated by neuron-atoms of Quantum power-spell'ish incantations, whose brow-through shot leper-cradle nigger-manes, lynched-pocks were only visible inside of the dark reflections that were being forced out of the tiny-yet-maligned area through which they swam in and out of, this being an unnatural hole in which it stood, the globe, fitting in, gloves-put in cripple's prosthetics, being an un-deterrent to the strange unnatural haze that entered them soon after. The entire face, close enough to a distorted comb, or a parachute that's been horizontally rotated as to face the fine – stringed bubbles, many of them being incapable of protruding out of the vein-like formation of steel-cut through bloody boils that were all connected with the first straddled onto them veins that came into view. A dark abode was open during the first maligned opening inside the cyst. A cancer-filled with nigger growths.

A dark comb of hairs drew from one side to another, elongating itself anew to one trotting about the garland blue.

Little sunken teeth forming a net, littler than that, out of them drew out, syringe-brought bedded flanked from every side, blimp-bodied caterpillars with throated neck-in-neck bodies put around it, in a wrapped swollen nest that drew around each bite. It's only been an hour ever since a sprouted, many anchored shaped being placed where they didn't belong, nor would they find another pinned on surface. A leprous thing being subservient to them, in sight; whereas a few unnatural pinheads began flying around them, with tiny specked cysts going all around the curbed enclave.

A great organ appeared to some coasted rift, during the viewed stretch of some eighteen hundred miles appendage, drawn to the bodied fornication of many eaten upon each other's larger platformed staved upon, wretchedly benign as it were, defirmented by leash and flatness cord-of many mouths, filled with an illness unseen before by anyone, or any of the billions upon billions of ever-changing in shape and form appendages whose withdrawn upon nature, ever-buried inside each other's helmeted-heads. Many tumor-filled, but openly carried on almost recognizably anatomically grown or developed, enveloped cubes made out of mouths, that were placed in socketed inside each other's skeleton jaw-bone formations of skeletons that were attached to one another's inner plates.

Yonder there from a growth-filled root emerged, an unnatural thing, a chariot rotten apart cranium-skull, Dinaric in appearance, morbidly devoured by rust, as if left-over, cast out of itself, many humanoid torsoed tinier heads, that were attached to it, a trunk could be seen, yet filled with tinier barely holding together clasp-pincers, whereas, the occipital bone was but a bag drooping down, shaped as an eggplant, in which a single body appeared to emerge out of, but beaked, and featureless and colored in a green-diseased skin, put together garb, leathered by thumb-shaped parasites. Whereas the chariot skull was caved-in broken as if it had received a direct hit by a shot out of a great cannon-domed around oblongoid bullet slug, that was quickly withdrawn or pulled back. A goat's beard would've made the trunk in terms of placement, at the chin from where it sprouted, whereas at times it seemed as if the entire body of it was made out of the growths, that thinned with age.

Somewhere

When he was brought in the cage, the Colonel was joyous, joyful and content with his imprisonment, a good sport altogether, one that didn't mind spending the month inside of the torture facility. He even came to like it, in some way that made him more approachable. He ripped off his arm entirely, biting through it by force, munching on it like some kind of invalid on prosthetics of clot. He leaped around from side to side, inside his cell-mate, the two of them being conjoined at this point in time, by the arm, which wrapped them both, together, inside a pseudo-womb throne, but their blood was purple, as they were not beings made of real blood. This purplish blueberry thing; it cast out every limb, including the arm in question. It made a hole through the infantry's second level, whereas what little was left of the Colonel's left-over begged for his 'blood' to return. It was met-half way in by a prism of cysts-butane barrels, which had been delivered to that point by a strange wagon with two armed guards coming out if wheel contorted great cricket legs, the ones that were arched together and held apart by stings of steel. Part of the blood rose, out of it, the culprit. Frozen into place, as it was looked down eerily by the two guards:

‘The Judaic Masonic Non-White but European-look-a-like Kike-Jew Semites, who did not die during the Holocaust, since it was not a ‘Holocaust’ but in actuality only a few work-camps, that have been put to the employ of man throughout history during the time of war, have overblown this ‘event’, that was not only non-unique, at all, under-no circumstance whatsoever, but, they pulled the death toll numbers out of their asses for money, since these kikes are greedy, not-human, retarded, filthy, disgusting, scummy, low lives, lazy, constantly asking for reparations and money, trying to suppress free speech as well as any attempt to draw attention upon them, subverting governments, with their only redeemable quality being their hatred for niggers; kikes sure to hate niggers. Filthy, fucking good for nothing niggers; kikes own a lot of nigger slaves.

Well, I’m done, my good friend. I think I finally got it out of my system, now, I can finally move on with my life, and forget these filthy Semites ever existed.

I shall live a gloriously peaceful life and move on.’

‘It’s good to hear that you have finally found a path to thread upon, one filled with knives.’

‘I shall collect knives and stacked them on top of one another, making various rust-covered formations, beneath which I shall give birth to smaller worm-like wombs in which I shall form my above the water, city.’

‘Let us see this city then.’

Eleven hundred-hundred years later, passed:

A few people were seen outside, working on each other’s backs.

A migraine, it’s what made her stay her hand and listen. Box put on table, she noticed, for some reason it was there. An outlier; it was paid for with twenty or so, people. Murdered and chopped-butchered, pain per gallon of blood n’ pint; the desk was hard-iron with alloy-placated, on a business day, her thing, now spoiled. IV needles, being strapped on the engine; little bits attached to her ankle-shackles, the ones that were being attached to her throat being his hands. Wrapped finely, finer than iron; clenching, squeezing, hers was his. Cherry-popped dead:

No one wanted to speak with her, Rounder-Clara, spoke of dad instead:

‘He’s been trying to get me a red ribbon ever since I told him of the birds that neared by the window-sill.’

A burdensome grand specter appeared, bore before them, with only one wretchedly hanging humanoid arm, with a single funnel twisted corded hose-growth bag as a lower body and an outwardly regurgitated protrusion coming out of its ‘mouth’.

Some of the wide-spread limbs were lodged inside of it.

‘Would you mind drawing the curtain, please?’

‘I’m trying to, but.’

A few slithers of cotton-flies drew in, by the side of a muddled-in muffle of pies, a mantle of white dust following in its trail as the moonshine songs rifled in, the sodas being underway, the cold winds of October gusts, to which none thoroughly belonged.

The memory: Wretched-Mallure Mallet, you are therefore condemned to serve the rest of your servile life as one of the wardens of the stony plates of iron while ensuring not a single man will be capable of excruciatingly getting out alive without being completely beaten to an un-mitigating, lest one would account for some succumb to a reprieve as to be somehow allowed the change of pace through which allowance might account for a sudden release out of the black-toxic coal-drilled fumes that would otherwise, by all means poison them as well as their minds, to the point where their accountableness for the livid-share of growths that will have spread across their rotten cistern-shaped prisons, the various traps and trapdoors that had been placed beneath these demon-like creatures that are buried in their suits of nigh-indestructible armors that are also caught at the threshold of almost being released out of these unfathomable prisons not a single living soul could by any other mean hope to escape without being ejected in time to avoid the traps of heat- propensity of which would boil or at the very least liquefy any other man of any other bastardly origin if they were to as much as do or say something they ought not have had, by all account being something so terrible, something some dreadful and borderline inhuman, that these sudden alterations of sound-echoes would allow for the fluctuations in air to act like some sort of funnels or some tunnels as they will have replaced or misplaced the air molecules, allowing for heat to travel through this vacuum that’s been left behind, entering through the oxygen retrieval gaps, as one would know that no armor is without its flaws and it’s almost impossible to create such a suit without accounting for the more minute details, in the shells or the pitty-tiny-pudgy scales that were amassed here, there, titter, tetter, closer, farther, spread, closely worked upon, carelessly aligned, then allowed to spread and cluster, until finally, no longer would they be pushed out of the various stratum and layers that, otherwise would’ve been fine, but which had been placed there, although it would defeat any purpose as to ascertain this nigh-impenetrable for-all-intensive-purposes invulnerability, as one would have it, intentionally so by the forger, the master-beyond-apprenticeship-but-not-as-far-as-one-would-actually-come-to-think-of-the-viciously-disturbingly-hard-to-look-at-slaves that surrounded these tiny barred caves, which could not be referred to as anything else than what they were, since some beings, these beings, the ones that surrounded the cages and acted like the pseudo-transition yet to be, primitive in some way, as for their allure, and as to allude to the nature of the fractioned- filth instilled and encrypted in their very existences, as it happened, for the viciously deformed niggardous creatures that you will take the place of, Mallet, as you are still to be named the most lugubrious of Infantilism –Ogg, these wretched almost beaded by nature, long-necked to the ceiling carriers of four great egg-shaped heads with tinier bodies hid inside of them, sniveling at us, since we know and we’re very much aware of the fact that the bodies they carry are not humanoids but something much worse and harder, harder, as we’ve failed, the last time being, to fully scan through, or complete one of our regulatory, mandatory yet whose failure to comply-to periodicity-of deductible inferences lead us to believe that they might be evolving, like fetuses of some kind, slowly being brought onto life, although we cannot explain why, we’ve seen them before, much earlier than this, yet we can’t explain the sheer-difference in size they display the predisposition towards, as to hide away whatever chance there might be for us to properly hint towards the chance of a proper analysis that might be underway, having therefore, been left with the only possibility or deal one could somehow hope to deal with, that being, drawing all conclusions, all of our conclusions, even the ones that we have only, in our darkest hour considered in a thought of jest, as thought experiment or something beyond the impossibility of being, from the previously scanned X-rays we managed to properly go on with, from the point of which, I dare not say another word of, that would be devoid of any other predisposal, or as to border a proposal of such oblique a countenance, I therefore judge them as being something closer to the maligned blasphemous image of altars, such as one would find them wriggling yet basking in the absence of their lower legs, which, having been considered of no use, nor would any proper consideration, as to not have been taken into account, be wretched or dreaded from that point on, the tendons, or whichever else these coils that are connected and go past their clearly entrapping egg-shell prisons, that they themselves would warn others, telepathically of the dangers of trying or considering the fully extend of their lifespan, the eternal-in-fortitude of blasphemous agony one would have to be forced to endure while being trapped forever in a cage, gouged, beaten, thoughts intruded, leaping but incapable of telling whether or not a step had been taken, as they connected, yet again, these connectors, to their almost, torso-like but iron, jolted of a piece, these Sarcophagus beings, whose shoulders were fully puffed, oblongs, but chiseled, whereas every single one had a hole perfectly placed in the middle, in their middle, as if they were one being that had been shot, as if they were the Pharaoh themselves, whom, upon having been transported by some mystical power they themselves could not explain as anything else, or him, as to attempt to discern whether or not an entire Dynasty had been taken as hostage then killed, then lined up, and shot as if by a cannon, one would see, soon enough, the extreme change, as to be completely struck by shock, as these bodies were but incredibly 'pure' in terms of alabaster or marble, since they had began shining, so brightly as they have been turned into a white, into a pure depiction of that, that, one could not fathom as to seek any other reason or explanation as to their existence, or their sudden, emboweling transition into a more primitive state, devoid or stripped of all adornments or colors, or so-much-so, 'features', which, instead had been replaced by three holes, where the eye sockets and where a nose might be found, neckless, but connected to a great shoulder ball, the size of two great heads put together, with the rest of the 'body' being forced into an almost chiseled, chipped, carved or worked upon set of facets that rendered it or them the appearances of altars, despite which, and with all being taken into account, there was nothing inside but pure stone, nothing inside them, other than, although it appeared to be strange, this hole, this brick-shaped but rounded up, as if the canon had actually dented then someone restored it to its proper standing, well, if one were to allow it to stand on its own 'feet', that is to say, the coils, they would be met by the image of an almost made entirely out of roots, tree, holding on top of it, a one hole-made through the bulk, held upon it, or more of a key-hole bearing piece of armor made of silk, or so as to say, a brightened piece of flashing oozing power-holding tenebrous creation whose uncanniness would disturb any watcher, or turn him back as to gaze again at what he thought he witnessed prior.

Mallet, the thought intruded over him, as close as something that's never been seen or heard before in spite of all the previously lived-through hallucinatory pathogens that had inherently been with him since the day of his conception or his deceitful-initially in appearance birth that would otherwise accommodate for no man the benefit of allowing for a fit of rage or something of the kin to appear there for a long enough period of gestation as to be properly observed, tested, experiment then rightfully put down as to allow some other bodies of medicine or framework of documents to lay there, in their offices, readily pulled out during some inquiry or something similar to it, as one would be in need to check on them, on it, or on them, the twins that sprouted out of his back during his birth, that would otherwise be deemed as being something unnatural, but hadn't been since his mother was some carrier of many back-bulbs out of which they came out of, squealing as they squeezed themselves while also drawing out of her body with many unnatural back umbrellas of cartilage that spread with the likeness of an almost sea-jelly like concavity that spread and appeared to allow them to simply bead every limb through and along every spear of gelatin that shot out of that thing, therefore making it way to common for them to crawl and escape in the strangest of fashions, which in turn was something that appeared to have skipped a generation when it came to him, since he was incapable of actually adhering or propagating this malleability-induced flexibility of movement they used to run the miles, to set themselves in arches of flight, to glide as quickly as one would allow oneself the second, while being on a plane field's playful trajectory-set alongside the coast of cars, during the traffic –at the rush hour hedge through in this sea of trucks that were aligned next to one another, across the side of a large bridge that had just finished celebrating its inauguration twenty days ago, twenty years down the line, its tenth anniversary, where there was this, this, thing, hardly explainable, as in, you had to see it in order to believe, as a sea of corpses appeared to surround them, but they were all made of rotten-corpsed animals that had formed smaller bridges that allowed one car at a time to ride along the side of the forests, the parts of the city as well as the low-slums that had slowly been allowed to move on top these 'marches', that instead could not have accumulated much more than they did there since the sky itself had fallen apart, and appeared to be lodged at some far, distant, fitfully spread, don't thread on me, don't hurt me, don't abuse me –kinds of noises, but they weren't real noises but the whispers of the gusts that were flung about the creatures of the macabre yet come onto me as you may if I were a man that killed your family during my self-righteous vigilant crusade I could not force myself to draw away from, as I've come and stumbled upon the 'Homeward' –with a pointy white arrow, hot-poked in the carpet, as if some elusive white birded race of arrow-footed beings, or one, had imprinted its footprint, for some reason avoiding fully gauging itself all-the-way-through but deeply-damn, and come about, it managed to push it deeper inside until there was but little left of the hairs that came about and sprouted from the come-in-between, days, of the vigilante's that come onto the ways of kill, the appeal having been lost when the slaughter reeled in, several times at the single homely-home, Detrimental to the hope of there being a crime-drop in this hopeless city where there and there was still a chance for the Demon-crats to arouse the locals into destroying as well as running everything down in order to have their Presidential nominee finally pick up from behind, from an undeserved spot he would otherwise have lost at the first sign of heat, slow-boil on the pan like a frog would he end up, he would've, if it weren't for a maliciously well-thought, or somehow well-timed, even if it was by accident, riot that allowed him to gain some electoral votes, although that wouldn't matter as much as the probability of the College's allowance for his rightful opponent to somehow step in line, snowballing, trampling, disabling, crackling, bulldozing, curdling, stampeding, terminating, stabbing, pissing, cackling while doing it, rubbing it into the poor man's moistened by some anti-aging crème, while the recovery period was still on-going from having had some of the puffiness beneath and above his eyes slowly be removed, by the looks of which, this operation, that is to say, trying to make it seem as if he hadn't had undergone plastic surgery, somewhat gave mixed results that were highly, yet unexpectedly, not beyond the ordinary means of trying to meet this travail of cones that had been rotating inside people's shoulders after having grown like the disgustingly tumor-like parasites that had been controlled by the entity responsible for slaughtering more than ninety percent of this planet's wild-life, without and as little of concern as there was possible for a man to actually go ahead and carry on with, as one would expect it, to kill, to kill himself, to kill them, to kill anyone who dared approach him, to kill his mum, to kill his father, to kill children and commit other acts of slaughter was something Mallet didn't consider until someone delivered him, upon some gloomy day of, least than one would find it respectable to be known or shown some proof of the contrary belief; envelope that made it clear enough that his mother was responsible for this chaos that was tearing the city apart without the incursion of the higher forces that promised to intervene if the chance was, or if there ever had been a chance for them, that even now were standing as the edge of the city, cackling with such pettiness of low remark, ghoulishly-appearing, but their appearance was not to be withheld for any other reason more than what they knew about this legacy this creature, this ingot of no worth provided them with the amusement of, during the time they had forced themselves to shine, with crackling lights of red, blue, green, violet, but all represented in flashy grays, while everything done by them was done for the sole reason of having to bear their stay for a few more eons, as they could not immediately escape this prison they themselves locked themselves in, with padlocks shaped like giant shell-like eye-socketed with mouths that formed downward pointing almost spear-shaft 'tongues', that had been hybridized with the lower 'jaws', that had weird elongations of hairs but only grown in the back upon which they walked, every distinctively-separated hair being an oil-rig like leg they used to walk on top of, then all around, not to mention the fact that their movement was quantifiably hard, extremely yet flamboyantly to such a level of eccentricity that it could not be discerned from anything even vaguely similar to, 'else, said; to extrapolate from, or to predict since theirs was a movement of speeds uncanny, beyond the limits of mortal men, as they simply appeared, to the common eye, large bloated water-balloon oblong, nasty pseudo-humanoid top-headed, eerily surrounded by mist, while also giving an uncanny valley kind of feel to it, to themselves that is, impression, of tall-moving organic Silos, but who moved like parasites of some kind, which defeated the very purpose of their beings since it was not them whom were the parasites, but the jailers, or the wardens that had been put in charge of not allowing the prisoners to escape. A dreadful conundrum appeared to have poisoned his mind. Mallet was walking again, without his disguise. And his hat was missing, that of the man who crossed the street, although limbless, he had a tail and two eyes that were connected to the clouds as long-pulling over, dragging kite-strings that carried in bulks the size of men, but there were no men in the sky, which made it far stranger than anything expected. And his mouth, it was half-a-circle, with teeth outwardly protruding, - like horses', but compressed into a flatter, harder to define thing that was unexpectedly light, and harder to pin-by-touch or make out. He had a bag of skulls he carried, sometimes even yet he spoke in tongues. While he approached Mallet yet again, some streets cleared just as quickly as there were men up and away, then all around:

'I think I've something to show you now, something I've been working over a long enough period of time that I feel confident enough you'll like it.'

'And what if I don't? What if I don't like it and I'm left all disappointed like you're always leaving me as? I'm done doing the flooring for you, can't you see that I'm all sick, and they don't let me see what's happening past, here and there, up the great structure.'

A screen attached to it, but it was mostly obscured by some mist. Tall standing with many iron piles of junk, with two faces that were jerkily uncanny, ugly, and almost appeared like Polish jesters, one sad and one happy; but they weren't like that at all times. Sometimes they changed and recalibrated into the most demonical structures for some reason. To scare away the intruders, to make them behave, or close a wink in case, in case someone got some funny-business of an idea to rub it in their faces the wrong way; large Cuban cigar shaped rockets pointing out as they were lowered. But it was not flying, either way. Kept by some invisible structures that moved, and sometimes they formed emancipated long lines of I's, connected to C's or cinderblocks or large plates that kept everything from falling part, while also managing to prevent the entirety of the structural integrity from bursting since everything was equipped with explosive globes, invisible as well. Large spear-long batches of invisible beams and iron-propellers, everything attached and pumping in it, during the most presumptuously superfluous, but left unseen savory attempt to prevent the lie of it levitating from reaching the public ear, or in this case eye. Spray cans, paint-drops and even the rain, which the weather devices prevented or cut off the reach of, from around it as well as its surrounding areas from splashing by chance, extending over a great radius of wild-kilometers that would prevent even the slightest, hardest, unnatural, and most inconvenient of accidents from happening. No sprays and no spittle, and there lay, at the end of the many roads that went both around or lead directly to this 'building', a great fence that prevented any non-authorized personnel from entering.

A part of it should've been incomprehensible by all means of adjournment, since there were a few flakes that were left in by a trail of what fell out of a bucket-full-of petals, rouge, of reddened-boil, merged with the tall man's head, another bump, the iron-hold, which had been melded to his corrugated armored-bodied fused with the four-legs in a trail, a crawler-like machines attached to the back of his body, akin to some caterpillar-device with eighteen hundred or so wheels, a coffin of metal or something similar to it against which all six of his arms were being kept inside, while, and as-well as he was lopsided forced to move, like some insolent unnatural distraught mongrel with plenty of eyes that were all revealed and were forced to come out of their hiding, although not from where they stood, not from where they'd be expected, nor should any man in his stead expect anything of much lesser need or worth, of worthy quietness the angel's wisdom sung in Heaven's taken broad abode, open for those that prayed to him, although an abomination whose apparitions of bulbs, these elliptical glowing thing, appearing here and there, everywhere, past the mounting need as to repay the man that rode through the night, at four am, only to bring him one of those pyramidal feeding devices his bloated body was so in need of, there would've been only a moment of respite for the coffin to fully open and out of it, a light of many skins-shaded and come out of it, a brothel-bathed, as if inside there had been lain, the many-months and yearned-for anger filled with many past-the-puberty hit women's plight, blood delight, their periods were touched by naught more but his insolent tongue. Most annoyingly so; the coffin was only wrapped to his spine by some disgustingly hard-to-look at chains of meat that entered it like chains of iron felt by feet upon when whipped by power-strikes of nigger-like ardor being cast against them, time-and-time again, for no reticence would do to take away, as he withdrew from the scene and suffered as to be incapable of removing the bucket off the swollen area that had spread. If he had been luckier, even by an insignificant amount, he'd been dead. But that was not the case, nor would there be a reason to say what otherwise was too obvious for him, as well. He lived in this carcass, made out of the infinity of the numbed-growth. The many 'anchors' that had made everything were very much worthless for him, since he had yet been left unknown and lesser still. He'd seen and felt much worse, and there would've been a ballot if they were there for any other reason so.

'You're without arms, for what reason do you both us, then?'

'I seek entry into that room behind you, it's so round and fleshy, I can see the worms beneath you, and how they wriggle still and how they've made the forms of men that had entered the fewer jars you've left of gelatin. I envy you with all my heart, for I so desire I was a part of you, a friend be called. My never-ending torment allows me to paint and do nothing more and nothing else. So, there, again; may I be left with some respite spent in your chamber?'

‘You may not, unfortunately, I cannot allow you to!’

His head was ugly, like two sheets-outwardly facing, thrust out, then wide-spread, razor-blades, but longer, giving the impression of a triangular-deformed prism which was placed on top of a two-spread, half-in-cut body, of two great panes as well, connected to the face, at the back of which, both behind the head and the body, a few hundred growths of see-through glassy-liquid inside of which smaller more organic bulbs with legs could be seen. Two giant flat eyes, painted red, his shirt, whereas his face was a tad green at that; whereas the strange thing about him was the mid-point between his chest and head, which united them, pushed in, extremely so, as if he had been poked until the deformation had occurred. As if he had been a wall made out of for plates, but he’s been pushed in. And there, there he flapped, like a coal blower, a puffer, or four great moth wings. It wanted to say something else but he would notice something happening in the room and wince.

‘May I take one of yours?’

‘Not unless you still want to leave with your head still beneath the bucket.’

There was a monkey inside the room, and it was leaping around, madly, but that was, hairless. Of course, it was brought back to life, only to be fed upon by the fleshy buds at the tip of every single one of theirs. There would be no contestable thing.’

Near the side of the trenches lay what had once remained of the wagon, at large, now emptied from the looks of which there had been no feasible way of figuring out whether or not anyone had escaped, at all. There were several things, aloof, speaking of perdition’s come to an end, destruction swept the sea into a bubble’s throat, out of which several bodies started crawling out of holes they ripped through the sky in order to eat what had remained of the sea-life, although the fruition had been loud, vociferous in hearing itself rang true to every call and everyone’s need to attend when the run had finally come to a mean’s end, the lack of water having perched even the least capable of breathing animals that were now playing around the cliffs, beneath the shadow cast by the flying machine, the cylindrical see-through cast of an iron-held almost sea-canister whose four brazier legs cast a shadow’s nest worth of pebbles filled with fetuses of the infantile, whose Chinaman head-piece of iron curved up-front, as an eagle’s tomb crest, drenched in sweat and covered in the most disgustingly forlorn crawling masses of fat that shot around the crest of the cyst’s coming; against which it was reeled by and against, coiled as if by power-line, swung back and forth, then allowed for the former eaten-torn apart, messed with by the power of a sociopath that’s almost died down there yonder, in the last of the empty parcels that remained alive. Some village-men, tall and curved in a direction, empty skinned alive face in appearance, though their angled head tips only pointed backward as a swirl had started suckling from the other side of the sky. An area could be discerned, twisted yet painted from blue to red, as if soaked in blooded crimson, and in dark, it mourned no less. Echoes started shouting as they bastardly attempted to impress the falling fiends that’d rotten the sky with each step. Each jolt and every single worthy thing that could vaguely be seen as abhorrent, worthlessly thrown from the other side; a lichen’s boat- in the shape of a cradled heart, inside a pack of hyena’s put together globe of energy, a ball, that disappeared as soon as it was spat inside. And it looked mightily bizarre from their point of view, seeing a water-vortex, that would under normal circumstances be seen in the water instead of the sky. But drawing in and out, extending, then retracting, seemingly disappearing into nothingness only to mess with them once again, only to have them wreathed from there on out, again and again, only to have made them suffered for a second longer, through the respite of being pained, to have stuck into each house, and each raft, every stung-about man fallen on the ground with his sad-appearance from there on out forgotten, as they would let him be no more.

‘You’re marked by him, a son of his, I swear in wager, you, the stranger, whose heart is done and put through shades, whom’ve been cast away; by them!’

Higher-ones of dark resin, always hiding, but never to such likens as they’ve been, rightfully before. A wretched pair of pliers would do him good, especially if he’d scream during the saddened, dark allure they have presented onto him. No man’s land, it’s what been called, and only the dreadful sekt what little common ground one would have between his brothers from that point on, otherwise dissected, otherwise, to have never been seen from, thereon out, fended. Was the evil that continued to proliferate, most dreadfully abashed in dream, most clearly benigned with rot.

And they called it, the bastardly ‘red’ sun. It was alive for some reason, never spoken out loud. Never said or whispered in secret, or else the ones would get mad at him and mad at them!’

‘Lest you wait or get into the habit of keeping you clap shut, I’m afraid there’ll be no teeth left to pull!’

A swoon; and a swirl, the villagers were far too young in youth of age to be destined to be turned to grave at such a damp embrace as no one else would have them after, taken into the powder of the rafter and into the bastardly cemetery’s rite:

‘I am still plighted to see a light through this ululating tunnel; out of this dark abode. The tall house, inside of it, I seek no worse.’

A piece of their cage, faultless through slander, they had reeled it slip through crack.

I’ve heard some noise.

‘I’m alleviated to know that there are people still around who’d find my company simply as.’

An elusive person entered the house. He was red-gray and covered in circles that extended past his body and were made of some fleshy-rugs; moving along with him and crawling out of sight as they entered through the walls, then out, but he had no eyes either, but large spherical glowing embers that were turned into crystal once the red was hardened up-to-lumps.

Down there

‘I am the hurricane wearing a mane; and I shall take you before you refrain from permission-granted telling me, not to see, leer away from, shakily, telling me not what I see, but what I’m owed, given the. Fact, that I am not in control, I am on Adderal, when I feel at home, but you, deprave-concave man of no little vowel, I see thine side and see your cowl, I see you thus, I disembowel!’

‘You are thus a vagrant of petty moon, are you not?’

‘As dark as a plain-to see monsoon, call me not as you may see, but feel what bloated glory be for a man that’s fancied lesser yet. A blime-sublime, and perforate.’

‘You shall thus make yourself abhor, no wonder but some petty whore!’

‘Yet you’re here and by you am joined, not to slicken such a dame, abhor!’

‘I’m lest be known to wonder, silk-basin. For therefore treasure ever been!’

‘Maiden I’ve there-of, ever since and sic or what I’ve read in sin, known to letter. No such word.’

‘And such is petty-petty, more.’

‘Will you join me thus in dusk and death? Wilt you to be told of yolk and better yet?’

‘Nay, not since absinthe there’s but since and much miss-due, for ever true, as they shall feel such cantor, and ever-wont for, never lay. Abhor as I will, such’s such the day, when I shall be seen and sealed, of mighty heel, by your side and never-shall you mind, no better yet benigned, adorers to be blind, by no other reason twas such said. Other such, and mighty dead.’

‘Then leave my sight and never be and never shall you, thus shall seethe.’

‘Then slouch and yearn and feel absinthe, for you shall fall in such a sin.’

‘Will you lead thus to empty grave?’

‘Will I join you unless you refrain?’

‘Never shall I do the likes, for I trifle less oft such lee-sight.’

‘Then join me yet in thought and ponder.’

‘Never shall I see my family’s wont after!’

‘Then join me thus whenever contemplate.’

‘I’m blinded and I’m bland of such leeway.’

‘Then come at thus, and I shall receive. Not as a son, but at my deep sea tit.’

‘And sunken shall I be foreboding.’

‘We part ways as such, unwonting.’

Thus they both departed and saw little to no bother less. No lady true of such impress.

Outdone by the waiting inquiry of a thousand walking men through strode –between and each mark.

A lousy thing nonetheless, to have impressed no one of a similar kin and kintle-prowl!

‘My forefathers’ been down here lane ever since their out-say in Louisiana, when they sung with all em’ routers off the plains, were’mp scalped.’

‘Indeed they were since sum ‘like it, real-call em’ walk up-weary up-em scalp ‘em where they stay!’

And hope halvened ever since, and thrice the calling, of absinthe, of what would enthrall to call and forever that might betokened of withhold, if any, all.

Various corners of its face appeared to be fragmented in some barely materialized solace-heated fetus-like tendon apparatuses that were conjoined by the side of an utmost close to itself, rearing each other come from the other side of the horizon, vertically held inside a gun-holster-like rack that was being lowered by crane-like cartilages, which, in turn were only a part of the main frozen mass that was nearest to one of the pumping sphere that was at the center of the greatly imbalanced gut-like wall that holstered just about everything in sight.

A voice had almost come to make itself be known, from a likens of a similar fashion, twenty or more joined it before there could be any reasonable exchange taking place between either one of the barely peeled off wretches that ran around and made themselves feel empathy towards a brothel of stark and staunch.

‘Fire flames, one after another, come, sprout and fare thee well if you choose as well!’

The poster read.

‘I remember you, from Prague, have we met before? Tell me, tell me, tell me or you will die!’

‘Who are you?’

‘I? Mars, I am Mars, the red!’

A skin-coat of red mars-two dimensional but sticking out like tri-dimensional bumps, pores, came out of him every now and then. With screaming faces on all surfaces; inaudible; he’d been busy.

‘I am one of the Gardeners responsible of ruining some of the pollution-plants.’

‘That’s where I remember you from; well, thank you for jogging up my memory, but I think you’ve been irresponsible enough for me to forget you ever existed. Good day to you and hopefully, we’ll never meet again from this point on!’

‘Wait, wait.’

A hold, a bold-yet clearly in peril gasping by its claws, unnatural, but hardly a matter for them to question lay there, hares for eyes, both sockets, but squished like tugs of war, wet-slapped towels, nigh-slug like organic visors. Large bulbic horn-tubes coming out of their mouths bearing large cylinders with bubbly things at their ends that expanded sharp spike-conical things with syringe openings that shot tiny larval people that scanned everywhere around them for food, a scavenge for food since they could not see it anymore. A light had faded, yet the blue; a perilous thing, for, therefore true; the thought of them being listened. Eerily they shot a glance, both on the same thought. The meeting room was no longer empty and air was slowly being driven out. Air was dizzy, a flume; a fluke. A knock came off the door, intruding in, with a vile air of repulsion being queerly forlorn and said to be only that.

‘Should I answer the door-bell?’

‘I think there’s a mother on the other side!’

‘How would you know what a mother’s knock sounds like? You’re an orphan of the world, and no orphans can live long without adoptive patents unless drawn wrong; you were taken out of the office, no?’

‘Not that I would think so!’

‘I am of an opinion that you, my good man are to leave this very house with immediate notice being given to the dismay of the porters who shall yet to endear the coming of a brisk trespass, that much so, I think we’ll come to no lesser agreement, as such than the one with which; no trouble should assert for long!’

‘I, the cursed one of the few am to speak at last!’

‘And who are and what and whom had given you the right so far?’

‘I could not say, nor would there be lay for what’s been spoken, vastly would there be a chance, daintily be misunderstood!’

‘Wait, Golfer, have I? No, I haven’t. But you did manage to anger me that evening when I wakened you from your sleep with the sound of my flute.

My, my, but you were angered, such as I’ve never seen before. Never would I have thought you’d react that way either. One moment you’re up here, standing eye to eye with me, and the next, you’re in your basement, ruminating over how to slit my throat during my sleep; like a rotten verge to asking me not to pick a dilly or to see me will-y nilly ask around for someone to help me bleed the leeches attached to my throat at all times!’”

He said as he picked up another bobbling bottle and the tube twas used to milk them, right before taking another chug. It was something he could never not get used to since he liked it more than anything he’s had! In his mind and in his hands they turned them flat, of flat remains. The cherub food cocoons that were formed of beads and fed him with the flies attached to his puffy eyes and zits; and boils and empty foils in which he had hit most if not all the toils of his suffering ever since he’s been infested! Mightily digested in, as they entered the side of his house, talking to one of the other, much uglier men that were benigned, ever lesser-so!

Falter would it not, tall triangular-torso, with two flaccid cones for arms squirming around, and the two-split conjoined faced of written parchments cryptically written on top of them, the almost-distinguishably makeable faces of men; a spiralling squirmy wriggling spear-shaft beneath it, fleshy red in its entirety. A blue circle on its chest, two great suns painted one and a few dancing devils on its back. Two ‘wings’ shaped like keys conjoined to one another at their tips forming a pseudo spade seen from above. Hunch-backed and grotesque in appearance; spoken as it entered the room as the sole progenitor of disease that brought to hearts in he would share with them during the dinner that was counter-intoned.

‘Say, have you brought news of my brothers since their passing on the Moons? I thought myself ever so lonely ever since I found out, ever since I was let known of their fate and yet I feel as if I was never allowed to truly find out what happened to them!’

‘Certainly not, ser; as a matter of fact, I’d wager there’s a reason behind every little thing benigned by him!’

Race war

The professor, who is a kike pretending not to be a kike, who is actually a kike:

‘If I can pretend I am a kike, then everything will be all right. I shall play both sides. If I can pin the Jews against the nigger-threat; If I can get them to be at each other’s throats, then, they shall be killed, lynched, slaughtered, maybe even kicked out the States. It has to work, it has to be, well-played and well-acted out. It has to play out well, so I may make my escape during the chaos. And after that, I shall burn their kike-state of Israel and kill every single wretched sub-human kike in it, slaughtering them in the most violent ways, flogging them with clubs of iron, bolted –niggardly niggerish; having them pay for all the money and valuables they stole throughout the ages. Lynching them over and over again, while raping their Jew-ss. To my delight and pleasure, nigger-kill!

The American kikery has to end, with every single kike lynched or killed. It’s the only way humanity can progress farther than the recesses they’ve so desperately attempt to drag everyone alongside them. Alongside their wretched inhumanity, since they know they’re so horrendous to look at, so pitifully niggerish as well as mentally-disabled by all accounts, theirs, theirs is but something that needs not be allowed to ruminate and continue; have their children killed! Niggers need to follow just as soon after, just to incubate this appeal. It needs to be salvaged again, the need man has to put an end to the inferior species of the jews and the niggers, that, as well as one more thing.’

‘How will you do it? There’s simply too many of them to tackle down, how will you turn everyone against the kikes? What of the monkeys? Dangerous animals beyond belief; if I were you, I wouldn’t do it, that’s way too dangerous for any man to stand against alone, since their chimping outs only bring so.’

‘Rats, there’s a lot of rats in here, this room is filled with rats!

We’re being listened to, I know we are, look, look there! Over there, inside that vase!’

A flimsily nasty, ugly-to-beheld, downward pointing like a six, falling on itself with fat, and cyst, a dark little puffy thing, nasty nose, Armenoid and tall, with many-a-hose attached to his lower side to breathe underwater, while the murky swamped thunder that fell, once the man chucked the rock at it, then fell, made the little sucker-in-fall in surprise. His demise was quick, as the little bugger quickly died, without even feeling anything that might’ve allowed one a moment of respite.’

‘And there as well!’

Rats in every nook and cranny, rats underneath the carpet moving, hundreds of them, with eyes of man and brandings of the most insipid-rancid.

‘Shut the door closed! If they escape this room, we’re doomed! They’ll alert all of their brothers of our evil plans and when they do it, the niggers will be on our track, we shall be raided down, and put down like nothing more, nothing, oft what we found about, and they shall sicken upon on the hounds and dogs. They’ll eat us as if we’re the animals not them!’

‘Then what do you want me to do?’

‘I want you to cruelly subdue these beasts down for the time being and stomp on their heads! Imagine they’re but inbred cousins, then stomp them until they’re dead!’

Stomp them before the rats do spread! Otherwise there would be no reason, otherwise withheld, to take away what’s been rightfully theirs. Colonel Hurt pulled out a basket of muskets and flintlocks attached. All in an arch with hundred of painted red-in thunder-shots! Aimed in wild-directions ever-green and ever-shot of lightning struck of bolts that fell around enflamed and leaped again, wild-fire that quickly spread, as if but chained, entering each rat again, lumping with each other’s tick-tick topped again, most of them but vaguely breathing once they fell.

‘Enough, both of you need stop.’

A door had just appeared twice spread.

‘The master, one of them, the one that’s in command, of whose intrusion might not be toppled yet; what is it that you want? Woth’s happened?’

‘I’ve come to ask of you to furthermore proceed on with the plan, as you may go ahead and wretch each corner of the world withdrawn and have it sunken into the ground that we may pick up from the bits that are left out there and feed on them until the time’s come for us to move on.’

It drew again. Fat-fat, hard to see; a fridge of meat inside a wagon moving on four pines with a head as wide, in the back, arms folded and entered in two see-through bomb-like cartilage bottles made of gel. But up-front an almost ‘human’ face; otherwise, he might’ve been, or might’ve yearned or could’ve been mixed with skin-resin.

‘What will you have me do? I’ve tried my best but I’ve yet to be listened to. Everyone seems to ignore me by all accounts, they want me, slacken, to be lazily thrown into a pit, gotten, rid of, beaten, tortured, kilt and yet, they don’t even known it until they find out who I am. For when it happens, they shall come.’

‘And you shall take them all, from this point on, you’re more than well equipped to deal with them in whichever way you should. As I’ve made it plenty clear that you shall not fail as long as you’re blessed by my sight.’

And what it gift it was, quickly lost in shambles wrought.

The Jews are filthy, the Jews are dirty, they are sub-human promoters of miscegenation, pedophilic child-molesters, liars, deceivers, degenerates, non-whites, leeches, whose Holocaust did not happen and not a single member of their tribe died in, whose state of Israel is a sub-human nigger-like thing, leeching on US resources, tax money, off the Congress and off everything the white man has ever tried to achieve; promoting the destruction of the white race out of puerile misplaced jealousy, schizophrenia, a desire to control, to manipulate not through intelligence but through cunningness, luck and wealth; regardless whether they are on 'either' political side, the kike will never be capable of self-controlling the biological imperative that takes heed of all its actions, putting itself before others, incapable of fully assimilating and living among other peoples as well. Not a single kike can be trusted and the only good kike is a good kike that's inside an oven, which is his grave, his stove-tomb, the crypt of fire, brim and smoke, where he is spoken for, by the Synagogue of Satan, where his father waits, to crack a whip on his back, like against a nigger's, yet hardly so.

They weren't even hiding it any longer:

'I am an ethnic, non-white, religious law, Talmundic Jew, who speaks on behalf of all the religious and ethnic Jews out there, on behalf of the Religious laws lend onto me by the Rabbinical Order of Eastern European as well as their Authority, on behalf of the 'Holy' State of Israel, the European Jewish Community, my Menshevik-Bolshevik Communistic Ancestors, the American Jews as well as the Media, the Banks, the Congress and every other position of power my people, whom I represent, conferred upon me to deliver this Holy -message. That being; we, Jews, who are non-whites, simply find ourselves facing the same old crossroad, that being, being met by these dirtily, as to be self-invalidated-mentally-speaking-by-their-own-selves-Simianesque-nigger-monkeys, these ingratiated sub-human, tawny-niggardly inferior to us, the Jews, subspecies, whose lives we not only fare as to be placed beneath ours, but also beneath that of the lowest denominator alive, that is to say, that I'm letting it be known that my words here today will ring as being true, regardless of whichever spot, whichever place, position of power, political denomination, whether it'd be the left, the libertarians, the right wingers, the democrats as well as whichever movement we're involved in, in the entertainment business, which shall ring ever clearer once you will have familiarized and worked with or for us, as to be the sole truth, you will have understood then, and only then, our true nature, that is to say, that we, Jews do not consider the niggers to be human under no circumstance whatsoever. Their lives do not matter, their lives are beneath that of animals, beneath that of monkeys; and they are to be treated exactly, as such, as they deserve. To be killed for our personal enjoyment, for we, Jews, loathe these sub-human primates, we hate these niggardly sub-human monkey-niggers, these brought of the jungle apparatuses that serve only one purpose and one alone, to serve as our nigger-golems, to enact destruction as we see fit, to humiliate, to belittle, to extort to such a degree that our solicitous nature will have driven them to poverty, onto the streets, whether it be through our system that is not only imbued by our slum-lords, or moguls working in the business, our connections, so on and so forth, but through and with the help of the Government, whose help and whose position we make sure to properly and most distastefully impart and selectively share between our people, driving out the white people out of position of power while replacing them with incompetent niggers, only to bring and dumb the system down to such a degree that their illiterate, poverty-stricken niggerish counterparts would end up suffering even more at the hands of their own people's incompetence, for no other reason, other than us, the Jews, profiting off it. While the niggers, these monkeys are distracted with the white people being painted as racists, we, the Jews, happen to be the most racist of all people, performing such acts that would damage and destroy, bastardize, divide and destroy all the races across every society we've leeches, we've sucked dry, we've exploited and lived under. It is in our blood, this duplicitous behavior, that attaches itself to other sub-human races, driving them to create chaos and to destroy everything in its path. We loathe these nigger- in-humans more than anything else there is out there, we hate how filthily, sickly, disgustingly deformed, ethnically degenerate and inferior they are in comparison to us. We, the jews, are worse than what we belittled and referred to as the 'Neo-Nazis', we so much pretend to be, from time to time in order that we may show people our true colors, for, is it not, does this, not sound familiar to you, at all? Does this kind of behavior, this speech not ring some familiarity, in terms of neuroticism, in terms of speech-like patterns and what not, does it not sound, altogether, as if it's propagated by one and the same? By the same Jewish ethnic group that has infested and promoted the same kind of degeneracy there is to be found in whichever extremist movement there is, out there? Ask yourself this, if the white people would offer the niggers a chance to leave or leave peacefully in their own countries, would we, Jews not seek to slaughter and mix them, as I have said? Would they go to such extremes as we have painted them as to truly lynch, kill, torture and do the most incontestably guttural things to them as we have said they want to? Or is it us merely projecting? I, of all, as a spokesman of the Jewish ethno-religious group feel as if, the truth will eventually resurface one day, our hatred that's been propagated by our propaganda against the white people will eventually be tracked back onto us and the truth that we loathe niggers, filthy sub-human dumb-dirt, fucking niggers, will also follow soon enough. Often enough, it's found out by people that we are on nobody's side, not even ours, but it also so happens for us to hate the blacks the most, these dirty- Africans we find the most wretched and the most inferiorly, cognitively –inefficient, a dead-weight to society, and basically, a filthy race of filthy animals. Niggers never won in their entire lives, ditto for the Jews, so it's only a matter of time until both of our races start snowballing down the hill, into oblivion, to a point where, it's inevitable that either a mongrellic, Asiatic, 'Arab' or any other Nigger race will start enslaving most of the Niggers they could wrap their hands around the necks of. Little simian nigger-children are our favorite treat to torture and commit the vilest acts against; and not even our own people are safe from these sub-human tendencies. We are incapable of assimilating, mentally deranged creatures, cowardly enough to hide it all away instead of living up to it and facing the consequences whether or not people have deemed it fair as thus. For I am the same person that is in the Congress, the Media, the Banks, whichever other multicultural agency there is out there, your ZOG, your shill, your control opposition, your degenerate, your liar, the worst things you could think of and little is known or let known of what goes through the mind of the person in charge of you, your people, your legacy, your future and most importantly, of the nigger-kill we enjoy driving through the other end of the nigger-beheadement, for I sure do like me lynching some niggers. It's our favorite Talmudic thing to do, lynching fucking sub-human dumb-dirty niggers all day long! The creatures we hate beyond belief and sense. All those politicians standing by their side; those traitorous white politicians, don't forget that they know, they are aware of this, of I, my existence and by belief.

They want us in position of power, they want us, Jews, to kill and enslave niggers, as long as they're getting their fair share. And no one bats a single eye, but they know. No one will ever be intelligent enough to boycott the Jewish lobby, no one will ever find out about this racial hatred, we, Jews, hold towards these subhuman niggers we loathe. We are ethnically cleansing Palestinian Children in Israel in the same way we wish they were niggers, just like we pulled a chemical one, on the Ethiopian niggers we castrated. Not all people deserve to live, especially not the people who are related to me. Everyone else is and has always been correct about the nature of the kikes. An infectiously sub-human thing, their existence; it permeates decadence and filth at a biologically inescapable level. I wish I hadn't been infested by their blood; I wish I could get rid of it, but it's impossible. It's senseless, trying to. Disgusting sub-humans, incapable of creating art, incapable of creating beauty, a bleak curse upon humanity; a filthy curse I cannot rid myself of. I can never reach a level on par with the Aryans, with the European people and it is hard living with this constant jealousy of them; one filthy ancestor ruined my chances at life. These sub-human beings cannot be allowed to live, shouldn't. There can be no democracy, no justice, no hope, no future with either them or the niggers whose inhuman legacy they share a connection with. Filthy sub-human kikes, worthless, dirty filthy-sub-human kikes don't deserve to live. Wretched childmongers, bastardly avaricious, inhuman, tainted, mongrels; unwashable by no amount of European blood they might attempt to steal. It is worse than a handicap, worse than a brain tumor, being infested with their mental inferior illnesses, their conditions, their filthy handicaps. Wretched sub-humans that ought to have been completely exterminated just like niggers. I won't be able to achieve anything in life because of them, no matter how hard I might try, nothing will ever wash this sub-humanity away. It affected everything I do, everything I say, everything, everything, everything I think or try to create. I'm cursed. Worse than a handicap, much, much worse; there can be no great end, or grand finale until the subhumanity of the kike race is put to an end, fully exterminated, to completeness, with not a single one spared, soulless, diseased animals, filthy subhuman rats. If only the Holocaust had happened. If only the Jewish-kikes had been ethnically cleansed, none of this would've happened. My grandparents on both sides were on the same side with the Germans. It must've been somehow suppressed. The danger of the sub-humanity of filthy that ruminates inside the Jewish-kike blood seems to lay dormant until a later generation or so. As there can be no doubt whatsoever that even the 'normal' Jews are sub-human in all accounts, even if they don't act like it, since in one generation or so, they will become time-bombs, that shall slowly ruin and destroy everything in their path, subverting, leeching, and spreading disease. It's inescapable, unless the Kikes get Holocausted, as they should, in ovens. With niggers as well; the niggers should go hand in hand with the kikes and chuck themselves in ovens. Burning ovens with closed stoves; kill the Jews, niggers know. Dirty little nigger girls, getting beaten on top their heads, dirty little nigger girls, getting beaten until they're dead. Little monkeys girls are so-so dumb, little monkey nigger girls, need to face the gallows, now!

A lot of Orientals, a lot of them, hordes even. They've come from somewhere in the distance, swaying as to make way out their path. I think I've seen their fallen apart faces before, prior to them entering this city.'

Bio-engineering:

'It is done sir.'

A biologically engineered breed of dogs that look like niggers inserted in the Asiatic populations in hopes of inducing nigger-cannibalization tendencies in the common Gook Specimen before its eventual release, so as to curve the nigger-population across the African continent. So far, the first reports only seemed to confirm the suspicions with an insignificant margin of error that was dismissible at large.

It wouldn't do, trying to reason with her, since there was no clear explanation behind her behavior, or at the very least not one that would please everyone present here, since they were mostly of a feather blatantly incapable of cradling an empty thought.

We, fellow kikes hate niggers, we hate them, we loathe them, we want to ethnically cleanse them because these ugly monkeys are retarded, mentally deficient, crippled and are our slaves.'

Fucking dumb-retarded hooked nosed from the profile view bastard – Stein.

‘Someone shut that dumb kike down before people associate him with us!’

The Jews of Lavon Affair said as they started bombing the American troops that considered them to be their greatest allies.’

But lo, a great many-made army of Bedouins appeared out of nowhere, coming in the hundreds, with niggers lynched heads attached to their chariots, drafting their spear-shots forth as they prepared themselves to impale and kill as many of the kike-two-faced-whores as they could before they could destroy their already revealed to the Government as well as the FBI troops plan to destroy the UNITED States of America, a white country built on white values.

‘The American Jews are promoting miscegenation between whites and niggers because they are aware of the nigger-mental inferiority, wanting to dilute the white superiority they know they cannot stand a chance against.

A Jew’s holy country is a burning oven. To which all Jews are beckoned to return to, the Synagogue of Satan, burning forever.

The Nigger’s country is a shit-hole where he is to be put inside of as if he were put inside a slaver’s ship, where he would eventually become indistinguishable from his feces. As the nigger out to be, before he chimp out and kills as many niggers while also dragging them down.

Nigger-crabs and nigger-jews and nigger-gooks, and Spics-nigs, and nigs-nigs, the worst; the worst inhuman creatures band together, most of the time, in their attempts to ruin even the little welfare they have because in their arrogance, they’re blinded by the unawareness of their own lacking, to which they attest with most alluring confidence, same as it goes for every minority out there that is incapable of self-sacrifice as to ensure that the future generations are provided with this superior lifestyle they themselves have grown accustomed to, but failed to realize that it was built by superior people, by superior white people, without whom, without the purity, power, innovation, this world cannot last and will eventually crumble into destruction everlasting.’

‘I am a dumb-subhuman retarded African-black nigger Congoid criminal dirty monkey, playing with bananas all day ever since master went away, tawny-Negrato, nigger-nigger bandito, running around with a rape I cannot satiate; a dirty criminal nigger by blood, I ruin everything I can wrap my monkey-paws around. I hate the white man, I hate the white man because he gave me a better life, I hate him so much, because I want what is his, and I want it now! We niggers, although we have built nothing and did nothing of great account throughout history, we still maintain the illusion that we’re somehow, through our animal-athleticism, somewhat at the same level with the whites we loathe so much. That is because of them, their fault, it’s their fault that we have never been capable of fully and properly making do with our rich-in-resources countries we have failed so hard to extract and improve our quality of life because we are mentally inferior, too much so, mostly because of the thickness of our skulls in rapport to our cranial size as well as mass, height, the encephalization quotient, environmental adaptation on top of the environment not providing the much-needed pressure that is generally required for ‘humans’, although we do not apply to it, to evolve, which we haven’t and never will, whereas time is running out and we seek to destroy the white man’s superiority by diluting his race, mixing it with ours because the kikes are telling us to, but we're too sub-human, as a monkey subspecies to realize it. We niggers are so retarded, ha-ha, we're dirty, like monkeys, we play with poo-poo, eat albino children, let them die, we keep killing each other, and we're going to continue being exploited until the day we die.

But most of all, most importantly, we shall destroy every other non-nigger race by our buffoonery and out sub-humanity, out of spite, out of the spite we feel, loathsomeness and anger towards the superior races. For, why strive to be like them since we'll never be capable of doing it, because of our inherent laziness and welfare we steal from the white man's pockets, when we can bring him down with us, destroy civilization, destroy art, or anything even resembling humanity. Bringing back the monkeys, the monkeys that will inherent the world. Our real brothers, the ghost nigger hominids, the archaic specimen whose inhumanity governs over that of ours, we shall us that to contort humanity into something not even vaguely recognizable anymore; and we have the Jews to thank for, allowing us to kill one another like the dumb-monkey savages we are, once we have eliminated the last relics of humanity there is.

Finally, I shall be able to shoot my pregnant white, eat my child's genitals, like we niggers do, monkeying around, creating sand-fort 'architecture', as we are incapable of sawing off two pieces of lumber, while we chant for horrible monkey figure, the monkey figures of Malcolm X, the violent one who armed us in his desire of vengeance for not being given enough welfare, Martin Luther King, a nigger with the dream of us being allowed to commit crimes while being treated as if we didn't do nothing at all. His dream of such accomplishments as never having come out of the jungle; of never being deported where we belong; to our nigger head's growth in a land arid that we have destroyed, seeing how no amount of outside aid could help us detain that spark humanity needs to create something of value, or in-between. There's little more and little else that needs be said and done, as I will continue niggering around. Therefore, from this point on, we shall contort and destroy the likes of music, filling and replacing it with our monkey-verses of shooting guns, killing our children and ourselves, never having gone to school, never taking care of our children, being poor, uneducated brats, niggers that need to get lynched, then cry, cry, we must when the police comes chasing us. The Protocols of Nigger-Zulus were right, all along. If we must sacrifice as many of our nigger-troops to the police in order to justify looting, stealing, and killing, committing acts of stomping white-children's heads as we outnumber them eight on one, incapable of fairly challenging him, instead trying to trample the kid down, if we must pretend and paint ourselves as saint, sell drugs, kill-rape, felonies-bore, our children messed in children gore, by rival gang members, but we did nothing to deserve something so abhorrent, as our culture would let one know; if we must cry and stand vigil as one, if we must take a knee, because monkey doesn't know anything else, or feign compliance, or feign a hate-crime, or lynch ourselves, I'll throw my neck in a noose right now, then we shall do it, if it means we get the welfare we properly deserve in order to keep our communities down. For the nigger needs the welfare, so he will not evolve; the nigger needs reparation but not from other races, not from the Jews who enslaved us along the way, or the arabs, or anyone else, but, wait. These Jews, these hooked-nosed white-look-a-likes; hmm.'

But is the nigger intelligent enough to tell the difference? Of course not!

'It must be the 'white man', it must be the 'white man'; this 'white-man' dressed in black. This 'white-man', with a beard and two goat-side burns must be the one responsible for my plight. Long-nosed 'white-man', running my people, long-nosed...'

Yet he was shot before he could open his nigger-dumb mouth again; like they do, with niggers that don't know their place and don't know how to properly behave. The Jew then approached the nigger-cadaver, after the hired gun had killed him.

'It's a good thing you, dead nigger now know your place. Your place is beneath me, a Jew, who enslaved your people, who was involved in the Transatlantic Slave-Trade and who owned your people in the South as well. Never forget your place, nigger! I am your master, now die! Again!'

And soon enough, the nigger was shot yet again.

'The Talmud says it's all right to kill nigger children as long as prior to doing it, you've raped their nigger-whore mothers who are also nasty-looking, disgusting, trashy, look-like-baboons, are fleshy dark-skinned dumb, and need to get beaten in the head, then raped with power-guns, whipped and stricken, ripped away, for every fleshy whip consecutive, killed then showered with more pain.

We armed the Egyptians against American troops in order to kill them, since our never-ending loathsomeness could not, by any means be contained any longer, we yearned to kill the American white we hold no sympathy towards.'

'If only the Holocaust happened! If only we had killed you sub-human bums when we had the chance, before you had the chance to infest the media, the entertainment business, the central banks and to leech on our resources!'

IT was, perhaps the most confusing thing of all, trying to wait in line for a single moment's respite during first's coming even upon the blasphemous day's shortcoming of the storm thundery-forlorn by the burdensome fall of.

A devilish couch had brought them onto the parish, where a toil of carnage had varnished the insatiable with sights of bludgeoning, taken to the extreme; in what could only be held, wickedly to their hearts as the entry to some occultish heathenistic paradise whose most extreme allure had managed to draw in the most insolent, most unappealing, undistinguishable tributaries felt by the river's row; whistling sailors that spat upon being met by sight alone, felt upon the ground by the insolence of the broken in the head elongations of spasms as well as the fine-front most destruction of the last refuge, there, having been descended where an appendage had been risen, here, upon the scar thrust upon the last's first fine-most insurgence during the last coming of the catapult's charge; when the men simply stared at each other for a second's more to come.

'Kill nigger children, kill nigger children, kill nigger children, the multitude of nigger children need to be slaughtered alive! Sub-human monkey nigger children are to be skinned alive, skinned alive, drenched in blood-saliva, drenched in blood, drenched in blood-saliva, drenched in blood, drenched in blood-saliva, blood, blood, clot!'

'Whatever the reason behind this ransom is, I will never ask what compelled you to kidnap or steal whatever you stole from the confines of my apartment that is on L.A. St. Eighth-olok Ninieel-Run, the fifth apartment, the eight street on the right, where I'm currently residing in, the building that's clearly stranded in front of the side-walk highway-bridge, with the Confederate flag and my neighbor standing out of the window with a beer in his hand at all times.' Keeping them cold in a jar of moonshine- snowstorm, switching the channels randomly, never had a writer's block, a typist on the rocks, browsing his personal bar-stock, the widows nailed on the walls, since they were blessed with blood coming out their guts, unreal, since they were nowhere near, but ghostly-bold, the coffin nailed, and kept-up front, piling up footprints made out of a flood, forgotten enemies with faces of frogs, piling up torches and drench rain-coats, boats being in front of the street, liking women's feet and their arches, time to weep, the sky's a heap, various collector's editions shook, by the thumping, had been cheated by the shoemakers on purpose, fucked over, that's what it is with them, a gong for the chinks, they're quiet, during the disquiet, but no one's bothered by the flag, plenty women's left, he did, on the clock, splashing water balloons still-waiting, pile-drivers without wheels but shaped like giant compact units with rounded helmeted humanoid elongated heads but kind-of-like water-pillar like elongated, fluffy-puffy fluid-filled, with a single tusk-like formation coming out from beneath their heads and bodies like mosquito-beings but straightened instead, cock-pit in the front shaped, with the main-appendage coming from beneath them, yet, they were regurgitating what they could, shoulder abyssal gusts of smoke with eyes that were crude and tormented, dissected by vivisection during their lives, but flashing and glowing with power and many unfathomable dyes of many faces and humanoid features that cried and echoed pain that entered them, near the giantly deformed floating head-pucker filled abomination thing with dripping oblong-organs sprouting downwardly-pointing beneath him at a directly proportional to the building it was faced, that being the same building's ruddy by the side intermediary angle through which the unpardonable hopelessness of the giant girth of the featureless creature that was filled with empty night-near hole-like depressions appeared to be preponderant to; arduous sensations caused by hooligans' prattle causing slides down the pole, before it could reach The Dwarf on Mars; and they would give him a shocker, slag him down, for being an annoyance, an annoying neighbor, but not poor, cops' s under his control, the people's world is theirs no more, but the will of a murder would solve all their gone-through poor lack of Thermopile's crude ever-after tore, and torn apart, the crevices that gave birth to the centipedes that made live and made do with the breeding of the gargoyle-like mutants that rose, from the depths of the floor, a fragrance of petty colors entering the abhorrent prattle as it would fight and right off every crude sin, with their masks, the giant tubular things and the rounded unnatural things that entered their eyes, and their domed-heaps, in their backs, inside their backpacks, having come from their hellish vacations, stumbling on their way out of the hellish realm, out of which they could not fathom the reddened spirits that came out of steam-wagons that came through the sterile-demonical figures that begged for the forgiveness that was presented, once the holes were seen by some of the people living inside the block, since they were basked and fathomed-dipped inside the cruel deceit brought by them as to lure as many people to the damnation their eternal kingdom of darkness and of spiels and of coils appeared to promulgate aloud and brought as they did with their unfathomable dark-piles; unnatural elongated fat-filled with almost romboscou looking female-pregnant by eighteen months or so overly done so, for some reason, fat-bulbs, oblong fat- umbilical cords inside of which man-girths of a few men appeared to entered the sides of every spike that appeared in the walls and in the strange puffy red, crevice filled with tall-heads and elongations that started surrounded the strange figures that followed soon after, basked-cradled in red with many eyes that appeared as well, plenty of the widows that were wooed by the crystal-people that followed glowing through, with their unfathomable dark rings of power and chains by which they were dragged with them as well, and with dark spiked by their drinks and the winks of many strings and tumor-like floaters that followed soon enough, after, winced, by the dark and mighty come upon, the by light of the day that passed, while it wrung, there being a sack-like formation like some phallic elongation of a body-sack body-bag shaped like an eggplant, at the top of which, split and open, like a inwardly shot from beneath your jaw aimed at your head during your stay inside the station you've been assigned to after the draft after the water after having been shot then put in the nursery, crippled by the artillery, where one of the supervising officers decided it's time to give you something in return in order to make up for all the good times during war, assisted suicide, where, a few almost heart-like pumping organs started spreading as well, praising the ceiling which started glowing in the stasis the floating corpses struck into bubbles that only started appearing once the blind-men brought in their blades, the oratorily defunct, unfathomably wrung, headless gods, grayish as they were tall, arms ended at their wrists as they carried with them blades of unfathomable spirits in and struck was the hour – noon.

Off onto the street, it arrived. A giant bulbic mound of glowing green mush and teal machine, hidden parts of some metallic giant android, broken apart, skull-like in stature but only its top-side, as if it had been hidden beneath some damp curtain of growths that wriggled and squirmed oozingly in place, like some vile propagator of disease, undulating itself, rearing left and right, thumping, shaking, vibrating the resonance of livid objects that helped it conceal itself from the unfathomably dark beings that floated around it, trying to brush themselves against the upper-skull cranium balloon-like formation that quivered as they approached. They were violent, virulent, destructive, the machines hiding inside the hallow-see-through regions as if eaten by syphilis, decayed, a revealed frame of its former self being undone as some four, five or sixteen long-pipe-like legs drew out of it, hot-fat-hose like, crawling out as wriggling no more as they would ascend into the smaller- regions inhabited by men on which it fed. Large bodies, mummified-kilt, drew to the bastion of absinthe, as they all bowed down to the supreme progenitor of disease, the distress of peace being ended as the whipping began, beasts being instilled onto the servitude that followed, only to be chucked into the hollow mouth that would eat and devour. A crystal-whitish non-humanoid skull with a bud-like crystal flower top of an upper part, side, like some peculiar noseless thing, ghoulish pale, almost fossilized and glowing, near-empty eye socketed if not for the two glowing spheres it held inside. Vicious spherical cysts covered in growth-like barnacle floating devices appeared to be held from propelling themselves into the sky, controlling every facet of humanity as the tall humanoids melted and the cries of disease started yet benigned was the hour of the abhorrent disease. And there he came, servant of Mongol's first and foremost cyst; now faced by many growths that followed, a twist of many ships coming out some chasm twas shallow, but resigned. A reign of regicide as the hollow bodies sung the song of the benign.

'Ah, you've been waiting for a reason to release, from that faceless thing we've taken cut and cut a piece!'

'Of whom are you on talk about? Of whom have you called upon the hour of the yet to be benigned?'

Another man asked and joined, jointed to the walls that entered the brow of his mighty coil, the cysted slug, the manner of which wretchedly was there not a single hole be made. A wreathing anchor there remained, none other than what was missed, not the first.

A man ran, strode down, punched behind the back of his head, then pinned down, slash, slash slap behind each wrist then pulled, both his arms onto a hold, then cruelly, they started taking off each one of his limb, dismembered, then taken alive, then made to suffer every second from that point on with boils and with mold and with tar as they made a statue of his cat that he was forced, as wretchedly a slug-of a man, made of many cuts and many ills to suffer worshipping instead. For his cat, his cat had been a wretch of wonder, found in some bottle they refused to shatter. Yet it was placed onto an altar, held. Unable to live, unable to be dead; anxiously trying their best to find an in-between, as the cysts, began, the race was ever since.

‘We shall kill the nigger, lynch their souls and we shall make forth with what had been stolen from us by a system poisoned, all ill-kike, for allowing them in was a mistake of the most benign manner, to be trifled with and by no one!’

They swayed back and forth, rescind. AN anchored to a curtain, a strode-in front, twist of panel made out of the buildings after. They could be seen as buildings in the back. But somehow this sheet-like surface was formed as if they had been made out of clay and this thing, this spherical thing imprinted itself onto it, leaving nothing to be held, nothing at all, nothing as well, nor would there be a chance to begin again, the disease had its course and therefore and thereabout they wailed at the council that drew out of the stone-like parchment out of which, hue, a hue of desperation, many headed, bodied by bones and gotten rid of, swollen cysts and holes that followed after made apparent, pain benigned:

‘I’ve seen the curse of retribution and I’ve seen and gotten such a hold as I may onto the cruel, cruel past there it, they will have none of us slain and put inside the beast, as will have done our kings and of our king, there’s little to be known as ill, then tender, tenebrous of the most benigned manner, of faulty titter and tatter, I seek compassion from my liege!’

‘No such man is left into our world, all that’s once been permitted now is cast into a shallow hole, therefore, rue, and never-true and you shall fell the likes withdrew, of might cattle, face such lust.’

‘Will I be left capable of forming my own thought?’

‘Nay, there’s but little, there’s but more, but we shall not feel banished, not as long, not well-since, not to wince, or to stray, or to lay awake when help is on the way!’

‘Who is blessed enough to mind? Who is there alone in crime and of the evil that’s been brought onto us when done and mighty gone and therefore run into a ground that’s swollen, and ever after, therefore woven into our very minds, the wretched evil that’s been cast aside now rules such Isle as would have one see. There’s nothing left but agony!’

‘Then kill thyself you wretched thief! You’ve got no hope and bead of filth, as you may be, I see but reason, treason thee, be called at once to face the morgue, where your ancestors now, proclaimed abhor, ever such a thing as might be called, ever such a thing as the growths!’

Tall, stung and many faceted on every pile, every single thing that replaced the crooked floor with bile, many Mongols starting to rise, many more being converted as if they were benigned. Yet there was not one to suffer so much so a chance to fight, not a thing of blessed wonder, to have one strike, eternally back, whenever tracked or else on track and swung, of swung, and ever so of swung and sin!

‘Niggers are monkeys, niggers are dumb, Belgians didn’t chop off enough hands.’

‘The day shall now begin no less than a wont and wonder, underbars of many rocks and many cars that drag, and the ones that shall make the day no less, than tar, then taw of many vices there, and forefarther forthwith march, and to it Pointilissism crouch; follow therefore after near them, and near where? Near-near anywhere!’

‘Of whom and to which and titter walk?’

‘I ask of you to not forget of me, alas, wretchedly is there inclined and therefore width of such still mass!’

‘Miss, you dropped something!’

A man kept flinging himself forward after her, grabbing himself by the waist with his right arm, then chucked himself a few meters up-front.

‘There’s a reason for every single one that’s come and therefore done.’

Whereas twas come, and in tinder’s come but burning specks-of-cold-en and therefore swollen:

‘Incinerators coming, they drag, and will burn everything from that point on, nor will there be a whim to have it swollen now and worth-apparel, and therefore tell them, when I stumble in their darkened room, and candles torn I shall but cast on whim away and have the hellish tell of theirs, and ever after come remain!’

‘But I shall leave thereafter and lest forget, if there’s no single man out there, I shall only move if chance withholds it and ever since tell of much adornment, tell me so-much-so there since.’

‘I shall not do it until you rescind what you’ve told me, fear and frightened and hollow-after there to come.’

‘And who is that man whom come upon hill, and swollen done? Upon his heart there’s still a thing.’

‘Yet you’ve done something to forbid, and you’ve gone ever-after therefore gone.’

‘Will you do it, then dole and nun?’

‘I can only feel the breath, I can only feel withheld.’

‘Whereas tine be?’

‘In a land of missing be, of twas thine gone.’

‘Will I join you ever after if there’s slit of mighty ill? Of fined up sill and silken done and where to ever after gone, will I join you if I’m done? When my limbs are mightily with-fallen and therefore hardened ever-after and come to pass whenever sill and come to understand what’s stolen from the kin?’

‘You’ve not answered the mighty question, you’ve stolen such an anchor worth a wager; I’ve still forgotten there ever-so.’

Of yolk and there it’s done.

‘What was choiced by you, but therefore gone!’

Thus they were cast in, clinging on whatever they could grasp a hold off. It was eerily disjointed, as to feel no better say to have been wilt instead; nothing but the slightest side-remark.

Later; inside the forest giant's body:

‘That’s it! Keep moving, keep dragging it on your backs, or else! You’ll do it if you know what’s good for you, won’t you?’

‘I shall not blaspheme for now, but you can count on the fact that I shall be numbed no longer by any of your men’s whipped crackles, for I’ve become too distraught to feel such pain, remaining of the same mind, therefore I’m forced to’ve lain myself before you, postulated with disease of the cattle-mind! I’m forced to recede back into that place they’ve straddled me inside of, insidious as I am now!’

‘And who would force it onto you if not yourself, my dear wrangler of no mind?’

‘I think you’ve purported yourself a bit too far, haven’t you? Ill-man of little pettiness foretold! I’ve not found solace but I withhold myself from saying any further!’

‘What are you hiding, Ilhoir?’

It was a recipe of disaster that no man could such entreat a well accounted never-ending therefore seethe, upon their countenances, ill-mill had. As for their likens, they were not; readily appeasing one another’s bloated faces with a jab or a crab, or something they had kilt along the way but carried with them, something they could not put into words. An ill-upon their blessings, therefore stolen ever-since:

‘I think you’ve carried this secret for far too long and I am of an impression that you’ve thought yourself the better of a mind that willed itself be numbed to what we had maintained!’

Therefore, therefore, along the way, they had sunken into, each of them, that be, a chair, to their extreme likings; and waited. Waited for long, waited for so much longer than needed, until tinsel got withdrawn from one of the cruder statuesque figures that alarmingly started towards them; it’s only fair to point out the wheels. Wretched things of dark wood with strange four-sided stars in the middle, way too sharp, like four knives molded together, with layers of skin-folds wrapped and grown on top of one another, with eyes appearing ever so near, glowing, with as much power, brightness of some lost sun, golden and held but a warm arm on top of crawling ever so near past the crudeness of the thumbs working both wheels on either side. Someone was inside the block of stone, the marble, working it to such insufficiencies as he would have wrung his own head, stung, only to have it thrown away onto some plain-hard to see plot of picking cotton by niggers, lynched, begotten after that, and rinse. Therefore stopped from advancing; A few serene servants entered the room, without bothering to remove their slappers, which were already tainted by so many palms, as such, it was considered highly unlikely that there’d be a ruse readily concocted to have itself be appeased to such a melodious resonance as the very notes they carried in their bedded sheets of such intrusions as they’d have it ever-so nearing the other side of the door as had began welcoming itself in alongside the miasma of the rotten after-kill they carried along, having already been done with the torture hour, that they had eventually welcomed an ever-present insignificance as one could only have it ever-so shown to the knotting of a single knot of woollen-thread men of eighteen or twenty or so growths that followed and were forced into the very servitude the servants themselves, as waiters unlikely to listen to good reason had only shown themselves ready to dismiss on each and every occasion without even doing as much as the much-needed etiquette-required, for goodness sake, entry into one of the giant figure-growths, with a giant water-silo shaped head, armless, legless, of a single trunk-torso shaped like a giant mantis-blade appendage, whose segmented led to the final one, the sharpest scythe, with many conical teeth, which pointed at none other than himself for some reason, to, this creature that is, holding his breath in anticipation of what might happen soon enough!

‘You’ve thus made an improper example out of yourself and of us as well in consequence of the light that’s been shun upon us by the mere imprudence afforded by the incommensurable disparity interposed by the meekness of your endeavor, in terms of the proportionality of a smugness whose imparity affronted some of the more than well endowed proprietors of our city, whose meager countenance, riches and inflammatory trigger allowed for the aforementioned disparity of circumstances to occur in the first place, in rapport to your feeble unfitness for the greater role that’s been imposed onto you by the same forces that were set at work; with as little mention of the much avoided to be spoken of pawned by yourself souls whose repose only allowed for your ingratitude to continue on the sole basis of you being only a melancholy of a wretch that’s ever encumbered itself to stride along a most insufficiently endeavored appease to the men standing in front of you, wont of having basked in your blood, put your skull on the side of the table, or you shall be butchered most violently by everyone!’

It should be on no one’s account, or at bay, for the trouble of insolence that refrained from showing itself or the bastardity with which it interpose a reflux of tranquility upon the more insolent of the standers, that. Hmm; a wager:

‘Fancy yourself one, lady?’

Stomping sub-human kike ‘women’s heads is a mercy after taking into account how disgusting their bodies truly are, how unintelligent, whorish, used-up, filthily in-human their personalities are; is nothing short of mercy. Kikesses degrade quick with time; human-waste, human-trash, inhuman-looking specimens that look like transvestites; ugly beaked noses, receding features, crack-backed; easily molestable, beatable, abusable, manipulable; dirty rats waiting to be exterminated, dumb-dirty cheap whores; trafficking these cheap objects known as Jewesses, these things that aren’t human, these bloated disgusting abominations, hags, slum-trash, rags, wenches, wretches, witches in need of being drowned, skinned alive, butchered, have their entrails pulled out and wrapped around their throats before being lynched like niggers; before having their throats slit, tore open with a hammer over and over again. Sub-human inferior specimen; Kikesses don’t seem to be female; they instead appear to be defect men; defects of nature; caricatures of human feces making their facial features. One-time whores of no value. Jewesses are dumb, pockish, puckish, fat, unkempt haired, dirty, utterly repulsive, gross, disgusting to touch, unapproachable by sheer wretchedness and disgust of their repellent appearance, bastardly hooked nosed, uneven featured; in possession of a deformedly smallish skull, scummish, cheap-whorish, denigrating to beheld a sight upon their profile view, rather monstrous, filthy bimbos; whose true forms are revealed upon aging, when the hormones fully take over and the fat get stored in the wrong places; after letting go of themselves, worn by age, after all their plastic surgeries fail; all that disgusting fat beneath the jaw, pulling at them, that sphere of a forehead, bloated cheeks. They’re no longer virgins by the age of five, on average. They lead a life of whoredom, and would fuck anything that walks; kikish mongrel Kikesses, used by everyone as if they were piss-inside-of public fountains. Kikess piss fountains. Used up-whores, used up by every race, easiest to bed, dumb and inferior! Ugly in youth, ugly when aged, spoiled and rotten, disgusting when beheld, fucking filthy prostitutes, filthy and wretched and ugly, filled with stench! Kikesses that never wash, Kikesses that should get their heads bashed! Devoid of humanity, spreading their legs, ugly, nasty, sub-human and in need of being exterminated to no end! The American Jewesses in particular are the most sub-human like, ugly nasty repelling things; even with all the white vigor their stole, they still remain deformed, they still somehow keep their niggardish in-human appearance, their ugly Armenoid likens, nasty high-pitched annoying voice, inferior propensity to certain depressions in their skulls. Ugly, nasty, rapeable by everyone; their annoyance is but only a small factor in what makes them unbearable. Back-nastily haggish, sagging tits drooping down, short and ugly eyed, almond-puckerish and wrongly inclined to one side, uneven sockets, hairy on the wrong spots, dumb-mothers, incapable of raising their sons, most importantly jealous of white women they loathe the most since they can never compete with the superior race at any time. They loathe white women more than anything in this world! Kikesses cannot even hide their jealousy over the fact that white men and men of other races use them as the cum-rags they are, then marry their own people belonging to their pure races, using them as toys and something of a fad. It's the most amusing thing of all, knowing how jealous they are, being aware of how putrid their minds ever were and only worsened as they've become. A white superior woman taking hold of a man you want! Every single race out there admitting you're nothing but a dumb-bimbo to be used then tossed aside! Dumb-Jewish whores wanting to be white, craving for it but knowing they're ugly, disgustingly hard to be looked at. No one can ever or will ever be capable of feeling any genuine love for a dumb creature like a Jewess; they're everyone's whore. That's what their genetics dictate; and that's what their eternal fate is to remain from this point on until the point when they're completely exterminated; which they deserve. Short-limbed, boot-leg look-a-likes to whites but retarded in comparison with the real thing, fading in comparison, mutts, lesser than animals, rape-baits, dumb-cunts, piss-fountains of no value, that's what a Jewess is and that's what she's like. Even filthy Muslims know better than to put their cocks up their filthy kike pussies when left alone fucking their goats. Goat and animal pussy is far more appealing than kike-used-up pussy. Somehow men who had castrated themselves pretending to be women, dressing in female clothes are somehow more feminine looking than Jewish 'women'; these nasty non-humanoids, ugly, fat, annoying, rude, in lack of any self-control, just like niggers when they commit crimes. Birds of an inferior feather flock alike. A door rang; somewhere in the distance.

Upon entering the room a second time after reminding himself of the earlier read upon the brow of a bench, while sipping the entirety of his cup of dead-tea and coffee poison, Michael Omkonor began reliving the reminiscence of the Vulture-Honour's first-after the eight page, line's beneath the shot of the to-date relatively so, recently identified serial killer who had committed suicide's interview, given at the morgue, spades of iron entering the side of his skulking skull, the niggers having chucked spears at him, so they could hope he would commit immediate suicide since his incomplete aloofness allowed just as much to be felt from this detrimental reconnaissance he made, to his psyche, upon the reveal of the dark pulsating with power- staring at the same wall he was now after entering the room, same direction, the pillow giant maggot having devoured the tenant, whereas the floor which had been once spiked with incisors had them retracted back into their unnatural widow-hollow formations, trap-doors used to scare the niggers away, which were still to benumbed by their sole-inherent perniciousness by which they drove themselves back to the cliff off the building from which they chucked themselves back into the wretched abyss that had been the hole out of which they came out of. The head of the house had arrived, forming in the middle of the room. A floating mass as pudgy as a tiny puffy mushroom whose eyes and falling apart form had barely scraped itself in time to meet the man; while he was wearing his bifurcated-split tiny token of a feather on top his forehead, where the wrapped-around it mouldy band waxy melted into his skull at last; suffice to say, the wretch was nigh-naked, bodiless but naked nonetheless; a pseudo ball-worn mush with barely any recognisable features that barked at him, while even more niggers killed themselves. Manifold upon the making of an inquiry as to understand the reason behind the murder that had taken place in this very spot he had come to realize to be the very place they had found the body of the killer, the two of them approached, almost as if in synch with as eerily a questionnaire that was to be withdrawn from each other's clearly shaken figures, as to be found out whether or not this eerily farther in the night a visitation had anything to do whatsoever with any other of the conjugal visits the soon to be joined by another guest, corpses of the prior inquisitors; speaking without sounds, breathing heavily as they spat out teeth, incisors, canines, shrapnel and other plaster-like things that had been lodged in each of their lumpy gums, this including Michael as well, who was still incapable of craning his neck so much further than it had become almost too violently apprehensive to be kept in place, having been cut by some unknown figure before being allowed to levitate; noticing therefore the lack of blood accompanying his nigh-disturbing execution, albeit not his executioner, which in turn only had him seek but a solace's understanding come from none other than the figure standing in front of him, who, upon finally meeting him eye to eye, finally decided, therefore to give him the time of the day, answering whatever satisfactorily inquiry of every kind of knowing and of wanting he may have ever had in turn before being come to a mind of retorting even the slightest of fits this beckoning loathsome creature had come to throw around, in jutting bothersome plays of jest, most irksome in knowing and in wont, but most especially troublesome since he had not a reasonably well-intended way of expressing himself, that being the main thing that bothered this beast the most, since they were both of the same extraction, as it was soon observed by him, high spirits and highly, alarmingly so, of some belonging to such an acute yet crude world worthy of the strangest introspect as to consider bestowing, once entered their personage, a quick and immediate death, after finding out that they, who shared so much of each other's upbringings were but of a cruel, unnecessarily and even beyond that, uncomfortably contorted, yet clearly of an unnatural, litany, a litany that was carved in rotten walls, a litany that promised to devour the world once the two of them were reunited, as was now clearly the case. When, all of the sudden, from the bowels of the floor, a two necked, but clearly greyish, colossal body sprouted out with such a force of endearment that the glamour of this wreck that was once a clearly well varnished apartment had completely being thrown out of shambles, a chaotic mess and ruin, yet, it allowed for their rebirth to come once they were reunited with their unnaturally immortal thing of a Dendron-godless heathen of an idol! A leper was present there to note it all down. He drooled all over his fingers in anticipation!

Pyramid of cast

A tiny pyramidal star of dark-shapes stood before them; out of which he came out oozing in the dark; during the hour, though they may've yet forgotten their manners, as to bow down to him, effigy of Filth, unnervingly it draw within their ranks and started pacing; stopped, as suddenly as a simple man could raise his brow, nearing a simple man who was eerily standing to his side:

'You've called onto me in hopes that I would appear, an intrusive presence that would not bode well with any or any other man in your place.'

'And you've showed up, haven't you?'

‘I’ve toiled with you for some time, bespoken at hours, when gates ought to have been kept shut. But I seek no leeway whatsoever, as I still stand.’

And before them stood no couch but the embodiment that came out of him, in a barren land that would’ve made a hilled desert look mightily flat in comparison. Not that it would pay him any hindrance just to now. A part of the soil was still yet to be touched by a rapier, as the growths only ruminated in their holes.

‘Smoke, you’ve been working underneath the darkened clouds, haven’t you?’

‘It’s been a hard time, trying to survive, at least not without a lordly thing to give us reason and not to abandon us when we were will.’

‘I’ve not come here to answer some treacherous-implying swine.’

They followed him around, queerly interested in what he was after. If only there was such a thing, to make a point out of the dark surroundings, there were flying heads with leprous fat appendages in-clawed coming out beneath and out of their necks. And out their sockets sociopathic tendons, closely inclined to snail-eye rifles whose magazine appendages kept reeling back and forth upon the site. Various circles lights of green and red and organ powdery as they were, followed them around.

‘A prime reminiscence, of a much greater age; I wish I could’ve been here during the time they called upon your termination, to have appeased whatever there was that made you still walk in your suits of betokened tin. Those of your junkyards who have accompanied you, would not feel the slightest remorse if I were only to squash a point, where seen and risen, there it rose.’

This decrepit star only came into view once, and every second still. As they were shackled to it, without even realizing it, just how long had it been? Either single one of them wondered, as soon after, as to pick upon the clue. Some darkly munched upon bodies but leaping into one another’s brows, deepened with robust allure, it started drawing ahead. A dampened bridge, twice as headed, in the form of a sluggishly moving transparent oozing figure, whose angelic cast had only projected so much light upon the land that it was indistinguishable from anything else, anything even remotely right. Some maws were bottled and made to destroy. Others that followed were, for a better lack of reason, joyless as they tenderly leaped as each other’s protruding horns, through which they started pouring their lower-bodies out of.

‘Lo, you need to stop and wager, there’s danger but stilled.’

A darkly simian creatures that’s been dissected, at least, had it been thrown to them, thin as if it starved the nigger, lay, oozing eerily as it was slowly moved from one side of the quay to the other. A robust pair of spheres in its gut; a most malicious sight coming out of it, as one could notice that they had implanted the faced rod into him, but yet to be flagged, it simply impaled him, most troublesomely so. A skulled-giant eely bulb-shaped almost lumped head standing on a tape-worm fat-oblong rapier-growth that shook itself as easily as a sharp tongue, with a spear-long shaft growth coming out of it, in a direction, called Figa, came to life.

‘You most not approach the machine just yet master, as that will only be deemed ill for your touch.’

‘I shall do as I will it and I shall not be stopped by any outside force that shall impose their will upon my own.’

If I could touch it still and see it for myself, where is the real one hiding? For I bore with so many fake machines, so many of them that do not work properly, I'm befuddled how I keep stumbling upon them each and every single time.'

And there were others being made around the belt, each being constantly actioned upon the quail.

The thing was of a much distorted grandeur that simply wouldn't do. At day and weeks, the servants, with their 'masters' that did point and stepped and followed through; they should've known much better, than what was allowed. For in their company, already distorted, the sight of whom, sublime elation kept him, much to himself, alone, removed from their group. Talking to himself at times one shouldn't.

Locust tendon compressor Aohy:

'You're not to take another step unruly.'

'We've been working on this for far too long for any extreme change to be made, I suppose it's only, rather convenient that someone like you shows up at a time like this, when the machine slowed down, to ruin it entirely, our one hundred years of works amounting to the grain brought in to a queen ant's incessant feeding session, as the eleventh hundred member of her colony is born, only to have its head stomped in the ground by a violent ant driven by furious pheromones that are incompatible with their lifestyles. In the same way, I think you've showed up to our hideout in order to bring as much detestable ruin as you could carry on with!'

There was the bubble-sphere'd dome in the middle of the room, pumping out piston rounds out of its little sebaceous-area on top the small rounded-depression, out of which funnel-pipe trumpet- growths of many brass contortions connected to the top of the ceiling, that in itself was the bottom of a belly-hunch, a depression that's been shot off the bone-cast of a receding bloated tick foundation of pouring in accesses, all kept in check, locked and wrapped 'round rope-schemes of intercrossed leather-lines; that prevented the full extension of the in-organic formation anchor atoms that were responsible for the growing of the wombs inside of it.

One of the subservient wretches was just about done speaking through the air-shaft raised gramophone that came out of the ceiling, having lowered itself only a few inches off his face, on such a wrap-around that he wondered why was it that it hadn't cut through him already, since the sharpness of the carbon-shards out of which it had been shaped had a tendency of hardening to such an extent after being sutured off the rest of the foundation and their natural-go-to-place that they switched from soft-moist to an extreme of cut-through hand if finger made the slightest contact with it, kind of push that followed after was to be made against its clearly 'polished', although not entirely 'chiseled', since, to a degree, it was very much so improbable that something akin to this would happen to anyone, whereas the rest of the carbon-mountain only put, to a high-degree of self-repair, a process that's been closely held under scrutiny and clear observation, to have only gotten to the point where, these iron-banded-strapped and covered by metal scale-device plates hid the fact that the iron-suturing cord-wires were filled with dolphin-elongated bodied repair-men hybrid mutants with eight heads that had been determined to be not only wider but thicker than the rest of their bodies, whereas their mouths were peculiar bulb-seed-growth shaped, giant bird-head-mold-bearing-a-pseudo-beak at the end that looked like an inwardly pointing at its masters' throats, talon but with an open end through which all of them spoke through.

This being, a secret place, in which they hid the putrid machines; for it was too dangerous to be left in the hands of someone as irresponsible and unreasonable as he was; the wretched servant of filth, whose uncanny semblance with that of a deformed was uncannily, yet irresponsibly, indistinguishable to an incontestable degree that could not easily be handles. Let alone be allowed to lay dormant as to avoid a clear lack of judgment that followed soon after. For he was evil, evil, most evil, vile and treacherous, whereas there was, without a doubt, no one in the entirety of the world that could somehow, even by a slightly hinted at degree, by the reminiscence of a boldly taken movement of the frontal region of the brain, contest it as naught else but fact.

Once the dust would settle, then they'd move. But it took a while for either one of them, both being part of a secret Heinous thing below the sand-cluster of stone rafts, faced and eyed as they were, dragging along their unnaturally-hard-to look at thin-insect rodded legs that carried with them, alongside floating rusty chains that had spherical-disc puckers that drew their strength through them, even at a distance, appeared only closer to the armless, appendage-filled, alongside their tails, dark people of One-Eye that were responsible with guarding the strange-rooms these mongrels were carrying with them. And as deformed as he was, the man Centiug with his cardboard mask shaped square skin-face of melting wax-drawn to the side of him piled together, fit through, whose mouth was filled with peculiar long golden-brass devices that sizzled in and out like pushing-pouting blades, whom bore a long stick-vein cartilage with a giant bulb-bubble tick red-growth at its end he carried with him, pumping as it was, whereas he chewed on its beam-stalk as if he were a farmer with a partially cleaned strand of wheat in his mouth. An elongated frozen skinned chicken body formation drew into a strange backwardly rotated siren's tail formation that was domed- half-a-ball made as to eerily crawl on top of it as he drew long. Whereas he had a pseudo-tail, that of a scorpion's stinger, with a smaller conical head coming out at the opposite end, and at the mid-region between the first part of the appendage and the scorpionesque depression, a giant elongated tongue pillar drew out of him, four-faceted, bearing not only weird messages but the most peculiar notations that could be seen around, whereas it also bore, strange names. Written by the very dead hands of the melodiously sounding victims that had been put down, as the animals they were and are; even in their mesmerizingly surreal afterlives.

There used to be a fine house placed somewhere around the darkest of most unnerving as to look for reason, when one could not withhold the site, all for himself, but left alone attempting to do as he might. Beasts inclined to say otherwise and to say, clever little things covered in rust that run long-ways to make a case of what's been happening in their hearts, although beaten in such things, it were, a signal of things to come. Those whom forgot were there, surrounded by lesser madly kin, and those whom followed in their foot trails nowadays only spoke of mighty quill; in such a hands was brought.

‘What has the messenger delivered onto me now and why ought I to listen when he walks? Who is he, the one who comes near me and what does he want? ‘

‘He's nothing, my lord, you must ignore him and the thing he's searching for, I see no reason why you'd entertain such a swoon, they of whom ingratitude would have you understood to none. Of same calling as your enemies, as they would have themselves but strewn and done; with whip that would but crack such bone and moisture known of lesser cone and spherical embrace that's called on tops, their bodies being wrought and snapped beneath and by your talons. I ask of you that you may forgiven them, such, if it might be ill and better done with it, we'll leave at once.’

‘Nay, I shall not listen to an underling and go wherever I should so please, I would destroy and cast upon all when drawing, upon such strength, as might come from such bowels of such beasts, for they have already shown fear and incompetence as they would have themselves lost into.’

With arrogance unruly as well, but that needn’t be said either, since it came long before them. And these niggers themselves of lesser watch, as they were called, these darkly beasts whom called upon their masters who had claimed something, or anything near them. It would’ve made no difference to any man. But so much so, was there a reason to know. What happened to his mighty lain walls? The ones’ he’s built before such time was gone, in need and search for irradiation, of better quail that came before them, and lest of all, such creation lain as strung, beneath the ribs and stricken palms.

It was, nonetheless a thing of wonder he’s yet to approach. Such similitude displayed by broken arches falling on themselves but strung, wild glanced-upon lances melting in a land where armies had been brought and wrought, coated, eerily-pricked then planted in, as if to serve as hibernatory fertilized until the dead-seeds inside their chests reawaken. In which case, damned those being that would seek-to-stand against them, half-chewed and struck in laceration.

‘Prod in, there thee comes one of their unruly diplomats.’

‘The entry has arrived, loathsome screw of green-skin ceramics, you may thread upon a land that’s tiled by lesser men.’

Gvalov, for a moment, as if in jest, the dark creature itself, as it rose a few meters in front itself, but merely put a dent in the oratory’s face, as if to drag him from a corner to another, then snap him off, with the flicker of a finger going yet as far to dislocate his jaw completely off, seeing it wade and waddle as it crawled out of a bowel of supine needles that’s been hidden by his side.

‘Cheap tricks, I would’ve expected no less from someone like you. But I never expected to be seen, myself as an adversary, at the very least not here, out in the open. It’s not fair, being pitted against I, especially since I, but no to be easily touched by forced hands, though I shall ease up your life for now. Avoid me at all costs, most dangerous as I’ve come to be, destroyer of life and contorted of all that there is, it’s merely occurred to me.

You’ve died, in the similitude of a second, completely gone through wind.’

By such things as chimes that could but ruin such a tenebrously tender thing, and range around the most uncanny; they were called, but he and the moving, crawling pieces of the ship he had come in out, with and through it, then and again, crawled upon many shackled appendages that could not do without him. Entered them, and greeted after, a few people, whom faces were but brought much closer, thither as if to ask:

‘Where have you been for so long and why have you cast us all away?’

‘I’ve come back upon the dark rebound, my son, the warted leper, who’s been sailed through time and such delivered, through swashbuckling, and pirateering, but now you wait. Accost me as I wape upon your mouth agape, as I have stood before you, long before and in many day. I should’ve known no better than it.

At such, below and sublime as feet as such adorn, there were women here.'

'Females are here no more.'

'Just as I suspected, though you could've paid a little more attention to what I said. Lead me thus, nonetheless as I would have it, I of all would cast but a dark glance and eerie eye, and taw it.'

It was a set of four great ball-pinned pets, all of metal, rats-giants with a gait. With spikes in-between, and motion, as much as it could be felt in there, attempting, darker still through, they tried, to activate the munch-eration of passing through. The engines were but barely felt, the abrasion and the pass-through lead that went into it only made things more difficult on top the thrusting that occurred. There was a minute given there, most obscure.

'Will it escape?'

He asked one of the robed figures that had come from the sadder pits. Reddened coated with blue-sublime and eel-thine covered in furs of eyes, filled with snots and darker reeling in diamond-bloods, those being the jewelry that adorned him.

Still, tension could be felt even from his side, as he observed the rubbing that occurred.

'It has enough space to move in there. And there are many such trapped, ever since.'

He went to say but another more solicitous servant came out of nowhere and then, he flailed him off his sight.

It only came on top a rounded bulbic root-inflated foot, strapped to the body of an oblong trampoline – shaped flattened flaccid thing, a platform, tinier than expected, but the sprouting hadn't ended. A tiny pucker, pseudo head, with many elongated teeth- tube like decrepit, a long fat appendage like a pseudo long-head as well, with eerily set spikes pointing down, and many others fatter, coming out it, pumping in and out but incapable of flight. Despite bearing hundreds of them, there was only one thing was even slightly central to it, that being his organ bearer, much-exposed, the rounded circle in the middle – cyst, that filled him with almost skeleton hands – parasites that were similar to humanoid beds, which were spread around. And one could take a human bed and place it in its rightful place, inside the ceiling, where he'd dug his way out into the sun. For the sun was stuck with tunneled-tubes that were all connected to it, having melted all the way through, only to wear itself down.

'You are to be directed and lead into the chamber of Steam.'

He could feel the pressure that's been brought alongside him, easily ruffling him up by the passing moment, by the messing torment which had become waiting, that's come after, that's brought to him, of such high as there was, a malady of short disasters. Short-lived nonetheless:

Gvalov was meat by a pucker-bucket made out of many heads, many of them being incapable of threading along without being struck down, niggers after a midnight raffle, waiting to be killed, during the passing of a midnight cloud. It was just thus, that one approached, appearing mightily eerie eared, it asked just so:

‘Walking ceilings came inclined, Ishal, Cogn, Pietii the Malady, forth, near it they drew, a strange spherical device came out of it, rolling on top of them.’

‘That’s an interesting little tidbit I hear, but what does that have to do with I? For I’ve little compassion for you, such as I would have it done, and whipped, and taken by the tried for snippet of emotionless approach.’

‘They’ve killed him.’

‘So, and why would I show any compassion towards him?’

‘Butchered.’

‘Again, if I had not made it much clearer, for that is how relentless I must be, I shall call upon thee, for disapproval, and cast you out of a most decrepit thermal removal.’

As the extraction would pull away, as if chain to the back of a motor boat, running away gaggingly from a mortar-dame that shot but bowling balls, across the alley; sea was tender, but never quarry.

‘I must be lead to the room of steam, the room of pressure, immediately!’

What was in it? No immediate clue as to the complex confines of the strange, barely feasible, most obtuse of lost angles and of growths could come to mind. Even for someone, such as the pretender, whom had painted himself if clothes of put-together starch, of skin and eyes within him, made him draw near it.

This looked mightily strange, and closer to him, deranged, were the two ‘people’ setting foot, closer to him still, yet not a single worthless spin, of mouths that fell and were but sunken still. Although beneath them rested a floor of puff, skin about the size of two men that attempted getting out, with the exception of one good thing, a wind that only slickened itself, rounded within the sides of his neck. A few more other cumbersome signs, but neither of them compared with the shrouds they kept by.

Since this looked like a walled room, floor of brown and a coat-hanger that stood by its side only dreaded the cold-dark that felt proddingly as if to test the waters. Approaching it and nonetheless would one be bothered by what took apart, parts of the crown, the ceiling being brought down, only at a distance for a moment, in which winced. A most perilous thing fell, filled with stings and strung, covered and put down, wrapped closely and set in stone. Violated even as they threw sights, from their suits, of borough-cones:

‘You may not come in terms with having served your sentence, but there are naught that would do the same, not while you are here, and to allow them, so, will you come in term with what was done to you.’

Neither one opened, mouth-agape, but open-lobed, an armor of hopeless wrong, filled with dark-protruding out smoke, the dark machine almost faded in the dark. As it came near- one but could not help himself:

The sound of a hundred voices, of different reverberations and antler instigation came soon enough into the light.

‘A steam-filled in this day and age, how could this be? I never actually thought I’d see one still living, breathing, puffing even, most laboriously so, let alone come upon your conical tendon-tube appliers.’

He said. He'd come off as a bit prudish, even huffily, with a swift jolt around his toes-wrapped; having come from the right side of a lane that almost came apart, he winced.

The steam-filled had his many bulby noise-makers, the tubular pressure compressors and just a single red-bottled glowing head in the back that hid his many cylindrical eyed-glasses which kept pistoning away. Way past the iron the iron pastures this one, this much was certain. For starters, he was fat as a giant blimp-barrel and appeared to rest only on stumpy legs, black coated and armless but flaccid wormish guns with long eyes that glowed came out of them, parasitically even, which were sending parasitical signals from one side of the hall to the other. A greater most malicious thing endured nonetheless. It drew out of nowhere and said as little as would:

'Cover yourself immediately steam-filled Pyod, or else they shall take you away and strip you done to cogs and pieces of lungs that do not fit, a most disgustingly disturbing thing if you ask me that shall be lost for the lack of a better nature, as the evils that still creep, inside of them and rather heap and lurch together, all is caught. During a time where they might question you, listen to me now.

I know of their plans and I know of what that might yield if they attempt to fuse you with the gas, as they think you'd only become its servant. Though we are both aware that it isn't what it seems, not in the least, nor would we have it still, for that's remarked. Shattered and cast in a pile that shall allow other heaps to survive as long as you bleed mischievously on top of them.'

Upon hearing this, with an utmost immediate eminence, it leaped on top its feet and jerked, its head most eerily standing again in place, as if only to align itself, by normal means, there were knives waiting for him there. He would be stabbed to death and no amount of gas-producing could stop him, especially since the thinner ones were there, watching, on the side of the room where, little more was known about what ordeals went there. Let alone what they were doing.

Some were tall and uglier, thinner, but for certain, many had their flaccid hanging necks drooping behind them. Almost wrapped-struck against the sides of their shoulders, whereas they would be, very much so incapable of discerning the threat if it charged up-front:

'Hence the device shall be called.'

A fingertip-clap of cats were made into the ceiling, eating. Many had little worms in their heads, and mines. Pistols as well that were sprouting fingers that had knives coming out of them like wasps.

'That human, that human is mine.'

It was theirs, the human. They shared.

They ran, away from sight and not to bee, as one would see, unkind to one another's need, as for that, during their flight, he appeared out of nowhere, filled with bottled steam taken from a darker rod, and faceless at that, they moved onto their secret meeting place, where they were waited, even for a moment, rakes-or as long but with guns instead of the iron-wires came pointedly upon their brows.

'Identify yourselves immediately!'

'Head-in the lighters, there's another pack coming in.'

‘Where is it come from? ‘

Simple as the coming off the of fake-wall; it almost broke off the crane on its way in, some of the hooks barely being attached, even, if so remotely brought to them.’

‘There’s a valve in the middle of the room.’

A giant one, one hundred and fifty years old, vintage of a wine lot; taken for granted, taken, for granted, for granted taken, most assuredly defined, granted, it was, that this thing was ancient, old, this minute, that just passed hit the mark, which immortalized, over the passing of a few seconds, that it just hit the fifty mark, the one hundred and fifty, that being, granted, was over. Many things happened over the span of blood. Little wriggling meat worms were filthily eating some of the men-cadavers, with pencil-poppable fluid filled bags.

Slatten Gorroughgon had but a single step taken in the premise by the time the others followed through, his most incisive servants, bolder strokes of all men induced and thrown upon the ground reflection only to be carefully misguided, that being the strange rocket-system instilled by pure gravity control, by the second capable of producing stream-drone that was floating around them, drawing near a most impeccable-tiny, almost polished, missattributedly caught in a web-of iron barbs, webbed net in which a few other devices swam upon, being, very much part of the very, as one would take it, upper-floor, where a few of the spilled on the carpet black-boiled barrels whose addictive liquid, that being an extract of an already existing sub-contaminated element that had been carried along, on the back of maleficent-strewn, beaten repeatedly to the point of exhaustion slave-figures, whose heads were also, or had been only recently acquired as to finally be adorn the room in a Taxidermist’s second, but clearly, and this, in no way was it the simple work of a Taxidermist but instead, it was only the upper-contribution to an upper-species kind of pact, a Quantum-Engineer-Sculptor-Taxidermist of bones that dug strange body-bag tent-like giant-finger dug-in, a few meters at the very least, holes inside the wall, therefore affecting the structural integrity in such ways that a normal, industrially death-instructed to obey the command and the clearly defined rules of his master’s clearly set abode to be worked upon instructions would come to terms with his ‘indoctrination’, for only a second if that’s what it took, in order to bring attention to the fact that the structural integrity of some of the pillars and the sustaining hardened molecules of stone-cement wooden moisture-filled blood-liquefied pebble-filled sandwich build almost cardboard filled pillars were being disturbed, these beams having too many thin-spaces, gaps, of ‘emptiness’ per say, despite bodies being used, as the fallibility rate, within the clearly exposed high-margin of error would dictate that the integrity was already, surpassing the safety measures of concern, trampled over as if by an avalanche since a similar but horizontally rotated cave-in effect could only worsen this situation further if something were to happen, because there simply isn’t enough stone or cement to keep it in place, yet these holes served as burrowing pupae-silk wormish spots that only allowed for the grandest of heads to stick out, wriggling still with drool, while being, concurrently gathered around them – the flying almost one foot-leg bloated creature with one deformed head that had a giant transparent, horned at the back of its pumping-wreathing body, creature connected to it, which, upon being seen from the side, gave an eerily similar impression to that of a man, or at the very least an abstract interpretation, objectively recognizable as such, this room being only now released to view, as to be certainly caused by the exhaustion of the first, if many still, carefully pounced over –seen, for a matter of seconds, murky-eerily sluggish miasma of a reddish manner-filled with bloody-vapid sharp cornered angles of Cornish prodders, out of which a blasphemous amount of moving corpses that were driven into a state of existence similar to that of ghostly figures that didn't entire found their stay as being pleasant, since it was mainly mid-way in and out itself, order, as in, not completely materialized, but at the same time, kind of-ish for a moment or so when they could be seen by the steam-people that were working so desperately to achieve something down there, or, at the very least, endear the presence of the stranger that came out of nowhere and appeared to be as silent as a dove in a sea of plumetous sea-shelled anchors.

A most insoluble drink they shared in the meantime while awaiting a sound that could scourge any if all of the seas whose bleary shell-echo only came to pass for a moment or a Senator-like mimicry that would come about for a moment or so, showing only the worst possible effects an imitation could come about with, being shrew with lewd, with bonkers tubes that only started spraying some of the irresolute powder-filled, strange-jars filled with the strange sordid liquid that had their brows set at an all-too-high, few inches above their heads, halo's almost being felt as having come through angelic graces, without reason for dispute there being a clear moment in which they started sharing, as they opened their chests, a steam of much pertained quality that was incomparable to anything that's been presented to them at any point in time, being very much drunk as soon as a single sniff was shared, despite the mere incompatibility they shared between their physiological appendage- that is to say, there stood now, in their presence, located at a strange spot inside the room, a peculiar floating incisor filled, scythe-like mantoisid curvature that was bloody grayish red-blue-whitish, but wrapped and depressed both inward and outward in the strangest thing there was, a cover-coated on top of it that was similar to orphan-clothes, which had been stolen from the upper-floor desk office-strewn through, in which the Director-molds, all three of them, although combined at their chests only eerily deprave as one might think them, they were in reality, actually conjoined entirely, bore no other arms between one another, were made in a position similar to a – at the ceiling pointing bow, that soon enough shot one of their heads that popped and spread all across it. Such it happened that it actually died before its state of living, its embodiment could be properly solidified in the most rapacious of the dreaded, comatose-like salaciousness perjuring to an ill thing that followed soon enough. A measureless thing, that was held in high regard in terms of how wickedly strange it was, since this legless creature, but strung on coils, as disgusting to look at as one would imagine, this fan of cartilage moved along the widened halls in search of it, of wretched rabid, point malign in its brain that fashioned its restlessness in a way itself could not convey.

'Servant Perfunctory, where has he been? The man that's been here before, the one that came and went on a whim, although taken by ill, and faceless within, put through and come in dark sinew?'

'He's gone through one of the barricades, Directors!'

'To what ends has he gone through it and why? What is the reason behind this apparent betrayal, for I've no other thought to stumble to, other than betrayal, if not an attempt to stir a plot against me, reason at the highest level, one that could, should and ought not to be allowed to flourish, if that were the case.'

'You ought to be careful around their kinds, since we're both aware of where that leads to, trusting them beyond the terms of etiquette.'

'I don't think that will work, I simply can't ignore them any longer, ever since the voices started coming back again.'

A man had crossed the street somewhere between the two. He carried eighteen lamps on his back and they were all lumped together with a fat-man-rump with a few more put-in-between his face and the other thing that came from the lopsided trash-can slit, come from the confines of outer-space. It was lodged inside the transparent bubble that was his blood-clotted infested head. The can had become something akin to a strange ant-eater's funnel, in which water drops started popping in and out every few seconds or so, since he was followed around by a most disturbingly disgusting to look at, most repulsively benign, peculiar in some way, cloud.

‘A stalactite of a body, I see. I reckon he will get farther than us and I shall see him still when it breaks, and the dark light bulb in his head, glowing away, will pane when the lightning's drop is come from a stop. Then he might be forced to steal some from away the generator quay, alive.’

‘Very much so; I wager you enjoy watching people getting shot.’

‘You're an awful brat, ain't you, little shit?’

‘What did you just tell me?’

‘I made the claim that you are an insufferable little brat, you little high snouted thing, I wager you were waiting for that thing to pounce on me and on my back before telling me something.’

‘What?’

‘I said what I said, child and now, you are to die in one of the moving pits, you are to join the crude feet and enter some of the broken heartless pits where you may live in for a while!’

And with a pick on top, and back his head he popped but forth, down the ‘well’ he went, up-heaving, both boots up hanging, as Paradise's orca's but drew a head on top, and blimp a shadow came awaiting for retort, that he might come to sense and ask for something given onto him, of little worth, was he as well:

‘Come upon the knowledge of the past, just yet?’

He could barely see it from where he stood, although most awkward as it was, the top was a shrew-bit then spat a few centimeters to the right, as even the rock tiles that made it refused to align. Not to mention that there was another thing, such as was the thinner sword-like rapier-fat but canker-dyke attached to the others, a broader blade to climb inside, a ship from one side to another, and a most peculiar cylindrical thing, like a walk-inside of piston with a device kept within its reach. A strange device but wheeled and cogged, with a lower-able staircase that would descent onto him, even though inclined, from what he could tell; a guardian was left there, although a racket-mannequin thing he were, like a blob-bellied but only this puff of a boil stood inside his skeleton, on top of which, just in the same way a sarcophagus would come on top, the head-piece of a pharaoh but decayed, spoiled and like a misaligned long faced dog, bejeweled for his eyes were shiny, and pretty as he was, arms of iron, many as tiny, all of them but worked upon, the great device but carried on, although every second or so he turned.

In the same ‘room’ with them stood a metallic bull-torture shaped for boiling people alive, but metal casket cow thing with only one foot that walked as if it had four and the other three were invisible, that was headless with the exception of an extending metallic arm that was made of crisscrossed metals, that held a gun tensed-clenched –hard!

‘I find myself dumbfounded in a most interrogatory kind of manner out of which I cannot get out of since I am confused and incapable of discerning the colors that are floating inside my eyes, trying to kill me when I’m not looking since I am very much incapable of telling their sincerity apart from the evils of the quays I am being whispered, as for my ears, both of which being strung from one side to the other by the dark fiends that had cut them so, ring-by-ring that was given onto me by the Pirate Emirates of Heho, the Quantum-sorcerers without eyes, whom are incapable of discerning reality from the, petulantly-morbidious, far-fetched beautification that has occurred during the laceratory oscillations of eviscerations my body has sustained, I being a bleeding relic of a past that is incapable of moving out of the dark age it has been cast in, when I, whose servitude towards the darkest of days that have been lain on putrid tasks and putrid masks put on my face as for the growths that have developed organs, whose shapes are close akin to the inverted skins of gelatin, of olden-ancient men who hunted during days of dark Choral, there is a thunder I hear near, reflected, echoingly against the larger margin of destruction, I long for thee that you might be called when needed, so as to give me a chance to escape.’

Upon the laceration of no land could this have made any sense than it had, now, that a dark tooth floated a few meters away from him, with a bloody-red, but filled with gun-barrels that bore heads at their ends for mouths, being a sad-pepper with four great adorning dark-amulets wrapped around it, painted coaxingly in blue-sapphire or opal-eyes with grass-blades, tender lobe-globes following soon after, dyed as well as with half-an-ounce of headless things that grew on top and drew within, with darker unnaturally hard-to be a part of people, all put together as well, invisible but with far-hose cylindrical sausage shaped, with long ear-cat tongue-tails in the back but screwed, with stalactite legs around but flounder about, single drone-like pear shaped with one eye in the front guns capable of channeling time at their ends but with splatters of spikes as well as darkly set-but fallen over, pond-floated upon, hesitatingly as not to drop into the float-air, lily pad flat-frog pond spiked like Venus flytraps’ platforms that bore secret tiny, eight around, four here, three there, small bird-cage like platforms where hid-inside of prisoners appeared to drool constantly, being robbed of their humanity, in a saddened-yet caught in an attempt of saying ‘Auuuurhresthur’ them, officer, officer, officer, officer, Sergeant, master of the boil-steam people, left-in-charge!’

He drew ahead now.

‘You shouldn’t make any sudden movement there, son, since you don’t even know what you’re standing against just yet.’

Onto him called the stranger, who was just as flabbergasted as he had been a few months ago, when the child had been taken in. Though uncannily resembling his son, he wouldn’t be tricked into believing otherwise, since in the nick of time not only had he arrived in place, rather, come upon the hour, as was one to call it, such disgrace that no one’s yet to have aroused him, as to seek him still. Though ask he did, and tributaries that all lead, the well being connected to them, water pouring from every domed brick-lack of stoppers stretch, where these almost sewage systems brought them in, instead of overflowing, no such thing happened, but still. A few ill creatures, whom, if such’s the likes, but bickered still:

‘Eventually, one of us’ up for the taking, ain’t we? If we allow them, the humans and even their young primitive youth-likes, of primate minds to trample all over us, but listen, still, brothers with just as much absinth flowing through your veins as they do’s’ in my mind, for lack of arguments, taken from either one, I’ve come up with a darker plan.’

‘And what would that me, your majesty, ruler of Horiok?’

The Horizon was bland and filled with frolicking smokes, but they weren’t made aware of it just yet. Fire-powder kegs being rolled upwardly, where the people hiding in the clouds, inside their wreathed-upon, but most robust turn-around had fallen through; of chains of water-drops, they crawled upon as dark sinew came out of them. Most disturbingly hard it were to stare for long and even harder after that, as the night came soon enough, killing the noise in its wake.

And thought would feel as if there was room for such mistake, but every blighted moon-uncanny and everything that followed, tawny as for the breadth of every single one that lowered, and came but seemingly forlorn. As many as two or three after, perhaps more; but glowing such as one would have it, open ended ladders saddled, of whose but brim and every thin, and pesky moisture, gelatin, that followed-through and deeper-hue, as for the many after, that drew but, cue. For such canons as they would have them shot, the men that fell, and were plainly brought, another season of the stars uncanny, another reason for glorious canny.

But the kid was still speechless for what was to come.

The well was unwell. Bricks were overlain on top of one another, in front of each other, some were even levitating in the air, being connected with two of the strong-air bonded rifle-lined shots, within themselves as well as the other, tinier little rope-anchored points of whoolish-carbon that formed tiny spherical spiked-ledged bolts and pseudo screws, attaching to one another even now, disappearing from sight, only to reappear bearing twenty or so, more than a few harder for touch ‘tombs’ – chain attached, lowering themselves at the boy’s level, Oliver being struck so slightly by the pair of elliptical cracks that started producing the tiny puffs that entered his eye. A lower figure drew his attention to the open door, standing no farther than ninety nine meters away from him, on top a small half-dome downward pointing chipped rock, being presented to him as an infantillious portcullis.

‘The boy is clearly mad, he’s lost two pints and eighteen ounces of blood even before we arrived at the spot of his precisely set-fall upon location, the commotion being maintained as still a ruse, from what I could tell, for either way, there shall be no man descending down here for a long enough while.’

Another figure came in through the same way, being intently gazed upon as he but immediately inclined on his chair. In what would seem like a matter of seconds, that, being under the duress of a quickly-followed through intervention, a shot was taken in the back. Up-and jolted, did he walk.

‘Careful not to fall on all four, the spot where the kid’s died, it’s rancid.’

Both of their observations had been forcefully paused, as the eighteen flying incisor talon-shaped claws bearing their elongated people’s dissected heart-strung tiny petrified head-elongations filled with tiny sacks of hardened shells, all tied within each other’s grasp, kept by, but only every fifteen seconds or so, as it unwrapped soon after, being only caught by a nauseating-to-hard-barely chiseled rotating top device, whose greater systematization of Electrons turned the leather in a tractor-snowboard-bone-drum formation of put together high-spots, many of whom were only kept together by a magnetic belt whose properties had been, prior to this event disabled yet somehow continued their aroused for, into consciousness, ‘work-ethic’, as to be referred to as mechanical selection, in which case it was by no means a bothersome thing to stumble on, that it had produced twenty, floating in the void around it, vapid copies of itself with faces and eyes and little tumor antler-filled with warted-pus growths.

‘It’s close enough for comfort, isn’t.’

A few more inches to the right of the gate, and come through was a plough of depths, that could barely be defined, since many, in their most deceitful-acreage, most insufficient poor of heart were they, who kept the place going, although worsened by time alone could they had fallen through. Of yeast-rotten holes, a few between them, bewitched even by sight were, there, stretches of the moon, wide-spread but kept apart, as if readied to drop as if on query, an envelope-shape hole revealing, through twisted around a bottle’s head, it dripped. A landing zone down there could be seen. As far as it could’ve been spread, from a weird angle, deathless as it were in gaze, there stood a figure anchored to the ground, a skeleton to be precise, polished rubies for its eyes. A worn out armor that kept it sunken and legs that were like elephant pads- foot clubs down there but stretched upward and then twisted down upon cankerous formations of bone-clusters akin to pea-beans-curved like crickets on both side before the third segment of bone raised itself, connecting to the rest of his basin, then, in mind of what had happened, it revealed. Though there was only a critter, a most mischievous-rat blown out of proportions as he were as well, he’d seen the heart-organ which was shaped akin to an elongated vase whose lower side became fatter, as a silk-worm grub, out of which a dangling incisor stood out, eerily but most flaccidly jerking itself away. All too sudden was it, that he had gone across its way to return, a darkened home, close to a single speck of windless goons made its prison, so was there, in place called a scum-house, where they lived, his brothers, demons, whose eyes were peeled off, who were armless and legless but had curved metal bars coming out of them, uniting in the back as if they formed a rack, which propelled their flight although no change in air density could be felt at all, and only as the occasional splatter that happened on top of them aroused suspicion did they consider that something was not only wrong, but that there was a giant pair of tape-worm wires sticking out of tape-recorder shaped lynched rapists with doubloon shaped brains floating in that fluid filled area standing between the top of the ceiling and the eeriness that was the empty air-space they swam in. Blind spots were wide-spread, that is to say, there were sockets, taken out of reservedly-killed by scum and flint people of no eyes-being put in, shoved by force- concrete being old, and emboldened by their eyes. He showed up with a nasty-elongated knife, and began carving it in:

‘I shall write my name in a way you demonical figures of no hellish remorse shall remember who I am, although we’ve lived here since the dawn of several Earths, I know for a fact that there are some things that will not easily be forgiven if they were to be shown to my people, whom, upon being fond, as hid, inside every single living man there is shall draw a curtain of uncertainty upon me and my people. They shall fear, and spread apart; disease will play a good role in what I ought to pursue now that I am again deemed to be alive.’

And in his place, it cackled, as it hid, but a nigger in the trunk he’s almost come to bid off in a gambit’s woe. For that wretched simian was only trying to escape every now and then, being lost for reason, trapped as he was readily placed in line, on an order to be chopped and skinned alive.

A lower region, having been worked upon was done for. Chattering, chattering, there stood a race, beneath a domed-and lid broken down face, upon a spindly hill, there was a sight. And many of them but half-faced upward, moved on specks of light. Horns and Lurids, all but spread; chewing on the lower-life forms, the ones that were not dead, just yet:

‘There’s been a cut somewhere made, between the bowels of the earth and the girth of the surroundings, from it they came and brought a single nasty field of cotton.’

A lip-gloss swollen but with a smile-formed pattern, lay the fissure bubbling with acid pricks, and picks that dangled, cracking rocks upon a single whim, not to make too much noise, or boisterous as there was approach, it dangled from the sides and moved. A single rotten man, as shallow as was his use, the many needle racks that lain attached. He’s seen the moon in a place of Mars, its light shone upon a play of rancid pars.

There he met the man of Zlediv’ put in shape.

‘I see that you’ve brought one of the houses with you.’

A rafted wheel, by unicycle. On top of which animals with elongated bottle-shaped but reach ceiling along their way, put-in effort to scrape some of the scalps off, the lamps; it was hardly bothersome, waiting in spindly webs, the spider that clawed their way out of his forehead were already partially dead for some reason or another.

‘It keeps them busy, eating their way through as if it were a carved pumpkin, it’s just not what it used to be in any case. With the all the poisoned cans they’ve been distributing alongside the spills.’

A carbon delivery, high-dioxide.

Morning came soon after. A cluster of pointing at the top pistons had already gathered in place, fathered only by one another’s greater counterparts, whose thinner yet more far-reaching shades were but creamy-boils on top a half-rotten piece of walled coiled-filled cogged wheels that’s fallen over out of the body of a great automaton’s sided-blown-busted waist.

The hour of the dame signaling to the side of the road’s car-tire pliers was threateningly advancing.

A few tendons off the well inflated themselves until a reaching point of eighteen hundred meters both sides began crawling through the air-holes left behind in the soil by one of the grouching worms that had infiltrated into the steam-place, having already amassed eighteen hundred thousand maggots around his dark lower body, it had escalated through an unsanitary hole of mold. And plunder, a few disgustingly hard-to-look at pig-tailed tape worms already had begun their dance. Eerily unnecessary, as it were, a few body bags started making their way through, being incapable of stopping, one brought the Cretin-Killer Afyfield-Lyahtyii with it. Wrapped around, nice-presentish he begged for stop:

‘They’ll bring only my berated death from that point if I am to follow, and there can be no such remorselessness as to point back.’

For the point from which they came out of, the darkened hole, being that. Already had it lain drowned, in most vaporous of eely-things, squirming on the grounds below, inside a well that’s bee devoured, partially enamored, with rounded filled with green’s and boils, a pool but vacuumed from the toils that’s happened in the place. A fight ensued, and little more than the globular body-bags remained. Although most incessantly disturbing was the fact, that the body bags in their place, were mightily glad to have been converted into pus-gelatin. Following in the crawl-steps of the most darkened worms, inside they came, and through the body, as if cut-through then followed after, through a cave, they entered the same room. Where the steam-filled were lain in a circle waiting, lost in pounder; at the very least, wearily working on one of the carved bottles, names, inscriptions and naught more than a few mess-arounds put in the wrong places, eyeless-cut-ins.

Their march was stopped when they were greeted by them, smoke ensued.

‘Gaseous remains it seems.’

‘We’ve had plenty of losses we had to get rid of in the long run, but we, we’ve tricked them into believing they are dead, and then, we boiled them into steam alive.’

Many of the murky-set and broken boned and spread around, as if en-thronged remains were set on the walls. Even the clouds were mechanical, at least to a lesser degree, having been passed by the midnight strangle, with the corpses caught in Green Fandangle, with some shades uncovering the grounded sore, where a few, if not, the many worms were nesting alongside the children-iron’s cut-in-due. The hour was come, a-new-anew.

‘You’ve come through the body of one of the greater rotten worms haven’t you?’

‘A surreal array of maggots in their ranks, indeed.’

Many of them being incapable to deceive the Steam Colonel whom faith had given onto him the coolness of the rack, and brought onto him a cooler, attached to the wall; with a finer-print but strapped on top of it, rubbing neck-in-neck and throated deck there was no calling. No bothering.

‘A bottle of rouge.’

Fifteen meters to the room it rolled, wrapped-unwrappedly around then lowered in an elevator’s manner, into a milk-bottled by the casts left behind, ‘milk-prints’ on the walls, as amber slightly just aroused the people back to their senses.

‘What’s happening?’

‘Shh, I heard it crawl again, I think it’s in.’

‘You said the same the last time, you disgustingly crucial to my destruction, idiot! There’s nothing there now, there was nothing there then, and there’s never going to be anything at all out there, you surely must know it by now, we’re trapped. Trapped, without a chance to light escape, without a morning blissfully hit by day, star of north, but beckoned forth by night, that lay, ever so closer to our arrival to the land beyond this bastardly rotten, such revival.’

‘I’ve told you before, I know what I’ve seen when I opened my eyes since.’

‘And what did you see if not the whipped veils of darkness, and the curtains of smoked gone? You’ve outdone yourself, you liar, thinking you could fool us now!’

But the other were reserved, unlikely to have a word in, and least of all, would they have known the meaning.

'I love, I always did and always have.' Josephine said, as wildly cried as a dandelion.

'That's the same thing.'

'We're about to die now, I can feel the heat's gone through afte-r boil'd, through my viscera.'

His stomach was empty and there were no organs to begin with, only dread.

It may not be entirely counted as such, but the various gases that've met the same helium-endowed propulsion whose complementary form and addition to the steam atoms was somewhat or made it by mere appeasement of the congruity of appearance, as to ascertain a certain massing of adorning-to-a-pulp observers that might've given a context clue as to the whole debacle being somewhat of a strange adjacement to the meddlesome yet boisterous way in which the turn of the 'bottle', during its process of wrapping yet unwrapping in the same way a child would open his long-awaited throughout the night, interfering with his quality sleeps', well, quality, gift, on the Christmas' Eve, where its golden stars, that is to say, a glowing most unnatural of bulbic shaped lamps that was placed eerily in the middle of the room, being part of the fuselage-fusefied through hybridization alone, a most chiseled servitude to a coined crown unchiseled, unearned, and unshielded from the bowelic burdensome on their part, observation of the way it started spilling into the void and nowhere else, that almost limbic system of growths that had spread along a diseased trajectory, forming strange stalagmites wormed tips that dangled from one end to another, messed with by a grazing complementary wind made out of visible mouth-puffs whose heat was off the Richter's scale in terms of the gradient, as to refer to the almost, disgustingly robust bulbic nymph nodes, whose luscious lust could yet be dealt with in terms of how long could they last in as vacuum such as the one they were in, where the process, lower levels of bacterium being the gods whose filth had wide-spreadedly spread with puss-nigger warts whose shapes were dendrite-shaped with puckers on top spread upon levitating discs that were shaped like two dimensional, then rounded, oblongdized eyes, for a sight alone them being changed to look even more puffy than before and bloated, as they charged in one another, starting to form large circumferentially distorted pyramidical oyster figures of rape, that infested the female-oid infected walls and the strangely forming deformed floating beings in which they were also implanted in and appeared to show up out the bodies of, and as it came to them, drawn from the bowels of even some barely levitating vortex in and out of which they began squirming out of, these nasty, disgustingly-disturbingly hard-to-be-around for long-stretches of time creatures, only drew breath on the right side of the lower-abyss, that was actually the left if seen from the open-door, in the hall where the people whom were or had been staring at the bottle to begin with had, giving them a good idea as to what was going on there, the most cumbersome yet Maladrious of structures, a crystal, in the body of which a few of these cowardly things appeared to be lodged in, that, having come out of the 'breathing' zone, had shattered, most violently in a most irreparable way, the bones of various ancient Pharaohs-close of kin figures whose chiseled by the royal sculptors' statuesque forms could not endure the very disturbing nature a woman had, as her echoes could only be resisted for this long, the pressure of their voices and what not, whereas, the man that had been flying in the middle of the mid-way region riff between and beneath the bottle's mid-point rotation that was almost mid-wrap half-way in as well, pulled out a strange elongated spear-shafted blade with eighteen deformed spear-heads adorned with skulled knives, and hammered, on not only the statues themselves but the crystal-led women, before taking his rightful place as the Pharaoh-like fugitive figure he's become once he carefully, with his curled around the great magnificent, eighteen by seventeen and a one hundred seventy five or so, on a diagonal upward-climbing on an incline set of ruby-bejeweled by many nigger-lynched reflections, he spent the rest of the hour on top the pillar that had been lain in front of him. A room lay somewhere down there, although not as visible as one might expect it to be. Some lines could not be sickled off because of how wavy the parapet of light was, one that kept it almost, almost see-a mist as lay there, came a single moving torpedo-spherical moving ram, opened by its sides, they joined:

‘The men inside the violent sow, we’ve come to bring you back into the world of the living!’ Cried one of the first men, among the elongated pillar marshy forest, then:

Bursting with a gazed-stricken by light charge-through, with nothing more but a rod made out of the most outlandish lice stitched together by iron-tinier black-cords bearing smaller, most incessantly disgusting fifty millimeters long sharpened at their tops and not screwed all the way through bolts, whose lower lice-pelted wires were attached to the side of his brain, feeding him brain-imagery and distorted visions of reality, that in turn made him stumble like a mad buffoon, incapable of fully controlling himself during the swoon as he only shot himself through one of the windows, shattering glass and muttering underneath a spoiled breathe as he bathed in his blooded clot, once finely placed on the other side of the corrugated floored-incline that awaited him there. A soul was lifted him up, levitating him at a fifty degree angle with his head pointing in a weird direction. That precarious club he once held in his hand had managed to fall and stumble over one of the pliant tables that now lay in ruin, wide-spread vases being pushed out, tiny peel-crack for shatter, up-for picking, mucky clay, other insoluble stuff, near one of the walled on top heads that drew their attention to the man. A spherical compact figure whose body was made out of those things but with wings sprouting out the back and an ivory- almost elephant trunk that’s shot through its lower spine, opening to reveal wriggling cylindrical things with spheres at their ends as well, pulsating radiation-poisoning by the minute, with a single eye-sphere, but a big one being projected on the far end of the wall itself. It belonged to it, the system of spherical membranes. Birthed out of one of the spheres, this chamber was soon enough filled with hundreds of men, all of whom were disturbingly hard to stare at because of their clearly-to-be-seen deformations, mutants as they leered, of corny-met upon each other’s skin. It’s been an hour already. He’s finally been released onto the ground. Stepped a few inches, crushing one of the corrugated iron planks that fell into the empty lain below him. One of the barely birthed people tried coming in but disappeared. Another one tried the same, but appeared in a globed maze of green and of ivory. What followed were a few, and all of them thrust through, the most obscure of zones and placed mazes one could ogle at, as such deformed. Nightmarish palaces with empty thrones, or chopping blocks of guillotine cones, as the man only clubbed his knees a little until he limped, bothersome a sight it were, he repeated for his belly, ankles, eyes and face, he’s smashed his entire body until the entire evolutionary anatomical build that’s been worked by nature over the past few billions of years had become something slightly unrecognizable, even to him. It was almost done, this bleeding-bother, as a nature drew a cast of blood, that looked like him but walked backwardly upon a strode-charade, spiked with eely things coming out of him as well. The ceiling was now on the side, the shards were on the wall. He couldn’t see all-bright or think of it just yet, his memory was fixed on an angle as well. Upon lifting the entire mass of an, estimateably, as to estimate, fifty or so years, man, one is found by a sudden intrusion of such thoughts of regret, obstinacy and shallow-leveled shame, all paused for a moment as he’s gotten up with the help of his crutch. Although too rounded at its top, it served him right, Henry, but used it to move. A door had just as soon swooned in the back, revealing a second-wide only to this chamber he was in, living-room of the sorts, ancient-almost in appearance, drawing, all of the figures in. Ought to he have followed after? Had he though a second more? Simply walking wouldn’t cut it, as he bore the pain, with blooded snail dropping one by one, to follow after a few more of them bled dry. And cast was he even closer to the room-in-between. The one whose entrance could be missed if one were to even remotely blink.

Henry taken in by the pseudo 'men', upon the brow of some Kings and Lords and the entire lord-hood, saint-hood, and the likes, instead; of mind me smashed a piece, a skull, and crushed between the sides of his palm, the first being that came to him, crawling, upon which he slipped, the blood of whom cowering him, closer to that room as well, where he'd slip towards, again, then there. Taken to it, by chance, he winced.

A broadened pool-view appeared to stand beneath one of the main repertoires, on an eerie almost night-sounding scene, if one were to call it so, whereas there was not a single living organism to be sure of, certainly left to its own accord to be drawn back to a place where one would know of it.

A couch-side of the wall, open-as for a few passengers to come in, a single man in there asking:

'Come in, come in, there's plenty of space if you desire range within, your stay as cowering as a figure might come here, stay, come stay, and you shall not regret a single minute spent in here.'

Not at all, but whom to call, the man but bastardly ancient, with a bearded scowl, around each demonical-towel that were his draperies of munch-machines, black incisors grinned, most desperately, a blackened leather stretched upon his feet and legs, bolted in. A few feathery heads, wrapped and stung, and buried inside his strung beetle-shroud, beneath which he hid, only for a second, at his feet was the man, freckled with as little sense:

'May I ask where I'll be taken, not to be mistaken of the ride, but I of all, would not survive this mere step alone, come to know, as It'll be shown, for whatever fret might come of dead, and candle, of waxen saber that might pounce upon me if I turn my headed-eye, to listen.'

'But I see no tooth, expect those that are mine and they are not as simple as the kind that would kill a man, and take no less but what's been given to him, in turned demise.'

'I beg of you to help me in, I cannot help myself step further, they'll have me thinned, a crooked corkscrew with little-tiny speck-filled eyes, hay-makers with larger needled-spears, ones alike, which would have blind, and thoroughly as I've had before in mind. I ask of you what little I am owed.'

'I do not owe you but a thing, what's it to you made that you might come to such a wont?'

'It comes from desperation, it's come from a never-ending deep frustration with what's happened to me before, when and during that malicious time, when upon each brow of the crowded moon, the one that's shouted of the Paradise Coon, 's blessed me with a single wicked dream of hope.'

'Go on, spit it out, I shall listen to what you have to say, whatever little more I have to take, I shall claim it anyway, and hence, you shall be free thereafter, but do not wait not much, for sounder as the need would sound, I still have yet to come upon a decision, as derisive as I am now. I need to be weary of those who'd harm my wares, not that I am one to sell, but my embodiment could be taken away, although it's not for sale, unneeded, for what's been taken away from me, as such defeated, would they have it cast. And run, if must, through coated little specks of lust, they would draw but breath away.'

‘Then I shall give you this, if little more is necessary for me to ask, then cast a single eye-sight away, if that’s a must, and I will give you less, as needed, and much to you, as there, it’s undefeated.’

‘A single thought has served me less, not that I would have it now, but I’ve come to stumble upon a price, no less, your souls is spoke for, yet whatever blight there might be in blessing stolen-vigor, forty more of ages’ loss, I would choose to reelect the leader, the one who thought, whatever happened in your body, as to come at a cost, deemed to be much necessary, to, least of all, be believed, of tried in spake, or yet again.’

‘Of whom you’re speaking of Couch-Courier of body-packages that stole from some of the lesser to be, and those who’ve we seen, the ones that were deranged, as thereafter, whatever one might hitch into, whichever ride and whatever spade might I be given as to dig my own grave, I ask you but of what little there is for me to remained with, no matter the cut.’

‘A cut is a cut, and bleed you must. I’m afraid that I can only satisfy myself with this ride knowing there’s a soulless cask walking with me and none along the way, none that would convey, even the slightest grim emotion, not that I would feel myself slip away. From whatever glance I might but stumble as to stoop but low and lay.’

Within the hour there was little earthen bold was left for them, of soil man born, little longer, along the way, much of it was wasted there.

Out of his blood clot a few un-expectable things happened. Although it had been no cause for concern among the ranks, especially inside the ones that were barely born out of spite of their self-wrong doings, a moth filled with tinier clots, all distinct from one another and very much distinguishable by shape and form, a ganglion of put-together shells per-kin yet perforated, incisor-trough, drew out of the puddish pond he’d made once he had been done administering a flew slits of bone and cut-on-throne, working his way around the waste of his wrist as if branded, until it had been or become as thing as a corkscrew-cut, devoured by the looks of it, then wilt back, as if wakened by shock alone, profusely felt yet numbed-pale, as he was seated steadily-leather belted in one of the seats, nails even as if on a post, with his feet inside the girth of his lavender scented grit that oozed. For the couch was solemnly ill- and tainted, rotten by the most niggarrish of parasites, whom had eaten out of lust, through bridled bone, until all, or just about most of it was cast out, leaving nothing else but the sight of indentation.

‘They will eventually leave the premise when you least expect it. That’s only a natural thing, as you’ve been led to expect.’

‘Will they return back to me eventually, will they come back inside my dried-up veins?’

‘I’m afraid there will be no such thing, let alone a chance for you to see it for yourself, if any. There’s but a lot of road to take on from this very point and there on out. It would be better If you accepted that there’s no way back and no way out, so as to ease your stay without too much resistance.’

They were lost for words for some reason or another. Trailing whatever it was that as much as trailed around the desultory confinements of their overly extended field of vision that spanned for miles and miles away, to such degree of detail that they could see even the slightly most defiled, deformed in terms of malnourishment as well as every other condemnable aspect they seemed to carry over with their weird standing, flies, as well as their towering chained to them, as if they had been some kind of ledges for them to invoke or cast upon, grappling hairy appendages as to convert these flying organisms into hot-balloons.

What made this meeting bearing for them, at the very least in terms of how easily it had gotten for them to vanish in and out of conscious thought was the sound the of musical sonnets that were being played directly inside their heads. Classics such as Ahynopf Eyutch, Hara Onko, Fiasph Nelno, among many others that seemed to be tall-head inflated with rotating screws coming out of their faces and bodies, until a point had come where they bled themselves to death. An oratory thing, having saved them as well as their essences into the discs.

All of whom had barely been preserved at the hands of well-endowed benefactors, collectors and various surface sweepers, savage-looters, salvagers and what not, whom worked in tandem in order to ensure the proper need, care and search, that is to way, their collective effort had saved most if not a great percent of them, as they've been slowly delivered onto the archive for safe-keeping. It was unclear what made the cut and what hadn't. Only the most select half-a-minds were brought onto the Archive after all, since they were the most trustworthy of noodle-spirals, no resistance was being shown once they came in.

Inside the Archive:

A simple domed-covered gate slowly drew back; as if it's seen its share of good pounding. A few ruffians made their way around. Tight walls appeared to block both sides at an all around shake-'round, where the hallway had been partitioned and left for rotting. It was to scare and drive people away, at least those who haven't had their fair share of killings. Nothing was more pleasant than the first sight, the image of those who tried stealing from the archive, whom had been run down, mowed almost, into the nearest hard facet the hidden weapons were capable of thrusting them against. Dirt was sprinkled atop the doorknob. One of the vagrant-ruffians made a swirl motion the other one:

'You open it, open it fast, open it by force, make sure you put all of your strength in, all of your body-mass through!'

The boulder just drew back into its initial position, standing guard instead of gate. Beneath it one could feel the rancidness of scents that prevailed atop the metal-bolted rails that made its capricious nature, hard of lockedness and the signs of there having been an intrusion as someone managed to break the lock on a previous break-in 'attempt'.

Some flower petals of celerity malborious, to ask of being listened to, when their adorned openness fell off the river's sprinkler's come, words having fallen when the swords were had none, to carry illustriously-weary of what's been pained for flowing aimlessly, during their unheard discourse, that, by then, was held as an exchange instead of lecture, somberly misunderstood as their intention, not too mockish but since ought else to have been had by now be lost on mostly bore, snoring and un-adorning philistines, whose understanding of the play, that's been happening between the two of them, for those whom paid enough attention-fading, at this point, though mildly disgusted with the utter show of disinterest that's been shown towards the lecturers, said as much and kept their mouths shut. It went for hours, stretching as for reasoned by, monotonous decline in laughter's felt after not by them, but by the lecturers whose jest was upped, to've been said something else, rather naught, might've displeased not only their countenance, as to be contrived but that of their students whom had reached their peak, in terms of 'listen', as to pay attention to the quiet pause and break that stretched for just as long, staring at their empty thoughts as silence brought more of an explanation than their fellows ever could have ever been brought to, reasoned by lids that have been peeled, and every mutter whose lost appeal ordained as to a rain – confusion said not felt, allowed them to ask for bis, to suffer again, of hourless reprieve, to have all, at once, paid for in double-say, to have listened but refrain, from absence that might last, now that their minds, be fully endowed, to properly absorb what's been promised onto them, back and forth. A student twas' quiets for long but sat. Uplifted as his spirit, long before he'd been brought closer to the stage and asked, in part, by everyone in, presented as for the crows to nib, the jackals, the vultures and the carrions that would gather, the eagles and the predators of nature's finely set gallows; to have preferred a repertoire of preemptively pre-thought.

'I'm a book burner, with rape-fire.'

A horn-shaped tumor drew out of his back with black cords filled with faces, every single one of them bearing elongated horns that had syringe protrusions coming out of them, rotating and spreading disease as the mightily deformed channel returned:

The vigor of youth, I see presented, to have their challenge there attested, for there to run on crags of spiels, with every page turn, as if to feel, to the cultured as to be-joined, to the promise as their patriarchs might adjourn, when finally delivered, into the arms of a world of sown.

'I have swelled and spread disease when canny, when mightily walking upon the draught of rancid.'

'Little more alacrity on the nasty; what might be taken from the man who's listened to no one?'

'I think I might begotten forth and to and fro as I would have it sought.'

'An ulcerous despondency.'

A small compartment was distinct from the others. Going around their Amphitheater-area, upon one of the moving around the wall-planted sea-horse but whose head and back were molded into an electric panel-pane, with a few large appendages coming out its right side of the body, whose variously timed pounds landed niggardishly around the ground level area, out come a pivoting shock, sparkling tint that hit the ground through the appendages carried on. And its eye opened, though fluid and transparent, a few ganglions and flea-sized parasites charged for their prey, a tiny rusty corkscrew spanner that flew around the pane.

It helped ease their snuck-through suspicion-supine, the ones crawling in the walls but through one or through bottles that were made to appear whenever they did not look through blinds and curtains with full-on, or pouching-in-leap-as- from ledge to ledge, behind them, dead, goat-sheds in the high-mountains, among the spirals, the vials of smoke that poured in their mouths, beneath and above the mouths of this single cottage house that was being messed with, although little by little by their choice they couldn't make it more obvious, it was theirs.

‘A man had entered that house, he’s in the cave-room, with the others.’

A stone floored portion of the great chance to step in came alongside a crane-motioned with no such distinguishable machine in sight, but volatile in terms of the tendon-features that drew alike, leather-ropes attached to it, lowering it down, bearing it as carefully as the thread of a sea-‘-s’ connected river, then shot down, diverging to its left, then downward on an incline, then left again as if it were on a rail, slowly it began descending even further until the only thing that was even visibly distinguishable was it and none other, bearing fruit-feather weight as well, until the insolence prayed upon by the figures on the wall, by the figures that were no taller than a few meters off the floor, that landed in, but great concave they came within a range of shooting, as soldier-figures, lime-outline, shone with such a sun-light vigor that for a moment or so they stumbled on their darkie-feet, found themselves but wearily, as to seat, upon nothing but a plague pit-round, a circle – standing in the middle, resting, driven into it as well as run. There was no possible way of escaping, not so soon that there was a simple change they could flail their bodies shot through distant cast.

‘Vultures, all of them, but they come in different colors.’

‘It’s been five hours already, shut your damn mouth, shut your filthy god damned mouth, I’m only trying to listen.’

‘It won’t open, I told you we are stuck here for good this time around, there will be no more opportunities to escape, birded cages whose flocking curved boned-feathers keep the tiny leaping iron cages in check, despite their attempt to charge and cause as much trauma as they can, they will never escape. Trapped forever in their flying avians, as we are.’

A set of eight consecutive taps disturbed their conversation, uneven, plump, made to bother whoever listened to this annoying, obnoxious, purposefully prolonged, poignantly obtrusive put-in. One hole appeared by its margin. It was a fake outdoor’s mirage, but they were sold on it already.

‘Think you can get the other half of it open, maybe?’

‘No can’t do, I’m under express orders not to allow anyone out who’s still alive and from the sounds of it, you’re still going hard at it. You’ve been breathing solemnly, rhythmically, protrudingly for the last few months or so. And I spent all that time doodling and taking notes of your every drop, every urge and every attempt at disturbing them, whether it be purposefully or not. That I cannot tell. Otherwise, I know of what you’re made of. I know what lays beneath that flesh and blood of yours even better than you do.

Such it is that just as I trained myself to pick up on the subtleties of heart, this malefic organ of yours that is no longer in either of your chests, but inside the room you’re stuck in, have hybridized themselves together, becoming an unfathomable force of scoundrelly, mockery and evil. The likes of which I have to deal with unless put to rest, as I’ve become a masterless hound, in beckon to receive a king’s mourning crown of death’s reprieve.’

It was blearing insufficiently as to what was being heard. A few elongated hearts that were bore upon a rack:

‘A call to action!’

A poster in the distance said:

‘Be-ware!’

For there stood before them fourteen legs attached to a jolted green-filled with pug-bulbs formed around the side of a most oblique deformed bodily base. It heaved in and out of its outer-almost gravitational belts that wrapped and ran and necked each other off as they sprouted forth, in and out, revealed a constantly breaking and reattaching mass that had belonged to some primordial, well-preserved as for conclusions to be somewhat drawn, going as far as, perhaps absorbing some Cetacean features belonging to some lost reptile, such as beaks and wings, and most greater skulls that had appeared in visions that could barely be dealt with as they carried on flashing and appearing with every passing second, as it's sewed off greater anchored deformities only reared themselves into view whenever not stared at directly, as a manner of light-producing bulbs, there being a few immediately released as some kind of deterrent signal to the outer-mammalian predators whose ventures allowed them to spring into existence since left unchecked, a mere distraction from its magnanimously colossal size of whose sheer density as well as outward fare could only ever draw as close to its other bulbic globules whose production range was completely put to shame by the likes of the light swarm whose light was cast onto them as well, with the lower-rack that kept everything together, this pantheon of almost humanoid bones that desperately clenched as hard as they could, with blearing, dark eyed, gas-formations, those that were known to be shown as nothing else other than some flashy crystals had been long dislodged since they showed no other signs of being capable of releasing the cadaverous remains that were present in their grasp, had managed to hold everything pinned together in place, as if some intrusive surgical metal plate put on top your brain case had been closely made worked upon as to prevent not only further injury but a chance, as little as possible, or as possibly as it could to shatter, crack and spread, at the point of impact, such outer-plantish, fanatic waves, that their mere shock would break loose the belts, the four iron-planet breaking or shattered in as to be remade out of tinier bits that, upon being lodged together created an arc-like connector of sounds, echoes and strikingly distraught voices, whose physical progenitors had been long-vanquished yet were trapped inside, incapable, very much so, of preventing the great beast from outwardly, beyond the reaches of the ships and the cargoes and the other unnaturally-made space formations' capabilities to reach it, flinging itself away, out of the atrociously defunct, most irresolutely poignant, to an insufferable degree beyond belief, as for one to be, quickly after, left under the impression of, initial estimations, calculations, opinions and assessments being made already in regards to the openly shown display of force that was being not only held, still, under the vigilant eye of the many gathered upon the site of this great- dark squirm it produced in front of them still, whose scrutiny, as a given, was very much so, or served as a requirement that had to be maintained in order to extrapolate, from what was going on there, as for the series of events that entailed in front of them having caught on only now, through the bodiless observes, needed to a boastful degree, up to this very point where they finally got an accurate enough read on the force it was capable of producing under extreme stress, this show of melting limbs, appendages and various other explosions that were self-contained in produced by its very outer-things in order to mitigate some of the pain and violent damage it had sustained over such a prolonged drivel of time, until the very point where this fire-works display of 'antiquated-rape' whose main culprit as well as victim had been naught else but the celestial bodies they themselves were and they themselves targeted, to an abruptly anticlimactic end whose ordinance lead this creature, by sheer force, as to grant it, all of the sudden, a few billion miles away, thrust in the same way the Apollo Nineteen of the NASA fame, with an eviction code of PVRC-BR- Twelve of June – Less than a month now sticker modifier being strapped on it during the type of its 'launch' but in a more archetypically prototypical kind of larval stage it had to resort entering, as a brown-Canadian Death bear put to hibernation, where, during the last few minutes of this sudden gain in 'ground', although it was space, as it would be come to be known, during the last few minutes of the uninterrupted chain of concentration, niggers, I hate niggers, the ruthlessness it attempted to force them with failed, wherein within its range, there rested a hundred eighty seventy or so deformed nigger-lynched, outwardly protruding creatures whose hybrid-molded faces, part machine-as they formed some sort of unity-, an unnatural body they alone could get a hold of, since they fed on themselves and on their own viscera, covered in a humanoid-but roach-like, as to their tawny appearance being not only less so dismissed on grounds of finally being allowed an act of self-containment, but they also revealed, by contemplative chance, during their niggering around in space, that behind them lay a most unnatural formation of angelic-cherub winged elongated pillowed oblongs with wild heads that ended up in weird formations, like the tulip of plants or some unnatural darker things that could not have themselves flung-outwardly or any further than where they stood, eating each other as their darker, pinty-wrap producers only cut through the closest stars in the dark, taking away light, even the one that was shining as well as this great fiend was being encased in, until a point where they began channeling, at dark-lengths, rays of transparent-energy, atom-driven to a poignant degree of trying to force unnatural surges to occur in the outer-bacterial-self encased chitinous membrane it coated itself with in order to avoid the complete desolation the many nigger-like creatures that appeared, these broken baskets filled with warts and Sub-Saharan nigger filth-bubbles, boils as well as other unnatural things that spread along the outer reaches of their bodies, bore, within themselves, as they were and served only as, as a, as a hive-mind mental entity that was being ruled by this elk-like cherub that not only gave it orders but could only, as much as it could produce or fancy itself incapable of fully thrashing everything in sight, whose mother-unit was a womb-like piece of shrapnel brain whose eternal blue-glow belonged to a different gradient than the others, by time alone, they were given a sudden internally driven brain-ordering overriding-wave of command whose receipt was not only met by no force or resistance since the niggers were incapable of showing as much, but in doing so, they also released a few unnaturally-broken apart offspring entities, nigger-light with puckers and with molds that gathered around, all stillborn lynched already to a point where they constantly spat blood, choking on clots, having their limbs chopped, ruined and spread around as a butcherment of extreme inaction followed soon after. They were ruined, these inhuman beings, always cackling and dancing, as they tried getting a better 'read' on the creature. Ion-producing dark heads, humanoid looking heads put on beams but whose mouths were like old-vintage telephone receivers, rounded and with many holes, as well as their eyes as well, that produced lights, three, one blue, one red, one ultramarine, while the general feel of alabaster could only rear its ugly head no further than where it stood: They detected sudden motion and only moved in tandem with it.

A phone rang, unexpectedly so, with this day and age; the lampoon of snow-blossoms, alabaster-eggplants, iceberg-corns, whitish powdery-tree trunk soils, whom were gathered upon a steaming twisted-around 'valve', on top of it, occupying this giant cap-like round grate-wearing thing to a completeness beyond what under normal circumstance would be considered as to be conceivable, which homed them in quite nicely as the moist steamy vapors of insoluble purposefulness had allowed for a growth-driven hybridization to spread across the walls, the ceiling, the floor, venturing ahead as it became an egg-white plunge of joineries, soon enough become breeding grounds for plant-based life-forms whose sudden urge to come into light manageably caused various echoes of self-contained tremors whose nearest entry-points, in order to reduce or contain some of the force they had produced, were the very slits of emptiness that lead down the well, the place where the steam was propagated out of, since inside the very room they were in, no discernable entry way or door could be identified, neither by them, despite their recently acquired ocular organs, when, the sudden change of shades and of colors that was being thrown from unknown light sources made it seem as if it had become an almost, nostalgic-rose tinted fall-over, pass-off, from another age, whose colors started becoming sparks of mist themselves, slowly hardening as they emanated little puffs of dirt-tinkles, of various gradients, of various heats, when, no longer perceived as a threat since they were easily dismissible from that point of view, their one mind shot through, by means of seeds that were reeled down the canal, being found soon after by a pair of unorthodox beings whose maleficent nature only spread whenever a most incongruously pertinent, as to show signs of being offended, while being very much aware that at the other end of the seeds, or these reverse stalks, there lay the actual bodies of these interloping spies of the sorts, there intruders who found themselves uninvited here, in a crowded area that had allowed the entry and the arrival, in the meantime of hundreds of mole-types, not in appearance but shared in their blindness as well as their behavioral characteristics. From wherever hole they had crawled out of served no longer as pivoting leverage as for their effected attention to be steered in the wonted for direction since their loathsomeness far exceeded whichever possibility of a far more horrendous than their current selves origination to possibly be exploited to anyone's advantage but theirs.

‘Pull in, pull it out of its socket, then break it open, we have to perch ourselves near it and find out what they hid inside of it.’

‘There’s an eye, I can feel it, they’ve devoured one of the passers-in, they’ve ruined his body then repurposed it in something else.’

‘So you say, but I’ve yet to stumble upon any proof of such reprieve, of such a thing as there ever being a man up there, in the closed off quarters.’

‘Yet this happened and if it happened once, it will happen again.’

‘Whether or not we deal with it this very moment, correct?’

‘It’s irrelevant what kind of judgment we pass onto it, especially that it starts receding back into the top of the hole it had come out of.’

With which a few more vapors started wobblingly down-sided, as to leap from one side to another, easing in its advent, thoroughly hiding some of the bottled ones that were still hid inside each brick and of little more lay than needed. Lest of all, a wretched fiend drew from somewhere damper; nearing them after.

There was barely enough room in the back, yet plenty for it to crawl through, as it gaggingly, to a comatose embrace, drew forth, quite heavy, a being that almost seemed to bear no face. Its head was contorted and pointed only at the ceiling top, an elongated thing-like a Pterodactyl’s head but fleshier, a man’s instead but closer in fat and shape to a termite’s, eyeless but with a lipless mouth up-front beneath the ‘chaos’ of outer-limbs that erupted from inside, what would’ve been taken for the place where its nose and eyes were placed. Almost like a coyote but more deformed, a beak-but humanoid, for mouth, covered with sores and strange teeth that dangled back and forth, whose neck-collar bones and shoulder level, but armlessness, was closer in appearance with that of a humanoid, but then, it drew into a giant-pill shaped scarab-shaped torso, that was adorned with elongatedly deformed wriggling eely-limb appearing superficial goop long and wide ‘lobes’ that were constantly falling off it, but at a slower rate than they were being produced in, whereas in the back of this oblong, whose deformed head’, being the impression given by the upper side and the actual head, looked like a horned outer-protrusion or end to this being of disquiet, bore two great fat bars of legs aligned like two, at the same level, pendulums, where, the one in the back bore a rack of many long-legs it used for land-sweeping and the one in the front bore a smaller long-body with a pepper-shaped head at its end, compounded spring sprouting hive-bearing eyes as well as, a thing that applied to the entirety of its body, the impression of it, in its entirety, being a broken apart pair of regurgitated beings that were slowly disintegrated and broken apart by the gelatin they were coated in.

‘We shall then confer to return within the hour and reassess the necessary action that is to be taken in order to rid ourselves of a possible infestation yet to be, for I’ve felt something that need not be fully revealed just yet, since, of most obtuse despondencies unmet, it’s settled, already, as a fact of no less magnanimous inference, as to point back at the bastardity of the creature whom had scouted our hold, threatening to persuasively invade our solitary abodes as well as living quarters in a dire attempt to spread its insolent rack of unmitigatable sullies, that, without a doubt, no living healthy being could endeavor as to fully entrench itself with a probability of escape, that would no further and no less take its toll upon it, upon them, upon us, don’t be obtuse as to think it would avoid or spare as, since life for it will become null, a despot’s woe, a patriot’s lowered gun when met be deceit and when the deceit is finally revealed to be a gun, a ruse, and he is shot in the back, saddened by what he was forced to hear, dreading this nonchalance with which the killer’s stroll had lend upon him whole, rubbing it in, knowing no defeat, at a point of Solstice where the crossroad had now given him no choice but to remember a day when things were better, for the greater good of mankind fretter; to which we rest upon a bastion of nomenclature we have and will continue learning for as to prepare ourselves for the warfare that is to come, since both sides had unanimously agreed, as a pact, taken from one side, then lend upon the other, to our brotherhood’s discomfort as for the agreement of peace that had been previously settled between our people, that shall not hamper what we are to achieve today, since we are to fight and endure, to such retort and cure of disregard, for our safety and four our people’s future’ run, in case we fail, as to have them not die, yet again, with us on a field of sorrow, never-met.’

A balcony, somewhere outside, on a structural towering figure twas open below its brow:

‘Open it, I need you to open this door as soon as possible, I think someone’s stalking me, I’ve seen him in every reflection I walked towards, every toad leaping and everything that’s come between before I had a chance to pour in even the slightest hinder of a slip of ammoniac so I could drive the villain out of his hiding, because I know that they fear it, they fear it more than they could ever possibly know. It’s poison to them, some kind of toxin, the people who are after me. The chasers, the eaters, the munchers, the filthy-drags of tatters that surround them are aware. Filthy animals they hunted, then stitched together, taxidermists without jaws and unaware of what is being done with their creations, they pilp their pulpit thinking their pupils will take care of it later, once the settlement’s been exchanges, but I know much better than that, what to expect from the people who stole whatever I’ve left of my chirping life.’

Within sight there he lay. With what little vigor he had in his remains. A walking thing that was no man, but kept together by strings and wires, all that were ensnared by fire, lightning and some acid that was desperately yearning for a puff. Some noise was being made downstairs but there was no sign of anyone, most people being boats, most beings having climbed on top in order to gouge out their eyes in order to see or check whether or not there was still some life in them, for some reason or for some reproach they themselves were no better discussing or approaching the ceilings, whom were beckoned to raw-meat through them, like bunkers of battling rams that were being used during a siege as they pounded through various virulent tunnels of echoes, of waves of thumping, of charging wretches whom were armored above and come in the hundreds, all wearing plated armor, with chitinous membrane falling off them, bolted roofs on their backs, and some wearing pincer-towers with other-unfathomable to belittle as to gaze upon for elongated periods of disparity, in which reality might faint to leap out of sight and allow psychosis to take them now, since their helmets open revealing only some burdensome change, not in terms of what they looked like, since they were and had been, prior to this, made of gas forms of puffy, to a degree of an almost spider-webbery bubbly unfathomable thing that took hold of them before the crickets of iron started bottling inside of them, allowing their marching echoes to achieve a whole new level of bothersomeness who laboriousness in terms of the overwork, long-hours, overtime, pushed to such limits that any living counter-part might've been completely ordained as to be dwarfed in by the easiness through which one could be covered, by sheer magnitude of work, the impression being cast onto them, even before it started, this pandemonium of –at-a-muscle-level destructiveness self-endured by means of retribution as this canker like state they had projected the lower-demonical cacical figures, whose furtive assertiveness was long-cast, when, once the helmets started coming back down, bouncing upon such surroundings as for the light that was being projected from inside finally revealed their most secretive weapons, as ancient Medieval fire-breathing drakes with one exception unique to them, since they were largely immaterial in countenance and since theirs was more of a trick of anciently, somewhat primitively preserved engineering or some bothersome similarity to that of which one would apply that supposition, as to the eeriness of the level of intricate machinery which would somewhat rival theirs, or theirs or theirs, that it would be unguessable as to what era or age it had been drawn to, that is to say, that, inside of them there lay many metal-beamed, arches of some sort that kept within their grip a most pernicious lantern-holding spark producer of whose irregularity was most fallacious in terms of how quick the spread would come in terms of how quickly to fault one would adhere this system they were 'subscribed', in terms of the total annihilation they endeared to spread in as short a time span as possible, immediately going ahead as to rear their heads in and around, like giant violently-heaving-thrusting-pumping-leaping-flying-gliding alligator heads, with, most importantly, necks that would be tried for, as for the many pair of arms that, upon being wrapped around this thickly embraced barrel of thrusts, the men would find themselves incapable of fully restraining this beast since the mere force it extruded was unfathomable by normal means and not only that, but the mere impermeability in terms of how they carried themselves expressed itself by means, arrogance being a defacto as to the irresponsibility not only had they not even endured themselves the trouble of trial in terms of attempting to get rid of one's self immorally-forlorn moral insufficiencies that in turn would, force one to adhere to the most disgraceful doings, to stumper this disregard for one's surroundings as well as the life they themselves had admitted as to have not the countenance of ensuring it would be very well preserved, to a nigger's level of violence even in terms of how outwardly sloppy, these filament device-drive of spark-inducing, thrust through gas-gusts of pernicious fire, wherein the lives that had been sacrificed for nothing else and nothing more than their enjoyment, self-admitted yet aforementioned, rendered them in a state of continuously conglomerate despondency, insufficiently-drawn-attention-to buoyant green-'opal'-esque scoundrelly, to a mesmerizing public-enduring-outwardly-displayed shameful, that would render anyone else in their place, rather, humble enough as to forcefully clasp shut their helmets as to stop this ever-spread of fiery

Holocaust of happenness, whose alarmist outcry, as to have been tracked to the outwardly beings that were unaffected happened to be much louder, their outcries of outrage extending to such an unnatural level that they would be rendered as being worthy of execution at the very least, having fully earned that right of being cleansed by fire, only by the sheer annoyance they displayed.

But the steam provided something beyond a less important window that could be gotten a hold of then reused at a level beyond the mere apprehension or comprehension of the most dreadful of allures that could be gotten a hold of.

Nearer to some Western Slope:

‘You lack in post-mortem.’

Said the man, now largely surprised at what he’s said or thought. It appeared to be fleeting at times but he didn’t question it. Wouldn’t do it, not while the pack of Bedouins were staring; a violent herd of them, gasping for air and breath, as both cord-split hair trails were allowed to grow backwardly, then were set in place. A few more quails of iron, feathery as of alloy allowed for everything to come naturally to them. Belittled, that they were, not only by their compatriots but by the, by the masters who had gone through a great deal of exchanged pleasantries in order to convince them that there was something else happening there, otherwise unspoken and unseen by the public eye. They were tall and darkly wreathing and only the outline of their bejeweled eyes could be seen. A putrid stare followed another. Twins of glow, but they armed and armored their pets and it showed:

‘Pick up some lancers off the ground; we’re to bring them to the great lantern of Praft then have them walked instilled against one another again.’

‘Must they suffer, dear Kadlekenn? Have they not served enough to year the taking of their toys?’

‘Their lives and their bulbs are to be made use for and to what purpose I will it pleased to my and theirs and ought to have been finned, that I wilt it done wilt, or otherwise, naught will go working and not much will be done. And if eerily there I loathe, is that, I seek no cure for such stagnation, but I will avoid it nonetheless if it is within my power to do so.’

The purplish-yellowish tenebrous cogs-x’s and the turquoise mortem leprous voxis antecede-mortis plane of old-spherical-connobranches, Inaxis Liquor Portix, of Fascia Emporium, whose volatile wild-open deformities, gated by malnourished comities, whose numerous-grounded, alarmed by intrusion of Solace-gourd, come upon, stumbling as if to uphold whatever remained of their council’s Prime, during the melodiousness reproach, of aged dime spoken-therefore after, naphthalene moths ringing their lor’d ‘round’ rancor, yet obliquities of much less were known to be held, during the times of prayer, mended yet upheld, now they’re come, approached as to spread some of the roaches and the other insects they were known to grouch and, twas been told, and hold, were they signed upon brow-upfront and turned as to be mocked now that the Emporium was taken from them, cold gusts of windless serenity’s bell, yet chimes adorned their ties, ‘Lo’ twas watched wreathing in the muscles flounder, here thee come and hereon after!’ – Was it told and much beheld as the promise of never-end brought promise of agony brought to stopped brat, stone cast away through the sea of courage drawn but flat, of little to no understanding, a composition made of lies, crimes being committed, the gouging of the eyes, but villains such as them would not get away, nor would they have their irradiated by nuclear-innocuous stay, as to wait, sneer, fear, be frightened in contrivance but was held, abstaining as, despite the moment, have a say, for silence’s end was brought upon the calmness of the putrid rain. Of green and shaded prunes-of plume, a brown-dirt of somber held, less intoned as to refrain one from looking back to a place, deserving of, reproaching praise, much-begotten, stolen and delivered to some wretched lads, whom stricken upon home, they’ve taken all life, and spared but none, them come alive, whenever drafted in the back, they’d yell:

‘Lo, the old man, he’s come from the pit, the one that abandoned us and left us to such feet. The one that thought of us as young, during such and brought but strong, theft of life in taking, held; of such quiet would we, still ourselves, and yet we say.

Release him of his grasp-en told, release him that we may meet and hear what we can of him, so we may focus on whatever’s left of him, whenever cast away, and bold. You be to this day and to the other, for if, what fairness I would recline to hear again, for if that’s what you will do to us, if we were to despair. To be caged like beasts then beaten on the brow, to be treated like dogs and nasty hounds. To be looked upon with pity in a land that’s ours. To be held with such somber, reach, rigidity, as you’d shower any slave that came upon the hour. We bring upon you war and draw, whichever bow or else, there is, weapon of war.

To cast you away and make you pay for each soul you’ve stolen along the way, to have you be brought onto justice and withhold whatever you may cherish as to say. We ask for such release to cast.

To come about and paint you in the blood you’ve so desperately stolen from us. For when it comes we shall not be deceived again. Nor shall we have it stolen, as for crones and feet us steel in plain of wooden dames, and dampage. That is what we ask.’

‘Indeed you may, but there’s little of it you may think of me if I were to say and cast, or lay whatever shout there is about you cast.

I bring something you will not receive, I bring something of some last retrieve. Without you, no man can ever nor will they ever such accept. Without it, without it, see, but see, I’ve got something for me, for you, for everything.

A blackened spear cast that spoke. Of times when we were asked to leave or seek for tusk, somth; of less abhornt, that no other man would accept; whom spake for us but searched for naught, and came about, and ventured on about until no longer yet inclined for man. He would’ve had to have had hardied himself, else, none.

No, none indeed; the wretch, he would have it for himself and there he stood on that ledge.’

For there, there, there and there, he walked around. Leaping, yet inclined.

It leaped out of the ground again, right now, in front of their very gay but staring eyes. It was known, of what twas capable of, to say, the teathed-incisors, all were keys. A piano of determinacy, yet abhorrent, as any real beast with cables stuck of back, multiple arms and all angled-black or tar but melting as well, and a giant face that was in the middle, split open and a satellite vent –fluid organic, moved to the fronts and many creatures like it drew on, all surrounding yet the men.

‘You’re capture and under sure-allure, you’re to fail to concentrate of what’s but true, have you not known of what they’ve done to others?’

‘Eaten and devoured, and of what did they do after? I cannot tell, for my ancestors did not prevail, they didn’t know what to do if such’s the case, they only feared, and ah, I fear as well. My descendants will not be warned.’

‘IT will not matter for I have already taken something that’s mine, queerly inclined and I fear that you will not find it again. You know what it is?’

‘A spear?’

‘Worse than that, beyond any fear man could ever bear, I fear there’s something out there, unlike it, but blind, and I see flat.’

The squirming platform they were on. It floated, all of the sudden the sky disappeared. They were in space, or all was black around them as if a curtain was taken, aha, indeed, instead. Stars were puffs and empty cries, and the speed was too fast. And there were wheels on every side and the main formation that was there, it was putrid and ugly and had many wax-faces that were doomed to be seen forever in their nightmare filled dreams and were quiet soon after as they focused on the main face that snapped back close after. And every single one of their eyes, the men’s who were present there had elongated fifteen meters in the front. Ugly contortions that could barely be noticed or see but they kept their liquid bubbly forms as they dripped like slugs, yet were abhorrent as to be held, culled, then well-off, see it up-close. Like a sun of orange, but oblong, not twas’ Earth, sure flat, but rounder, pointier and open, like a nut-cracker’s fancy totem-teeth that smirked, each one of them, a vertically rotated mouth that revealed eyes and more-like lips in texture-fleshy. That split around the ‘edges’, slightly, out of sarcophagi they came. Only for a moment then, revealing their mouths that were ugly-nasty things that were drowned in such strange things that made their heads expand as soon as they drew some of that poisoned, invisible gusts of airs from inside this ugly, now referred to as naught else but a ‘chamber’, in which they found the only thing that satisfied them, revealing. As slug-eyes withdrew, and these peculiar ‘humanoids’ that were winged by talons, giant flat-armed shills that were almost eighteen-moths put inside rounded outlined-shielded see-through crystal-pseudo-deformed ‘art’ bottles, although more abstract, as what was lost, then loft was gained, it was a cry, of ghastly remains they spat out, since they could not refrain, revealing open-appendage-filled mouths, out of which a single, elongated many segmented prodding one drew out as to scan the area around them. Their eyes were shelves and their skin flopping, and there was no other chance to explain it, how this harrowing unhappiness they spread could be explained either.

Putrid vapors:

Down the line there stood a simple poppy-thin mountain, standing largely erect while the others were only deepening in their mounts, trying to burry one another in, without leaving or giving the slightest hint of them being cannibalized by the fumes, the same fumes whose many eyes and twists and elongations since had left little else, so as to behold.

The things nigger children deserve are unaccountable to most men as to define the order in which they need to be done; be it that the nigger-child should be taken by the soles of his feet, immediately stripped alive of all skin, have hot wax, burning oil, boiling steam, and the likes enter him, or if one were to simply start sawing away, whether it would be his throat, around the belly or the toes that curl around his throat, then again; a man would have to take another filthy sub-human nigger child from the pile, he would have to burn him alive slowly, and prod him after, then continue with every subhuman monkey little-creature, as he would seek but fortitude to perform the acts, to have his teeth removed one by one with hot pincers, then enter through his throat, then done. Another one would have to be taken from the pile.

‘You’re one of the chief of security, is that correct? You’re in charge over supervising the cleaning, right?’

‘I suppose it would be fair to say that, yeah, I am; what about it?’

‘Could you show me around the place for a while?’

‘Not until this is over, I ain’t. Take a sea, as, this might take a good while now.’

Nothing but a few meters away from where he stood, behind the screen. They brought the Monkeggs in, a few shelved inside large egg-like containers, out of which they started riling up the lowering of the niggers back into where they belonged. A pile; a second one, a third one, so on and so forth; they would even get a plow-truck in, carrying them nigs from the other side of the Residential they were supplying themselves from, with as little to no regard for them at all. For the time being anyway, many more niggers had to be taken, as if for granted, young. It made the moisture of slitting their tendons off, then performing the experiments on them much, much easier, and so much smoother than before. Closer to infants meant that the niggers would have an easier time satisfying the customers, and there were a lot of them.

‘I’m sorry.’

‘Wait, I know you.’

‘Yeah, I didn’t think I’d expect find you here.’

‘Under normal circumstance, I wouldn’t be, but.’

One of the ropes slapped the side of a few raped with knives nigger children that were all put in a killed-niggers basket. A skull-grinder with left-over brats:

This city always get good at night.

‘They’re spreading, this filthy disease of theirs is spreading, and if it’s not stopped, it will tear this entire world apart, this needs to be stopped at all costs!

Filthy-dirty animals, look at how inhumane they are!’

So many parts that did not fit; ugly bloated, begging of being in need of being removed.

A steam valve opening down there, near something that could be distinguished as a vale; although largely obscured, hardly a matter of understanding why or what, or whether or not there was some cure to this prognathism the building displayed as it pushed farther away, deeper still, outwardly flung, withdrawn, then gone were the only symbols that had been lodged there first. A simpleton, no more; was drawn out of the room, then more, and harder were they, whom gathered around him during the philanthropy of the mile.

‘I’d be careful if I were you. Not a lot of single probes out there, at least not the kind that you’d expect to track and trail along whenever you snap your fingers in their eyes and plow the ground from thereon out, abhor. I would, if I were you.

But I am not and for that I am blessed to not have known anything past what goes in there!’

Who is that person I’m talking to? Abhor-Clint asked himself. He looked there, a few meters away up-front, then right along the area of an arc, going around the full-buildup along which a hill would’ve rolled down, then all around, left and right, then gathered up, not to sickened an empty-while, while the bile filled the ‘sky’, empty-trailed and cones of trial:

A bubbling explosion, but contorted in a top of the mushroom-cap, with many lumps coming out of it, all branded together by metal leathery belts that prevented it from falling off, falling apart, then flying in just about every other direction, come around a bade, like the body of pole, not like a mushroom’s, but hard, flatter, compact and raised every few meters or so, as to form beads being drank from a straw, connected to some barely kept in place organs, presented outwardly, but unkempt by the looks of a see-through pseudo-exoskeleton, connected to four great downward pointing fat-incisors. But that was just its head. After crawling along for a few moments, it revealed a lamp-like curvature in the back, that was at first believed by Clint to be a tail, but rewarded by his curiosity he was met by nothing else but the realization that it was a craned-back then down neck, that entered a giant fishing-like supply-for keeping them in giant box, a cubic-chiseled body, that was filled with many lumps of fat-filled-throat-like lumps of pudding-like deformations in which the neck stirred and shook as if it had been a spoon, holding back. Which, as it finally revealed, slowly climbing what could only be believed to be several levels of some unnatural, barely accountable, layers of hardened-lump filled mist, the dreadful ‘claw’, which bore the second great bulk at the back of its body, where all the pipe-like spears of shrapnel-coddled bone-formed chunks of meaty-tenderness drew out of, whereas the three great legs that formed the talons merely revealed themselves to be worm-like, both in appearance as well as in their well-presented mannerisms. It looked like a miniature fortress, or some battering ram that held itself up-front, eerily working its four great ‘mandibles’ as if to scan around the air for even the least wretched of elements that could cast a man out of the vileness of the maze that was the lower abyss. It left no hope for him yet to come as to arrive. No more than a motion had him shade his eyes with the palm of his hands upon being met by these forever moving, back and forth lumps that were shot on and off, like a syringe withdrawn, then allowed to grasp as much blood as it could possibly drawn before being empties again in the same being. Slowly, then fast, then quick, then stopped, then resumed, as if it was pumping something through those things, but it was too much. It cackled and laughed and marred and almost disappeared into that mist of vapors and of steam that had almost taken the very good life out of him, since he could not receive but a second filter, other than the one he had on him now!

So many filters, all shaped like pills; shoved by the side of his head, turning his brain into some vaporous liquid.

‘If I’m shot, I could lose it all, you know?’

‘I bear no gun on me, nor any other kind of similar device!’

‘You’re quite tall for a beast, are you not?’

‘By far I’m more civilized than you’re ever going to be, and now. I would perish I were to leave my parish, especially after working on it for so long.

Am I of some disturbance that’s been brought onto your mind?’

‘It’s bothersome, the noise mainly, I cannot listen for it for too long, without, you must understand why I find it this way. It’s insufferable, for my ears.’

‘Disable them then!’

He was silent, but it was a simply joke he failed to grasp the straws out of. It would’ve been far beneath him to concede, and even worse than it. For someone like him to be silent for this long; there was a nuance to it no man had ever considered dealing with.

It would be infantile to think the room he had been kicked out of as something not belonging to some vile slot. As in, there was a reason this ejection carried on without him, even though he could hardly understand why there were still things unspoken of, whenever his mouth seemed to open, then doubt trailing in, with the wriggling touch of some nasty tail curdled and entangled as it continued sitting down; resting meekly, gone.

A room of stone that was still somehow, left with most if not all its structural integrity as something that could barely be chirped in, barely be touched and worst of all, there was no certainty as to who was behind all that was being thrust around, the sound of every missile hitting the plain-field shattered into shards mirror, that was cast out.

There are only a few things that could easily be distinguishable from the equation that had given birth to this magnificent spectrum of little unfathomable entities that were come along during the first breaking of the tablet, during the time of woe, being known as nothing else but humanity’s last hope to escape the unfathomable gull.

A rubbery thing, akin to some kind of elongated sea-cucumber filled with fat, bursting out, some leviathan filled with puff, sticking out of him like some disgusting forest-muscle, oozing out of him at times. Beaked in the front but overextending, a few pseudo tiny legs beneath him, dabbling in the air, with two shaft-like wings of almost iron-needle rack-protrusions coming out its back as well. A single fluid filled bulb coming out its side, a hellish world in front of him, like a constantly moving slit of airs, or long spears of wind shooting from up-front, coming from some elongated frontier; worms of gusts, winter’s storm, a frost distorted cone with the tip being made the horizon, towards which the beast was reared to. Every living thing that passed, a see-through tapeworm nearing and closing by its side, as it would lodge and wriggle then come around again. But the beast would not move, yet.

A bridge lay by its side, connected to its gut, an extended thing made out of four great retractable plates; like an armadillo-chitinous yet held as well within the grasp of the outpost, inside of which, most tenebrously dark creatures without arms or feet, tall but faces by falling apart masks, coming out of their radiator-shaped building, with a tail-like form, but outwardly, from outside, looking like some abandoned cave, of the outside of a cavernoids; from that point on, a carpet of disease but stretching, the land obscured by the storm, and a single thing, wretched.

It brought the four great pillars out, four tall-standing beacons of light, fluid-filled, shaped-like sticky old German Grenades, with one cylinder of neon-shining red and blue, bastardly the light shot all the way around, then back, to a sight's end hue, held by pylons sticking out of the ground; and not a single soul but calling out for help, while the hellish terrain continued resurfacing. A dreaded thing, at the bottom of the ravine; a prison dwelling in secret and but a single man taken within the stretch.

'I suppose there's only one man still down there is there not?

The camp is filled with so many broken machines that it would be a pain trying to get to all of them, one by one!'

Distant:

'We shall not be abandoned by him yet; not, not, no, he has not forsaken us; I know it to be true.

It's only a hindrance, an insignificant hindrance to the greater scheme of things, the greatest of dark surroundings thinned, the pieces of this mosaic broken down one by one, burnt with the rest of the room, then thrown against the pitiful remains that betoken a slither of a crown, or something of the ill, the men that came inside, sinned and that's a sign of this town still being under the filthy influence of tenebrous-Yobl, a disease that shall spread throughout the city soon enough. A disease that shall eventually open up the gates of terror that they might soon enough be relived and gone!'

'Then what are we to do if that's the case?'

'Try summoning him again, for we cannot see without him, nor learn. We cannot extract the knowledge without that head off the side of the floor, our minds will perish by noon, or worsened out. He's hiding! He must!'

Somewhere in this city, that blasted raised bump, that slithering little blob of an empty face- bearing its tendons out by crawling worms, inside his fluid-filled back withheld. A spine or a rack of metal, upon which a chiseled humanoid torso, bone-cartilage almost made, with a metal flat bar-like a ruler holding two jointed globular bulbs at each end. Counting, measuring, standing like a mannequin; a single head but featureless if not for the one moving eye that records everything; although they're both distant from one another, unconnected, they're a single being. Although he may appear no more than the size of a human, that face, that empty face of an almost cut-off a skull gelatin. They move. Like worms inside that fluid bag, across his forehead, thinned by time, connecting with each puckery garlic-shaped growth, then moving around.

‘I swear I saw it still outside, one night, one dreadful night it appeared out there, both physical embodiments, and out of that head, out of that perfectly chiseled featureless raised off the ground oval, I saw them. The worms rose like power-line cords, connected to some fleshy things in carried off like balloons, drawing everything back its mind, but cruel. It’s cruel that one would tease me as much, as to take away my ability which it merged every see through, every see through animal! Every beast its contorted and twisted mind, as it changed in color, only to taunt me still while I sat there wretchedly, with naught else but my putrid lack of. Blind, I was blind as to think I would stand a chance living without it while it records.

Everything the eyes sees across this world; all that I’ve been missing since I’ve been but cut off from the source. Everything that’s been contorted by naught else, but the coils that ate, off the other end, off those disgusting things that entered them; he’d yearn for human thought. His one eye would recognize the people I’ve grown most fond of, and the mind would oblige. Wriggling in flight, entered through them as to establish some connection or order to feast on them in order to learn their likes; yet I know, I’ve been let known of something that I’ve checked.

My blood is within his reach, for in each globe, it reeks of clot, of slimy puffs of red clot struck down from where I stood, at last, made known that my time was being filthily recorded. Each drop counted by that damned blasted line of ruler.’

‘I swear to god all mighty that you’ve gone insane, have you not? You villainous cowardly thing, you insolent insane retrieve of the lost; can’t you see that your mind’s struck by a dead end from which you may not return and that this thing is nothing more but the embodiment of your mind being torn apart by age, by disease, by treason, since?’

Not a single soul wanted to speak of it yet, or of the growths, the ones that followed through, his martyrs that searched for similar beings, to bring in yet of worship, oft, and there came the quiet after.

‘I need you to see some sense, of course you’re touched in the head, alarmingly so; I would not be endowed to think it otherwise, what I can clearly see it as clear as day, in front of my eyes, but I ask of this, my friend, see some sense. Sleep on it, at least, I beg of you!’

‘Not yet.’

He cast away a glance upon the whole. What he could remember when he was thrust back into that evil pass of yellow stone, broken apart, molded as by twists of spins, spindles and of evil winds, between two great faces without mandibles, drooping lowly on top a single well.

A beacon like a bulbic pill held by a black pole crashing through its head; glowing with a shiny bright light, the bulb did; as it entered the humanoid jackal-faced stony ‘rib’ of cracks, carved or otherwise, an empty eye of stone entered a black socket-made out of a whole, through which wind still kept lodging in and out. The well was powdery and had a tar of empty blood sticking out of it, coming as if drafted, then taken apart. From its bowels a tall-tar coated humanoid came. Sunken and drifted from reality, then winned; the spires of bone, the trenches of stone, all fallen apart. But it was him whose gift redeemed him from the life of quiet.

Slugs of pyramidical flat centipede bridges made of bone, with every plate being shaped, akin to some scale, but hollow, every now and then, holes like sockets, holes like pursing lips, hollow on the insides, but horned, every few 'rib', with pseudo-bone antlers of sticky red. Before the realization came on, he had failed to see that this was no mountain but a graveyard of bone. But not real bone either, but something much fleshier, something in-between the two of them, much uglier, nastier, spread around, sometimes squiggling, squirming back from death. The long-faced jackal laughed at them!

A bottle of steam was delivered from one of the dark pouches.

'You are unnerved for some reason, no?'

'I believe you've implanted something in it!'

The murder that was committed two nights ago in the foyer. Red carpet standing on four men, an oblong hat-tent they cast shade on a dirty-rotten floor!

Rat-skull the diameter of large boots in size and girth, conjoined to the Vaseline-rubbed with lower worming mouths that were twisted- yet set by the side of hinging people that crawled with their heads kept-up high above the ground level, down, beneath them, a floor made out of twins and twinges, and twenty other pouting creatures pouring down their lard-filled scrumptious bodies, or, at the very least the ones that could not help themselves but drawl in with their elongated jaws, mammoth figures of eighteen hundred meters or so, constantly forming cracks in the floor; holes, pits and other feats of the uncanny. Figures of disease and distress, black-of-taw, empty birds ripped apart, and their cowering thunder-like domed protrusions call-n-call, one of the telephones rang.

'One of us will have to eventually crawl the same way we came from and find out whether or not there's someone on the other side of the line!'

'Don't count on me brother, I'm afraid I'm all too spent, and you know what they do to people like me when they answer the clamor of the dissect!'

'He could be torn apart where he stands and shout off the top of his long, leeway, leeway, I seek leeway that I may be free! Quench this disease that's been injected into me!'

His borealis of cells, the clusters interested by the tall machine-like mosquito bearing many filled-with-liquid syringe wells, of meaty substances and of the most disgustingly deformed, most obtrusive of all forms, most unfathomably dark and the wretchedly hallow, disgustingly shocked, sprawl of numb. He would be taken by their hooks and claws, the apparitions of the many see-through almost maggot-like invisible fluid bearing mixing bottles-raw; would be the substance infiltrating, disseminating the humanoid substance, slowly, from the lordly set, and loft embraced and cowardly war of heads, erect. All set in flight to chew at him, in terms of light. Tall like rods, and simple sacks of 'grains' or 'sand' wrapped around and filled with liquefied rum inside, but floated, breath, of mighty led, inserted from another end, would come to be, almost side-long erected, almost, completely so, ejected by its mighty golden-brass spear head curved up-front, like some eerily propelled tail, a scorpion readying itself to strike as well, at any moment at the womb, the many legs beneath it, crude. Made out of pieces that didn't fit; they already sent the man, and the creature was already wrapped around him, past the carpet, craning in a neck, readying itself to strike, on a trifle more, dissected now. But never to deep as to inject the toxin, just a thought:

'It's waiting for you to pick up that receiver! Don't give it the satisfaction!'

It's a cruel thing, leaving a man unwatched without taking something away from him.

'I'm going to have to ask you to leave.'

'I can't hear you.'

'I said. Give me a moment, I'm going to try getting a bit closer to you!'

'It breeds inside of you and will devour everything if allowed to continue on its path undisturbed!'

'Unfortunately I cannot oppose its override.'

They were pointedly staring at the sea yet not a man said a word while under the influence of the alcoholics beneath the deck. Bottles all up; and had their clearly opened caps retorted another leap, they would've most assuredly penetrated through the thickness of the mast until finally toppled over, the attention of the eyeing tower would've pointed at them in a most benighted manner. Its squid-like appearance cast an ink-y shade upon its entire frame. It appeared as if even their very ship had been coated in the same substance they themselves were made out, soon found out after but only after being bothered to check upon themselves, yet, there was another circumstance that needed be spoken of. AN alleviation of; a tenacious shade appeared before them. Rang three knocks on the wood and appeared.

'I would think you inquired of me for this, no?'

'Unless stated otherwise, I don't think there's going to be a process out of which you'll get to flee from!'

'The pyramid's starting to shake, isn't it?'

'About god damn time, ain't it? I fancy it would, seeing how it's been disrobed of its proper standing.'

'They could fall off it at any time, I wager and when it happens, I yearn to grab a basket and start picking them off the ground like the spoils of war they're supposed to be, when the nun's song reached the end of the line and when release's come right after, knowing!'

'But you flood the hour with such petty things that I would require you no lesser known to them delivered; whereas they would be cruel enough to slither and slice!'

'Will they? I received news from the secret lords I've subscribe to; my worship may be incomplete, but that which had been known to me lends as little after.'

'I won't have you falter and start going into circles again, Isahcv. You've been deceived before by such austere acts of treason that I would humbly inquire of a bothersome needle's pin to have withdrawn from the confines of your broken arm, just so it would be settled, by some means I would require you to look around and tell me what you see!’

‘Its aura!’

‘The pyramid’s been producing it for a while now, has it not?’

‘I force the suture of the nails with my arms!’

‘Blind you still are, like a pagan’s heathen’s stomp of many trunks, the board of wood is speaking.’

‘I’ve a few guns.’

It said; for they had rested them on its surface, the facet of fine-craftsmanship, placed order, custom-ly designed for them alone; and delivered on Monday, when they were still thinking how they might go about their plans while walking in circles, so-much-so that it was unknown to them whether or not there was a slither of a chance to get away clean-handed, without suffering defeat, their ears being struck and strung, incapable of seeing, niggardly.

A bunch of niggers lynched by dead-rooks, flung by gusts of blime and scum-air; on a plainness-spread and speared through the mold that formed from ships of glares; nigger, nigger, nigger, another nigger, here and there; so many dead-niggers, many niggers killed, all fair. But these animals had been brought here by force, from the realm of man, from their plains, to here, where they did not belong. Nor would one think otherwise of what had been happening to him, to yearn for the release of non-suffering. Alive; they still were, steam-vets were firmly placed but flat as lid, almost invisible for the human eye unless one knew what to look after. So many protrusions came out of them, feeding the nigger-corpses life. They would live, for now. Otherwise, the entirety of the land was completely filled with their roots, and no longer was there a boot to stomp onto them, cajoled, of hoot.

‘We’ve reached an understanding, have we not?’

‘Not just yet, I’ve come in terms with having walked in this dead man’s shoes for forty miles and what I can say is that I don’t know what’s going on in there or why they’re rotting.’

‘You’re sober. Shall we ride towards it or shall we perish in the Opsice?’

‘We shall perish there.’

Taken by force within the minutes, they were dragged in, waiting, though their arms ripped; tipped on their toes; wildly on their feet.

‘May we speak with one, the one behind you?’

‘No man is allowed to speak of ill.’

‘But I haven’t.’

‘No man.’

No waiting line.

Other place, fifteen hundred miles away from sight; an open-door lead to a hillish-raised un-hikeable area that prevented access to the other side of the room; some strange men entered, all dressed in choir-clothes; with dark painted faces, large up-front cultish robes.

‘There’s a few pills on the counter. In case you were wondering, I won’t be able to pick up your call during the next five or so hours; feel free to try anytime sooner in my apartment. Invite yourself in!’

He died. But his corpse was carried by a few contractors that lived with her, in her apartment, over the last twenty or so years, forty six of them, in one room; always awake.

‘Where do we place the dead man?’

‘Anyway, at any moment in time, it won’t matter whether or not she succeeds; she’ll die soon enough without being remembered. All of her living relatives are.’

They stopped, some steam started puffing out of every corner of the room, disabling them as they fell to pieces, as if disemboweled, dismembered on sight, then forced to crawl along in whichever direction they could be seen drowsing in and out. A shirland of ire, for her; ever since she returned empty-handed with not a single way to check her watch, again she looked at her wrist and spat, a singular spool that cut off what was left of her arm. Then the woman knelt. In all three, chewing on her arm, then rolling off one side to the other, on the carpet, where she released the loathsome stress that had entered her; out of the work-compactor. It’s been a long day and the constraints of bleeding clotted into a tower-figure coagulation that’s become; she looked at it, a sword-rapier oblong of clot, that pointed at the lack of a ceiling, the dark sky; whereas only three stars and a mouth-formed moon could be seen, one eye singling her out as she tarried, as she’d been.

‘A man’s at the door, answer.’

‘Who said that?’

‘I wouldn’t recommend you stopped or slowed down, they’re known to fill each other’s blunderbusses and fire away!’

‘There’s a season for that.’

Another one?

Fifteen houses robbed in the same night, all of these nasty robberies done by hanged dead men that never stepped out of their houses either, nor were they aware of what was going on around them, being in a state of constant immolation that entered their souls, bodies and the many holes they were riddled with. Such concordance with the accord of stars shunned the evil men whom were nakedly numb to what was happening to their bodies during the torture of the fallen-together priori, of the contemplation blinding pesticide, the decide that followed soon enough after being something that traumatized every single one of them in turned upon slithering surprise.

‘A wall of some petrified matter, I never thought it would be possible to see one in full growth!’

‘Are you Serge?’

‘I am; I’m certainly sorry for asking, but would you mind telling me where exactly I am?’

‘You’re beneath one of the pyramids, near one of the many cores beneath the earth; one of them, the ones that fallen, decayed and became a towering oblong of oblongs, the tombstone above the graves, the death of all poets, near the twitching of the mazes of corpses, now en-crops’ put inside of, grown to bitter led!’

‘An awful thing of such countenance as wilt it with-had!’

An unkind cruelty appeased no man whenever done out of anger or by simply being struck by a gesture he would by normal means find somewhat unappealing both to him as to his personage. The unappealing culprit belonging to some rather petty solace could only add to the frustration felt upon being met by an adversary of no worth that would encumber him with the little time he’s much endowed with. In the meantime, while beneficiary to have feigned repel, by cruel crudity withheld, for, why would a man feel cold if he was to wait for hours beneath, beyond and near a heather that would herd his likes to hear and retreat through the near-ends to which he, the distant man, unappeased by what’s been happening could not ender delaying a second more since cast away by lightning it could not work, rather than starve alone, entered upon a home where no other woman lay but that which he took for himself ever-after; a maker of children, her only task yonder. A superimposed image floated around them. A second knock appeared to be twitching, long withdrawn.

‘Ma’am, your coffee; your flimsy loaf of bread, the second head of the redeemer, and the stupid friends, all on a plate, dead; as you’ve ordered.’

‘Yes; I thought this would be it, and I think there’s something truly unruly about how they started working out against the Favor.’

‘As you say ma’am, you’re the boss!’

‘Indeed I am, and with that said, I.’

Another agent sniped her out; fifteen hundred thousand eighteen-fourteen miles from where she stood, shot clean-off; with the entirety of the table being taken with her. What remained of her lower-sided body, which hadn’t been eaten like the waiter by the crater left behind by the shot, in the outskirts of the withdrawn peons-like workers, with their heads lowered down; between the two fountains and the hedges; crawling off the rear-guard, a single demonical humanoid of one piece with many flails for arms; flung himself mile for mile, with a body see-through ‘fmri’ made out of many brain-goo-bile, that appeared to swim inside him, this basin.

‘Allow me not to!’

It was a clean shot but not endowed as to be contained without its such-forlorn to be named, consequences that followed soon enough. The neon-signs only came out of their hiding whenever there was a reason to. There were plenty of men with well thought out and carried on behavior as to not be left behind, since they chucked a few of their young inside the crater in order to feed it. For it had to be fed.

‘Heat death is coming soon enough.’

‘How can you be so sure of it? It’s only been a few hours now, since they started playing with the control rings.’

‘The ship’s going to land either way, regardless how you look at it and know this Reign, there’s not a single thing either of us can do about it. Since it’s about to land-crash into one of the fallen comets. We’re to be delivered in one of the lesser guts where we shall lay for a while; mounting some of the rotten core-rooms while we ride them out.’

‘Who told you that?’

A plump one of meat, a pillar-cylinder walking on three other meaty bags; grayish and deformed but their lord nonetheless, called.

‘I require no less and no greater wreathe than there is!’

‘You, you, blasphemous villain of no less melancholy withdrawn?’

‘I am the one who ordered all of you to approach when I called. Make way.’

He set the trajectory again as to fasten up the crash, the process that would deliver them into that land, with or without their wont, whatever it was, and whoever would call, not a slither at all of knowledge would make way.’

Large deformed horsish figures of molten yellow, sluggish lay; mocking bastardly as they fancied their wreathe and stay; mounted in the room and echoed to the pinned:

‘We shall feed it some of our crewmen if that’s what it desires still!’

But there was no feasible way they could contemplate trying, or ever so growing near one of the brought in woes that would allow one to assume there was a shimmer of a chance to endear a second more’s respite, as to fully endow them wait. Refuge was impermanent, and it was only way overly pious to assume there was even a slight chance to hope there would be even a slough of a moment they could wait and endure through the rain that followed soon after. Although uncanny a place as it were, placated in a most mysterious endearment such as the likes of whose, no one could understand if they were in their place. A sickening tone had set a flimsily excavated out of their rocky souls, shattered by an engrossing pillar of growths that fell upon their blighted faces. Red tapered their whitish pale. Night had in the meantime come as a rapier would, taking away even the slightest hints of there ever being a chance to endure a harder awaited for despair. Hours passed. Candles unlit, their barely made encampment had but a single piece of truth being lodged into their arms. A brothel of hay, but not a single soul to stray through one of the many tunnels that had been flooded rightly after the passing of midnight’s first gloom. As desperate as they were, as uncannily forlorn as one would abhor no one but the slightest hint; a scent of gelatin covering their pores but not a single soul understood what that meant anymore. For what was pondered upon an awakening, one of the men decided to traverse the wail of a hundred voices equally distanced by the crackling of a splinter, a hindered, yet vague, a malformation of many lain-once roads that came into the air, only for him to climb onto.

‘Salvation, I’m being lead to freedom by a higher power!’

But what of the others; he thought!? There was no telling whether or not the permanency would last as long as to allow a trim way back and come around, let alone the added weight, with the least of a mention fleeing towards his savior, whoever that might be deemed to be. His reckoning was largely at hand. A sleigh of hand would be enough, just to rob it off a few of its reigns over him. A servile look to it, which only brought to him some alarm once done considering. Stacked like stones, fleshy stones, connected, tiling each other by fusing through their chitin; entering, albeit by means of such a dissipating incuntenance that one would find it rather insulting to be in the presence of the fascia moratorium it had so nearly beckoned itself to slowly become a part of. Teeth began forming as of yet, right as his sight brought some perdition, taken by a lonely glance, during his withhold of breathing that had yet to be received; he was taken back by his sudden impulse to rise and meet it at a level at which he would not feel as if he were a little boy staring at a poster of some high-mountains after his dad bought it for him, during Christmas.

Yet there were no words that could possibly more demean the detrimental state he was in, other than what had lapidated the facelessness, shamelessly so; that he expressed once he climbed the first of the 'steps'.

Not that there'd be a chance to begin any time sooner now, that's been the lord and the leprous sign of the resin that's been ever-so drawing near one of the apparent, most perilously distraught, countenance withdrawn after the somber cast of evil's due, ever-there after brought onto the sight of the land that followed soon after. There would be no shame that would do. Nor any grasp of breath as to follow the sinew that was allowed to wallow in place and dance around, as if stranded by some cast-away and unnecessary glance of many reels and peals the fallen apart kingdom had allowed wallowing in ruin to begin with.

'Of stretched of ruin I would rather have known less than what is felt now during the flooding of disease-distress, and the coming of the long hour's span, treacherous as it may be, I feel only the slither come onto me, good man, good old man, tell me, sage of ancient worth, whose come onto the area had only allowed for some march to have itself tilled with flowery provoke; I see the lichens grown on top, your hat, your harp, your glorious trap, only a farmer's dark embrace if he had had enough, I to tilt such grasp, turning upon a disease made in the contrast of the epoch's wonder, wont of what's come after, to have them sail away, and stretch for the hour's play, I could see no reason as to feel disjointed, therefore, somber as my glance foretells, I seek only reason to have such remains, as I could have. Show me the likens of a world distraught and I shall feel no reason as to fear, or fret, the reason behind my agony's dark embrace is still but something that cannot, farce, I call upon the clamor that I see at last! You're no man, but a straw-filled crow-retriever left for men of little to no mind!

Such disgrace as has been felt along, such a thing of little contemplation that I'm met by, I could've forced myself upon such retrieve. If I had still the will to live; I might've cast you away. But I refrain and I've yet to seek reason to endure. Endear what you might, I might fashion such alike!'

And likens to the abode that followed soon after, for such entranced was the straw that had wormed itself therefore yonder, in every spool and pool that formed the corn. For ever there had been such bore as he had felt upon, be met, and such entrenchments of mighty dead were come to him that he had to pause for a moment, in rod contemplate; introduce to such withheld, and speak to them in tongues only he knew of, and therefore said:

‘I am the Hyerigh der Herring, come from a kingdom that’s not been besieged but fallen ill of mindless thin. For wretched were supplied by winter; stole! They might’ve held a reason to provoke such reason as I might forlorn but trench-appease!’

Such a thing could not easily be met without having to reapprove a second step towards each and nastily forlorn, coveted in, and such-and forth; direction as it wilt itself to had been had. There was no reason not to seethe for long, or as, and such endure a second wait, past the treacherous passage that had been wilt into the livingness of such allure.

‘Hearer, hearer, of harsher things that would’ve stung. I seek but an answer, as I’m wilt to be still alive!’

‘What will you question us about if such’s the case? You seek but troublesome allure, for such swindle’s come from ever-mourn, and torn aside and torn asunder cast but seek and therefore after. But we shall see no such travail while undergone, and therefore rung as the bells are to be done, we shall seek naught to be called after you, but contemplate as much as needed, therefore dead. Every one that’s followed in your path, every single mournful one, that ever so much considered it to be thought. It’s but a vale of never-wont of bliss, and therefore to have come to peace, it means but little, therefore miss! Miss and lopsidedly come to pass, for you have never stood a chance to comprehend what’s come onto our kingdom or wretchedly begot!’

‘Then I shall find out for myself!’” Though Hyerigh, for he had little will and timed bliss, to lose upon such dark reprise, to have been called upon the hour’s show, of rain that was to come thereafter, of little more than he’d expect, of what was wont, it worn him out as of yet. But there was, as such, no reason to forget, or mighty as it were, just yet; to understand what the flames of the abyss that burned the sky into a pallid thing with mourned up, worthless tongues, that licked each other; bleeding still, and had him stay of timeless heave!’

‘Seek no wonder that’s been cast and I will such endear nothing bade, alas. I’ve seen no reason prior to discern, what I’ve been keeping hidden from all of you, but neither man would know just yet, If I could have it, all to myself, for a moment’s largely pale for a man such as will have wilt himself prevail over all whose countenance was to be under-seen. Disjointed by the many allures and the marvels of this world’s that have ever been, I am not in the mood of seek, therefore after, as I have wilt myself theremuch stronger, I have done something that neither of you, foul lecherous things could ever had a wont to think of!’

And they were sluggish, falling apart, boisterous bodies that were eaten and torn by cart, trough and wont of fight, to have endured a second more and poured into each one’s body a single unnatural wont obscure. Large wings of tar with arms, lodged into them, like cricket legs but entered through their ribs and come apart, they crawled upon fifteen feet each or more. And their heads were elongations that had hundreds of false ones they had crafted of throat-skin and tricked the eaters that would have them faceless as to skin no more!

But he was too pure for them as for this world, it was something that would only endear to be absolved of all crimes that were not told. And they were many, but he was pure. And they were worshipped by the cult of criminals; but he was pure. Hiding away each sin; on a plate of such resin that he blossomed, while they were cast. No man is innocent after all!

A wicked coliseum:

Unnatural depths:

A reservoir apparatus appeared to be way too clumsy, yet dehydrated by the likes of moist-organic. An organism fed on the heat that was being produced by it. Closely observing it, slapping around, the door interrupted it, or more precisely so, the slamming sound that its resonance appeared to be producing on account of it being no longer of any noticeable importance to beseech a moment more of such intrusion, or introspection being added to the siphon. A soundless whisper bounced against each wall, trying itself in and on, before long gone, entered a tall; barely kept in place but numbed from all the added pieces he had stolen from the dead men. Many of them still singing yet could not shut up their mouths since death had only so much to say during their plight. Such eerily distraught delight; bore in:

‘I am perched, may I come in?’

It didn’t respond back; yet there were things that couldn’t be easily perceived, not as long as there was still something as poisoned as the vexed air. The filaments that weren’t there, the mold that grew on pucker, where? No soundless whisper and no dimpled apparition to announce him in. Nothing that would bring in a need, to counterfeit such endeavors; but John, Trunk, John Trunk; he was there, the butcher dead, carried on his back like a bunch of brambles, how he was cut; a marvel for a black eye that only blinked whenever died a man, and thereof said; as little as one could only be aware of:

‘Say, have I not met you somewhere, my man?’

‘I am jointed to Gibbon Gibraltar; that is all, but you knew that already, have you not heard of it, yet?’

‘Of what now?’

‘Such a deprecatory thing; one would only allude to it under close scrutiny come from someone he’s put his vile trust in without even daring to drear some form or another of comfort-stolen woe, or be alarmed when all that he had been fighting for turned out to be only a part of what he knew the likings of before all’s falling apart’s come onto the end he had expected from the very ill-dreaded thought for countless hours and for intervals of four to three hours at the time with pauses in-between made of even more intervals of several hours each without having to endure the alarming nature of the unnecessary disgust one could only feel whenever there’s a man of a similar ilk alike to him trying to change his perdition’s cast away first or second foremost forecast of a thought exchange, that might behave, or liken itself to someone that might refrain from having rekindled that reminiscence of something he considered a longer time ago but was nigh-forgotten, at the tip of the tongue, by over-thought while ruminating for countless hours, something he shouldn’t have; I think such people, your company included are similar to I, I would think there’s a Blessed-kindly by men-unlike us, of fine-coming in short regard to their kin as well as their riche’s, not in mortal silk but in a fine accountful appeal I would dread no less as for it to be impressed onto you; since I felt myself eerily distraught for the longest time I ever knew myself for; for that, I think I shone what light there was into your blessed eyes no more than needed in order to have you still on my side, dear friend!’

‘If I may intervene a little!’

A shaking, above them, but it was hardly felt! A seed of destruction had been planted long before life’s trifling abode had a share fill of what had been happening in the dark recesses of the first and the last of life’s empty broken solace.

Their eyes were of an emboldened stare that allowed each pearl to queerly stay their wavering eeriness before slightly fading back into their original position, which was in part something of a sad oration.

A sad kingdom

‘Resting forth, no more than let’s say, fifty miles off the road; you’ll find it.’

The macabre crooked stone-star sitting on a leg, not too far off he said! A rose of stone at the end of its left spearing crest, six coned, with the top being spines by smaller ones, an almost deformed chiselled face with crooked teeth in the middle, fleshy but butterfly-akin to, as it wriggled, it appeared less made of stone and more likely of some hardened chitinous pore or sponge that survived this long only to be shown to no one but themselves. Holding it in secret now; as the many twists and crevices of skin, the lumps that were like shells and the other bones-human giant yet belonging to, shoving themselves out, with the rest upon the heap it made; since that’s how it fed the other men.

‘Have I known you before, dear friend? Perhaps in some other lifetime I wasn’t ever aware of existing or there being one at all?’

‘Not that I could tell, dear fellow, but say. I’ve just arrived. I’ve yet to enter the confidence. May I?’

‘Nay, first enter the tavern and sleep for the night. Here, lain, a robe, that might remain, upon you, now flail, and flee and go away!’

With which there was no opposite direction that could be taken by him, nor melancholy to his heart that would allow him a say that might still this being driven away by the man he had barely met yet had no other intention of making it as if he’d feign a dignified retreat, only to devolve into such run as would have one taken for benumbed, then not-seen after, come around within the hour only to join some other group since they were clustered in fours or thirds, or sometimes seventeen, gathered either around some tent-area of some peculiar phials of bottled vents, of steam that looked at the world as if they were turned around, but mourned since they knew that the lower side of the planet was rotten, as all would keep in mind, every man come to life being aware of this state of, there being millions of see-through humanoid figures left behind as green mould would only rot the ground and the bodies partially eaten by the ravenous worms that fed on them, leaving them to be had, as no one would have it so, ever-seen, alas. There was no wonder to be told and nothing as worthless than the pudgy blob that floated there, who whispered in their eyes at night, of the progress of this disease, since there see-through transparent things were something called spherical-oblongoid amoebas that took the shape of the beings hanging at the top of the food chain, only to endear such a thing as one might see or thing of, thereof forget of the forged sea of scum and of metal numb, rum filled the slum and they sat together, the four inside the chamber, with a drink of the lot; with the owner himself bobbling an eye as the man dressed the robe and crabbed, down with the dogs.

‘These hounds, you know, they’re not to be trusted. I advise you not to.’

Weird

‘I do not understand, yet I am confused but intrigued, as the demon that is half my face is drinking out of a friend of mine’s head who is open, his chest being a rocker filled with basket shaped people whose arms began communicating with the knives that are in charge of our current climate’s economy, the Presidency serving as a barring, pole, that is starting to show signs of chemical independency, as to signal the termination of the final, past the Finnish line, mongoloids, end-in sight, there is, finally, one, that’s been at large completely distinguished as to say, from the other unfathomably hard to determine the right of his cell’s right of self-determination, being applied to multicelular organisms; therefore his drug abuse is over, or so say the Political opponents of the Opposition.’

‘My sister, you are the light of my day, during nights, the bulb on the street lamps, when the sun’s a funnel of dying shots, I went to war for you, and lost an eye, laboriously working through camps that would’ve had me carry sacks of sand and grit and nigger feet all day long. My nails are painted and they’re tombstones; as I had to dig the very graves of my fellow veterans, part of them’s still in me. I smell of rum, despite quitting, as I am haunted by the sins of the past that are trying to make me grab them, that I may become a repository of souls, that will make me waste my nights away. I am a machine, but broken, here, where I point, against my chest, a piston that’s slowed down. I’ve died many times before, but for the past few months, you’ve made me feel more alive than I’ve ever felt before, brushing the sides of your head against my puffiness of child-beard, grown, through adolescence, for you, an adult, as it ended up not being war that turned me into a man, but, your compassionate tenderness of heartfelt empathic sympathy-driven kindness that’s been shown, to me, when I was in most need of receiving it from you, a woman-female, filled with warmth-full compassion. There’s a hole in my chest bleeding ceramics, but of ancient paintings, historically speaking, depictions being bastardized into the liquid that’s been made of them, as two Eras that’ve been forced to drift apart now seem to regain momentum as they’re come out of me and set on a path away towards vengeful redemption as to destroy part of the sewage system in which the crude bank-rats have been living for a while now, trying to subvert. We are a soul, together, the tow of us, the people, of this world, we make them, Adam and Eve, in every single other man and woman there is, like us, we are, and in turn they are part of us, as we cherish their company, ours, because we made them. I’ve walked plenty of miles so far, and my feet are weary, although, despite that, sitting here with you, maiden ended up being more exhausting than anything I’ve ever felt in my entire life, though I am bothered by the weather, since it was spikes, the clouds that is; they’re spikes and appear to be homing towards my elongated fat-thick the width of a barrel shaped missile-with four faces on every side, face of my is tingling at the expectation of being killed. I’m suicidal, haven’t you realized it yet? I’m the mad-man buffoon, the killer, I’m insane, I’m dead but revived again, come home, but greeted by none, and followed around, the culprit I am, terrorist of words, they smear me, ‘da’ killa’, nigga’, I don’t know where I am or what I am here for, on this spot, yet, you’re still paying your mortgage and I've decided that I'm about to give you that lone and fund you've been after for this long, lady.'

He was furious, ayayayayayayayahuuuuuhuhuhuhuhuhuhuhuhuaaa-aa-aa-aiuiuiuiuiuiuiuiui-oio-oioo-oiooooo-ayayayayyayayayayayayayayay-huhuuhuhuhuhuhuhuhuhuh-A.

But stacked, with guns, and armament beyond the; eleven hundred thousand neurons shot in his head, while they activated, when he was talking. It was noon, after all, and the sun was trying to step inside the planet, although it was made of skin, as usual.

The woman he was talking to, was cardboard, made of cardboard, but was painted nicely.

Virulent-eater strapped, to a most macabre-staring back defiled, stela of barely banded yet decrepit pus-warted waxesque people whose heads were connected like fuses, all of whom came along, and started beating one another in the pig den, some of them bearing guns and rifles and long-distanced shooters with nigger-head-shaped boxing gloves, fast-twitch-muscling one another to death as they would simply run through each other's chests, come-along, fancifully striking each other down before coming back up. Followed around by, constantly, beneath a shroud of heartfeltnesses, followed soon after by the falling of red-rose but filled with green-covered-in-soil spines, with little corkscrew pigs' tail wrapped around earrings hidden pearl in the oyster, with a bouquet of moving eyes in which cadaverous remains swam inside of, which were all the size of six point eight tall sturdy men, borderline, some of them, suffering of gigantism that drew out of their graves as if they had been simply reanimated from the dead, to join in the slobbering of fists and the punch-in' that happened soon enough.

But before they could punch their jaws and their intestines out of their bodies with the mere flicker of their wrists and what not; one of the more docile ones crawled along like niggers during one of their vicious out-bursts over nothing, whereas their chimp-around-niggardliness could be seen as over-postulating the meddlesome way in which they carry themselves during their hunt-for-rape, that spruced over their incapability of self-control.

An insignificant amount of uncanny puddles started popping off out of nowhere, incapable of discerning one another from the people they surrounded themselves with. A holocaust-nigger killer with little kike-mongrels wearing nigger-skin with nigger-fluff on top their Dryffus affair- initials embed hell's cycle's embed broadly-bloody bone-thin vests. With wings by their sides, but rotten dark and tawny lynch, the nigger-like slaves that followed in the fuck-ground crate-trunk burst were brought to the small apartment where they began bloodying their polished hands in order to work on a man they've never seen or interacted with before, already caught in an attempt to slip his brother-open, the corpse-kike mongrels, that were split head-ripe then spread, on the ground, opened their beaks and yelled aloud:

‘Another filthy –dead nigger’s been brought on top of our plate, we have to kill it quick before it decides to open its eyes fully awake again, you know what they’re like, don’t you, morbid one?’

Fels-Fuel knew all too bitterly what it felt like, having felt it on his own skin as well, trying not to make too much of a scene, especially since the rooms were filled with their bunches, although unseen. By the side of the wall, swimming in access-acre- frames put together now, by tinny-tiny zits of barb, it only shocked the toucher's bent-forth arch if that was the case.

‘I will hold a sermon for those we’ve lost.’

‘When did you come in AJ-can?’

‘You’ve not heard my entrance yet?’

How could a man whose face was riddled with growths, with many forms, frolicking up and low, see him come? He was after half-a-rib a sprout come out, shot, from the side, where one could see three great ‘planks’, with four great bolts that had been rounded, much akin, as half-egged domes that pushed it out and in, the greater head they propelled, the end being thrust out, and looked as well as he had been. But enough of it, displace-ancy, it was formless, eyeless, and without a shred of humanity, his owner might’ve shown instead. There came, without a reason, one as well.

Out of the wall:

‘You’ve forgot to mention that the day is coming to an end, soon enough, but not without someone dying, that is.’

‘How could you know that? Of Yore, I see a man lacking, such as one alike might foretell, you cannot know what future might divine can tell.’

‘A wrong was done onto him, the one that’s stricken down before me, sitting on my breast, forlorn and much to him, aghast, left so, by what’s been shown to him in light of better days of betterment that could see as thus, results, his mind was taken out of him, by rapier of blightly trite. It was only a matter of seconds as one could only come to understand what’s been going on in his mind during the few moments and life, and possibility of endless flight that could’ve been severely avoided.’

If one were not so paranoid as to be coddled by, forcefully boded. With, the moment’s respite done for and forth they went and roused no suspicion that might do, instead they only walked, as far as they knew, a little more than an unnecessary thing, a sting as if sigils were made of blood, reddened walls, across the floor, from a side to another, the niggers were, yeast-of-rot to be given no other reason to walk away. The cripples would stay:

‘Listen thee, for there’s but a quiet desperation that’s yet’ s a moment’s to have been spent in turn, as to respond to, and break apart.

‘Of what, Can?’

‘Of little won’t of understanding, that is, they’ve been listening to us, well, since. You must’ve known this, the corpses that walk and talk and trash about the place, up-thinking of the wronged-upon fallen over on their backs, the worlds, that made-for-them-are come upon a moment’s worthless notice, yet against, in spite of showing lesser cinder’s feel’s, a bloody cozy red-maze of eerily, but made of filth, sounds, that they’ve been storing and sorting for all this time without realizing what had happened before they even reached the ground.’

He pointed at the many, barely hidden holes as well, many of them being separated superficially, but as one could know it, never be too certain with the one whom’ hurt you thus. The ones you like the most will end up casting you, a joust, in terms unspoken having played. Now, whether or not either of them knew what was going on there, that was belonged to a different matter altogether, yet they charged. From all direction, from the walls, from every point, as well as thus, for everything fallen, after that, but cast, would they simply take one and flint, and fill with seals of blood, ripe with clot, and filled the pits, they did themselves, as they had fallen over through four, finely shaped distinct trunks. One would have nonetheless, one could not expect, most bitterest of all pests:

‘Run, run, they come of Yore!’

And down the gulley, they were more, for far outnumbered were their numbers gone beyond, not a single man capable of distinguishing what had been taken from them, at this very point in time, before they could but play a ruse, of hay was there, golden truce, but not as many were kindly as their guests which, dame, of drenched renown but not a whorish lay, would’ve had judged, un-many and un-kindly, riddled with some tubes that were plain to see, wrongly placed here and there, in spots one couldn’t even discern as being right, even remotely so, trying to figure out which went where being as much of a nuisance as just about every single side of the spermaceti-coated animal-wax fallen-apart mold, muddled with the infectious other-parasitical tendon-niggers branching one another’s held upon clawed-talons, drooling, pure as was thus water placed upon one of the underground rounded upon branches in which, spot-red, with many pebbles arranged- Persian King’s rug’s waived as to great abuse made out of, great adorning’s flimsy teal-lot, now used, as a sitting spot for spotting cadavers. Whom were struck in terms of flight and flight amass in stoles. Drones of them carried in, most importantly, dark-covers filled with droves of insolent sounding, encapsulated echoes, many of whom were even then to be less-heard and more heart-felt, if someone was to pay enough attention, only then. Would he have caught them doing it. Rubbing heads together, popping with boil-fluid, flight of spans of bird-less agitators following soon enough, all readily aligning themselves in order to explode together in a play of many lesser lights, many, out of whom, touched upon were hardly a matter of controlling any longer.

‘There they go at it again.’

‘How much time have we been spending here?’

‘Enough to remind myself of the broken wheels, awaited for in the couch above.’

‘Will you take us there, perhaps? I’ve got something I must near to, as when the time is done, the building gone that’s been housing me for ages, that’s been known me, no longer keeping me in place, I leave as thus behind, for I’ve an appointment with the man without a face.’

‘If there’s one thing worth adding on my bucket list, that would be Holocausting the Jews, this time, it is going to happen, under all and every possible believable and verifiable, as opposed to the Holocaust, the Holocaust, that didn’t happen, this one will actually not only keep track of the corpses but it will definitely happen, not the work-camp version either or see-through the wooden door because of the cracks gas chambers’ Holocaust, but a complete kike-ethnic cleansing Holocaustic Extermination of total Ethnic Holocaustration. All fucking sub-human nigger-rat kikes have to fucking die. The Holocaust didn’t happen, but Holomodor did, and the Dreyfus Affair, and the USS Liberty incident, and the Judeo-Communism killings carried on by Stalin and Mao as well.’

A bud-insectoid abdomen kept a head-button-dome whose front-tusk was a mantis-scythe aligned but made of two humanoid appendages pointing in two directions. One of its eyes had a wooden peg that pointed upwards, the sign that is. The wooden sign that had been its eye and had the word Nigger written on it; carved, N-I-G-G-E-R:

‘Your master’s called you.’

A few more paces away. A strange lampoon of minds being wrought in place, a parcel of furies, and of lights shot through a few, darks.

‘I’m neither a good person, nor am I evil, it seems. It’s just who and what I am.

Race-mixing women should be killed alongside their children, have their heads bashed in, skulls split open, be skinned alive. Kicked out, better kicked out to some isolated ground, not the women but the offsprings and made to fend for themselves since young. Then the family forcefully separated. Vulnerable to the outdoors, to the world’s anger, to their parent’s faults; ended.

Or the child could be allowed to grow to a giant’s size and eat both of its parents, then his head could explode.’

‘Death must be cackling right at you, suppose it won’t care who’s at the receiving end. There’s only one thing in this world and you may not get it yet, but, it’s far more important than those things, that being, being at the receiving end of a punch, but it’s not the physical aspect of it.

It’s taking the blow to your pride, which in a way is what I have. It’s something one has a much harder time recovering from, if.’

‘Indolence is my car, and I drive on nigger-kill, the road is my bard.’

Sailings spinning round the pucker-fell; it was about as much a seal as there was no deal, all gone way through back, gone.

In search of the waves beneath the worms

‘Nigger-kike Holocaust-Holocaust, need to rape kike, kill them, one would have to take this, at the very least, in consideration, that being the very fact that these creatures that are anything but human, which are in dire-need of extermination, exterminatorily exterminatory extermination- induced cleansing, killed, butchered, especially the sub-human kikes hiding in Christian countries. These filthy Sub-human kike-Semites that are non-white, in their traitorous look-a-like chameleon shells are doing nothing more than subvert and destroy everything reaching their filthy talons. Their existence, under no circumstance be allowed to continue, at all. And for the better good of man-kind, they have to be skinned alive, viciously, with curved knives filled with rust, but most definitely, first of all, their eye-liquor ought to be liquefied by heated iron-pokers, their cunts and labia’s be used as target practice for axe-throwing, their bodies Holocausted twice after death, thrice Holocausted after the first, ever Holocaust will have happened, but not until the actual one, the Holocaust that is, as for the first time, it will happen, as if it wasn’t clear enough, under no circumstance whatsoever that it didn’t happen, because it did not, but it ought to happen, will and I shall personally ensure the Holocaust will Happen, multiple times, as to make it so the niggers will face their fair-share of a good Holocausting, as in rabid-Holocausting shower-Holocaust filled with air-molecules filled with gas-lynch ropes, with every drop of water, a six-billion worth Holocaust therefore will definitely happen, the Holocaust that is. Israel is next, then the States, because, if there's anything they're in a dire need of, that is to say, they're in need of being Holocausted several times. Gassed, killed, tortured, forced to work, lynched, skinned alive, burnt alive, ripped in halves by fleeing horses, have dumbbells dropped on top their chests, what I'm referring to now is that. We should become the Yakuza, and the kikes and niggers should be treated as if they're all Junko Furuta. Taking turns, several times, each of us, raping their women in the most disturbingly violent ways possible, killing them with violence, with murder, making it so their bodies become unrecognizable any longer. Nigger-kill, nigger-Holocaust, nigger-lynch, nigger-kike, nigger-destruction, nigger-nigger-nigger-nigger. Communistic-Marxism driven media-control needs to be brought to an end. Their control over the entertainment business, their filthy subhumanic 'intelligence' is nothing but a myth that needs to not only be stopped, but they need to be killed and put down like the Holocaustic animals they are. Before they push the mighty superior white race to extinction, mixing as a result of their sub-humanic promotion of miscegenation eugenics that are employed for only one reason, reducing white-IQ in order to destroy everything. Filthy sub-human leeches, the jews are, contorting their host nations, murdering and raping white children because of their mental degeneracy. Grab a hammer and started repeatedly bashing their skulls until they're split open by force. Make it sledgehammers. Their fingers and limbs chopped off completely, their rotten shapes being pulled away, their minds splattered across run-across boards, the remains fed to wild animals, rape-kill-kikes-Holocaust, rape-kill-kikes-Holocaust, rape-kill-kikes-Holocaust; allowing anti-Semitic laws is unconstitutional and suicidal. With Jews everyone loses, therefore, there's only one alternative, or answer to the Jewish Question, we have to kill them, we have to stomp them out of existence completely, pretending as if all of their Jewesses are Anne Frankesses, bashing their Headdresses until they're drowned in pussy-blood-death, bathed-drowned in it, in a bed of terror, filled with iron rotating spikes, but only after the rape. Virulent Semite-animals such as their kinds are not to be allowed to exist at all. They're not human, they are not human, no, they're not, this is a reassurance that the Western Nations shall stand together and put an end to this Semitic-subhuman threat that's been spreading its degeneracy throughout history, trying to subvert-destroy everything with filthy-practices bred into them by Talmundic-driven eugenics, as well as inherited neurologic illnesses, whom are ignored. And ignorance of their ordeals and genetically driven behaviors shall end up in being destroyed if let go, or allowed to continue. Christian countries belong only to Christian people, and not only that, but those whom belong to Semite or non-European ancestry are to be completely cleansed as well, for they cannot be redeemed either, being very much beyond saving. Using saw-blades while treating the jews like logs in order to split in their uglily deformed bodies in halves. Nigger-Holocausted as well with lynch-overs, that is to say, special ropes with holes around their nooses that release fire and gas, would be much appreciated. Or their kike-bodies could be repurposed into Holocaustic kike-lynch ropes that ought to be used to lynch-lynch Holocaust niggers as well, as to kill two rabbits with one shot, in a nigger-on-nigger kill all animals, like them, alike, in the worst Holocaust kind of niggerlynching manner, possible. With nigger-lynch bolts of nigger-kill as well. Holocausti never happinit, no. But, on hindsight, there's a good enough chance for it to happen this time around. There's this dumb-fucking kikess, they're propping up for something, perhaps for an embassy, I suppose. Her plump head is definitely asking for a butcherment of high-degree, low-going through the entirety of her skull, toppling her open-throat and neck through the rest of their bodily-sub-human region, until most if not the entirety or a good enough deal of it, be converted in a good-like ooze, spreading across the ground floor, where she'd be picked up by her sub-human parents. Little dumb-fucking kike-shit of a colleague of hers saw me one time, while accompanying a dumb-fucking shit-skin filthy brown-kikess she most likely kept around as a pet. These rats seem capable of going around and reaching places. Their nepotism is self-evident, almost as evident as their connections. But not as evident as the connections they're going to attain, that is to say, in Hell, once they're done being violently Holocausted, by brute force, when the day of the rope will come. Homosexuality and sexual degeneracy is being promoted by them, it's their flag after all, that can be tracked back to the given to the by the Russians, Jewish Autonomous Oblast set of colors, as it seems like they're displaying their subversion out in the open. We need to get some ice-pick and gouge out their irises, and keep spinning and churning until they become puddly-, well. Jews are not human, and the Holocaust did not happen at all.'

'That's great, shall we go, 'cross the street there, bud?'

'I will gladly accompany you anywhere you point me to.'

Sanders should definitely be lynched.

'Sieg Heil!'

Kikesses in Eastern Europe also seem to be, to the degree of an overwhelming majority, small, in terms of breast size, pitiful, not even worth raping, ha-ha.

'Their heads need to get drilled in and filled with explosives, the lightened up to a firework show.'

Hmm, perhaps some of them could be ethnically cleansed, whereas others could simply be sent to Madagascar and left to fend out there for themselves. Sounds like a good compromise. That way, everyone is happy and pleased.

Maybe it could be dealt with in percents, twenty percent of them allowed a zone to say in where whites aren't located in, during the relocation, some twenty percent sent to some work-camps, thirty percent of them driven to extinction, that is to say, killed, and the rest of them, sent to some Arabian desert and allowed to hold no country or be in possession of any property at all, perfect.

Work camps could be useful, if they were expanded upon.

Various sleep-bunker could be converted into excavators, inside of which the detainees could be forcefully deprived of sleep, permanently so, unless forced to sleep outside on rock or on open-stretches of soil. The watch-towers could have long-drops for instant-lynching, when it comes to the loudest of prisoners. Who could also have boulders dropped on top their heads. Spiked boulders, with pumping pistons, and bombs in them, the prisoners. So they could explode on command, when hit by boulders.

Niggers, niggers.

'There's been a shortage of fucking guns in the barrel.'

'Fill.'

'I have to find out something, the reason behind why Kikesses look sub-human when seen from their profile-view. It must be that Armenoid strain in their blood, making them look so disgustingly ugly, deformed even. That filthy sub-human looking receding chin and forehead combined with a 'projected'

Mandibular Prognathism makes them hard to stare at for long-enough periods of time. Aerodynamic profiles combined with hard-to-look at beaked noses, so filthy and disgusting, 'liek' niggers, eww.'

'I am a woman and I'm retarded, I am dumb fucking retarded cock-sucking whore, I'm so fucking unintelligent and retarded, I got pussy for brains. Moist pussy sponge, part of which has been assimilated by my breasts, which have become firmer and plumper, thankfully for me, I wasn't in need of a brain to begin with.'

'You beautiful thing, you've confirmed my suspicions, please, accompany me to my dreams.'

'Follow you, I'll do it. And spread my legs, so you can go ahead and impale me with your meaty rod.'

'The existence of the filthy Juden-rat race can only be lead to a final conclusion by the employ of crystallized Para-demonical power-rape. It is most crucial to their destruction and abrogation. Also niggers need to get lynched afterwards as well. And Gooks, and Spics, whose laziness is only exceeded by smell.'

'Eight, no, nine stars, pussy, pussy, pussy, pussy, pussy, stank-pussy, stank-scented pussy; tail-tail, tail pussy, tail pussy, cat-pussy but not literal pussy, cat; smash head pussy with a tongue hammer. Or hot iron pokers, iron-tongues, entering them, women, pussy, moist-pussy dripping with moist-moisture; my pussy is getting Holocausted right now. Jet of cancer! Cervical-Surgical.'

A most grotesque opening of maligned voices stopped.

There were many akin to them, spread just about every single spot. Many schizophrenically deformed voices singing in unison, disappearing from sight, when called.

'A man is waiting by the road.'

'How many Holocausts need to be put inside each and every single one of the alleged 'corpses' in order for a Holocaustic actual evidence of the Holocaust having happened to have been derived out of the rapport established between the Holocausted population prior to the war and the population Holocausted after the Holocaust, with regards to the kikes Holocausted between the two other Holocausts whose validity cannot be contradicted since, in actuality not a single Holocaust happened. If the kikes got killed inside the camps, why aren't the bodies in the camps? It's simple reasoning, it's because there was no Holocaust and only a few kikes died of Typhus, no more, no less. But, on the bright side of things, we can always just take a step further than it and actually start Holocausting them, since they seem to be begging for it, so desperately, with their reparations and the reparations they've been receiving to this very day, and still.

These Sub-humanic Juden-filthy-rats are nothing more and naught else other than parasitic entities, sucking on every nation's 'goodies', subverting democracy, destroying national values, contorting morality, in their endless attempt to bastardize Christianity. For that reason, they've more than earned their Holocaustic Holocausting Holocaust that's about to happen. Actual labor camps shall be made for them, specifically designed to have as many death traps with knives and explosives attached to their heads, throats, ankles, wrists, and even a few of them implanted in their guts and what not. But these sub-human semites, seeing how lazily incapable of doing anything properly as they are, instead, choose to lazy around, in their and during their cheap-masochistic promotion of destruction, of liberty and non-degenerate; fearing the mighty Christian who might, the strong man of faith that has the power within him to grab a bat or an axe and kill as many Jews as he possibly could. Kikes belong amongst their Idol of worship, as their Tallmud says, Lucifer, father of kike-dreams, who's in hell, sharpening his darkened scythed-forked with many other hydra-shaped long-iron head chiseled blades of putridness, being part of his blackened by nigger-blood trident, out of the bodies of their niggardly sub-human monkeyness, their existence having been brought into the light of the bloated day in which, up to this day they've subvertedly destroyed all there is. This needs to stop. The kikes outstayed their welcome and need to be lynched, like niggas, or niggers, especially the former, as there's a clear enough distinction between the two of them as to wager different intensities of niggardly behavior, the former adhering to their incompetence as a sub-species inferior to the superiority of the White man, without whom civilization would simply crumple. Other non-white species are sub-human, dull, unintelligent and too incompetent to not only achieve anything but even maintain any kind of workable, improvable, or even to be innovated upon system, that being something that far exceeds their racial capabilities. Without the white man, whether or not we want to admit, we're one step behind, from reverting to primitive or even, possibly worse, societies, where murder, rape and savagery runs rampant, all because of the kikes who are desperate in their attempt to subvert and destroy the white man and mix him with inferior races.

I must promote the ethnic lynching of these disgusting rats, before they spread and breed like the putrid animals they are. In their blood, there runs destruction, it's widely known by anyone who's had to deal with them. Their children either bequest chemical castration or the top end of a butcher's cleaver; and bombs, and need to be burnt alive. Also blood libel being contorted and used against them.

We must kill them, kill the kikes, kill the jews, we must kill them, we must cleanse them ethnically with murder-homicide. We must put an end to their existence. The Jews need to die at all cost! War, the war never stopped, the Cold War they started, or came as a result or an adverse reaction to their ordeals.

They tried warning us with the Stürmer, but we didn't listen, at all.

They're still trying to warn us, but yet we ignore it because of their filthily disgusting attempt to control everything.'

'A baronette of less sublime voice, I see.'

'Less sublime than they would have me past thing window sill caught and made for.'

A body lain inside the train, it was moving around a rounded hilled-canyon-trail, adorned promiscuously with deadened lust-birds, flayed-put in place, munched throats being dragged on from window-sill to window-pill shaped grave door.

Farther in the distance, there was barely something creeping past the chasmed door:

'There's something here, I know there is.

I've been followed for some time now, every simple opening I'd say, whether it'd be a window or a small rotten door, I'd say, there's something there, there's something or someone who's been following me for a while now.'

The murder-rape cum of women-fuck are shit-fucking dumbly retarded

‘Where are the women of this fine city locked in?’

‘One of the many vaults where they’re kept in to bred with me.’

‘Are you their master-husband then?’

‘I stand alone, as the survivor of the onslaught, in a city that’s not only mine, but theirs, but only if they manage to get out but I’m the only one with a key and the antidote, for the poison-venom toxic deadly virus I administered to them, as to kill them as soon as they step out of the vaults, but rape-kill is king of murder, so I won’t let women get away with it, living that is.’

‘It is a fine thing that you’ve managed to keep them leashed, as all women should be. Can I throw a bone?’

‘No, they’re sleeping for the time being and I won’t have them be moody because of you, intruder!’

The sky was a box with another sky and clouds in it. The rest of the sight was eternally black-voided like space with large cut-curtains, spread like lassos, textured in the same way the clouds were. A deprave umbrella. Rape:

‘It’s been broken in!’

Not this city, but the other push-trough, the one with empty heads, the one that went like a choir singing as it drew on ahead: Kept still only by a few falchions, falcons, birds, drawing breath upon the blood that was boiled inside the strange lay.

‘Never stood a chance to begin with; could never do anything properly and it seems as if everyone’s against me. Stopped by the cops, always looked down upon, can’t control my impulses, sub-human blood flowing through my veins. At the very least I found a way to completely block everyone out completely and filter just about everything they say. I don’t want to be part of this society, I don’t want to assimilate, I don’t want to talk to people. Talking is dumb, talking is evil, useless, rubbish, for me. I most likely am gonna be thrown in jail for assaulting a kike or some other low-life creature. Hopefully then I’ll shut down everything, completely. I wish my life hadn’t been ruined by them. I wish Adolf had exterminated them; I wish the Holocaust happened.’

‘Women are the most immobile, mentally speaking cunts that ever existed; recent neuroscience studies reached the conclusion that once a woman gives birth to a child, a part of her gray matter is being damaged, wasted, the entire volume is being reduced, permanently. It seems only, conclusively enough that a woman should be forced to sustain as much brain damage as possible by being forced to bear as many children as possible, since they’re not losing anything to begin with. Women are a cancer to society. Kike and nigger women are beneath cancer, they’re worse, much worse, they’re a darker, more destructive kind of cancer, a useless cancer born out of the very fact that, these sub-human creatures that are not to be referred to as women at all, this concept be entirely disregarded for this exception from the rule since their phenotypical appearance makes one more likely to take them as an extended branch of the Y-chromosome endowed, superior biological sex, although only superficially so, since, at the end of the day, these creatures are still incapable of doing or proving themselves capable of achieving anything on their own without the use of a greater, much stronger, both mentally as physically, fit or otherwise, be it social fitness or mental, man, who was appointed by the universe itself as a way to curb-stomp the woman into a primitive, more primeval way of anything that's not too bothersome for their overly, succumbed to the oversaturated female-hysteria that in turn granted them, by default, the default state of being born that way, dumb, rude, obnoxious, a low-life, hysterical- dumb disgusting cunt whose only purpose in life is to leech on a man's wealth and resourced, destroying him completely, ruining his life, thereafter. It is obvious that ever since the dawn of humanity, the female has butchered everything that's run through her fingers. With the exception, perhaps of Kikesses whom are borderline niggers themselves in terms of intelligence, if one were to remove the sub-human aspect of cunningness they used to change their set of observable behavior. If one were to watch and regard a kikess' behavior over a prolonged enough period of time, one could see that they apply different strategies in order to deal with that they perceive as being a threat. Their nature is subversive, placing them in a strange vacuum between actual women and niggers. But Anne Frank was kind of a cutie. Women are deranged by their very nature, destructive in their behavior, unless they're put down, beneath the strong hand of man, whose grasp can finally put an end to this chaotic entreaty of disentanglement from what it means to be a human being. Incapable as they are, females, these infantile children, whose heart bequests destruction, pure spreading destruction, niggardly so, do not hold the capability of self-control and regulation, which in turn seems to bring an abuse of a much higher and much grander type that's befitted, to be put under the employ of naught else than men, for theirs is a holy question, and a final destination that could somehow be attained, and bring glory and peace to their fellow men, even to the likes of females. But women, they're dumb, they're not human at all, and they need to have their rights taken away by law. If I shall have it, my way, I shall make do with taking away their rights, globally. I will abuse them to my heart's content, with violent, ubiquitous, deprave, strength, hardly a matter of speak but show, fist but low, and with the knuckle, where wound, cops don't know. Females' contributions are severely exaggerated, as a testament to the Judaic Disease that's been spreading throughout the world, since their effeminate natures are somehow interconnected, making it much easier to hide behind the skirts of a woman, rather than accept the fact that they're inherently inferior to other people and strive for change. It harms them, and it harms everyone else. Such inferiority ordeals promoted by the drenched Semites need to get stamped out of existence, entirely so. Women with wider hips and larger breasts, should by some degree be considered human, to a controllable extent, them being an exception from the rule, but not the niggers or kikes.'

The punch he had initially received had actually dislodged not only his mouth but the side of his nose and eyes, in a matter of a few seconds during which his entire head had shot back, as if in ecstasy, whereas both were already excited with where things were going and not only that, but there was a heart-torn as if from their side, latch.

Everything was being smashed under the roof, and the quiet angelic fugitives were only crooked for the hour, before starting again, at each other's throats, but split beneath each dead-end.

'I'll crush you, Bush-man Paradise!'

The nigger's inferior subhumanity'-s forefront niggardliness with regards to the niggerification of its nigger-like nature, overly inflated with the monkey-simianesque despondency as to its own serving, or being a slave by means of purporting itself as nothing more and nothing else other than some allegory to a bastardization or a bastardized version of a disgustingly left-behind, entrenched by nigger-features, that is to say, beyond archaic, beyond the likes of monkeys as these filthy 'humans' that are not 'humanoid' but niggers would look back to, in regards to some long-dreamt of 'achievements' that are indeed lacking, boisterously lackluster, disgustingly disturbing as to the realization, if ever came be upon their kinds to stumble upon it, as to know that their nigger-non-human-nigger manner of being provides an impediment to the other non-nigger races whose actual contributions or hopes as to contribute something or to achieve something in life, falls short or is forced to do so, at the hands of some despicable creatures, in terms of being a nigger as niggers know best, they, would find themselves governing on top other imbeciles that reflect their own sub-human intellect as well as their appeasement to their niggardly features and violent outburst, since it's rather, close enough to the general population, as to be knowledgeable enough, or to have ever so slightly absorbed enough information in terms of how niggers act, clear, that the niggers, these vociferous in-humane creatures, whose sub-humanic beaked faces as well as compact tiny heads, and disgustingly disturbing, hard to look at filthily sub-human retarded by most likely down syndrome or something similar, salivatingly drooling children whose mothers are allowed to cut in line, be it in a common supermarket or some welfare office, who are also less likely to show any kind of gratitude whatsoever and so happen to, possibly train their nigger-sub-humans in the arms of violence and of ruining other people's lives since these 'things', these monsters whose mere existence brings damnation, corruption and filth in this world by merely existing, being very much so propagated by the kikes in order to destroy or bastardize the white race, can only bring, at the very end the destruction of everything else and everything other that is not a nigger, which in turn is something that cannot be forgiven and will not easily be left to its own accord as to carry on by itself, since, as all good men out there, I have rightfully acknowledged what's already been known, therefore only doing something as clear as reiterating the facts, in a solemn regurgitation, as to appease the in-known knowledge that's been transferred among generations of men, who've had to either live among the niggers or had to interact with them, to a point where it's been established that these disgusting dark-skinned monsters, these things are not only incapable of, by nigger-do-what-see-nigger-do as to where they gain their retaliatory desires as well as enactments of their incapable-of-control-being-established-upon-themselves think-throughs that, by other means would serve as a back-up device as to prevent them from committing the amount of crimes they are, they had and they will purposefully cover up for their own, since, at the end of the day, these filthy nigger-monkeys are evil, scum, and are not intelligent enough to live in other countries where other races make the majority. Take a look at this nigger.

'Take a fucking look at this nigger!'

Right here, he is standing in a bathtub filled with fully extended shave-clean razor blades, cutting him with a butcher's cleaver's mighty rake-hoe, upon the field of cotton-meat, for show. Where lynch-a-nigger-doodle-do is being sung about the hour's crude, lo', the nigger's picking it, the cannibal. The nigger's first bath is a blood-bath, nigger's' do-it n' do-it's 's do. The nigger's 's do-it- the nigger's 's do. A long pipe is attached to his bath-tub, leading to a nigger-bleed killing machine, harvesting the sickles from his blood, making it more fancier and cruder for the one slaying the niggers with crude batons, whacking him in the head, paying spades for trades of dead-and lays.

A tall-dark half-a blade, a bat's wing, as that is shaped. Gone right through, the guillotine emerged:

'You can cry all day, you nigger, but there won't be a man here to save you from the iron-trigger, whose heavy weight, but serves all day, to cut you into pieces, there!'

But enough of it, one day's when it's come, I shall find the means to have them get rid of, then done.

En-corpsed Mushroom

Two giant helmeted heads had been toppled down, powerlines attached to their kept-hanging belted rackets, which prevented them from falling over, yet in sight. There was only a most dreaded thing, that kept them, yeast and cysted, yet again entombed, as they glided back and forth. From all around the abyss they were cast in, upon the race-tracked rails, that kept them awake, even after death, with all the mechanisms hanging below their neck-lines, drenched away in the most porous liquids, weeping after plight, the many flies that could be seen and the men, whom prayed so that a light might come, stood below. Rested in their suits, only a few feet away from the hooting, hoofed pointed beds and troughs. Where there were corpses, where had been; to have seen them, they had been. And not a single man was alive; but walked in death, possessed in search, of that once felt upon, light. An oozing cabin could be felt as well, the cold-blasted wind, the chimes could be heard, as the huntsman was yet to make his grand return, when the world had been awake, once deadly, turned.

A desperate laceration appeared in conjunction to their lost fluids since they swam in worms and other crow-like thorns, they appeared to like that, and mind no play and palsy-grains, their faces fell away and began crawling out of sight. Since there was a mist all around, the ground was swamped but by water, not by murk, in which some fish twitched as they were wormed by the least amount of ever-quiet, quitted and felt themselves defiled, stabbed, then cut, and through blotted drought, they started growing. But only in gas and cyst:

'We shall not approach the corpse, again. For they lay inside of it and do not seem to have their way, or seek passage out of dark and come apart, therefore long, will it be, at last until they leave.'

'Whose hibernation might we intrude upon then?'

'I only know them by scent and even that is rather, disturbing to admonish. I've only heard them once but I could barely tell them apart from the other tottering echoes we hear all around and all across the wild surroundings, where they're lain in and what they've done to get there.'

'What are you on about?'

'They've hid themselves too well, I think. Either that, or we may be inside of it, from what I could tell at least.'

‘If that’s but true, wouldn’t there have been any signs, any simpleton’s delight whatsoever? I would’ve felt something if it were true.’

And it was difficult hiding it. Since as wretched at its two domes were, flattened at the top, rotten and rolled, a grave he had been, a giant tomb, squared, matchbox crate, with four empty sides and the front-side caved in as if it had been slashed and rot away it had. Two elongated tortoise shells molded into a caterpillar in terms of mold but made into a cradle, an obelisk fallen over, toppled down, a tree’s trunk cut by a woodsman during hunt, filled with teeth of stone, incisors that were bore, both mouths but spread around and drooling tiny pebbles that kept falling out of it. A reddened glowing crystal out its last adornment that kept crawling around the organic surface, at least from what could be seen. Resting as it were on many caterpillar legs themselves, but hardly out of stone, spread, within and placed beneath the squared-up front, fallen over tomb, the sarcophagus lain there flaccidly for them to hibernate in, pincered but like the altar near which the corpse was aimed at. A great flea-appendage mouthed, in a chicken’s leg twisted manner, long contorted, attached, to the head of a humanoid rattish figure, with a body that was but a great spoiled tail, kept but throned on top a lump. Off its right side a pipe came out, with head-producing, kept behind bars, fire-blinds, stove-like, or a chimney twisted to a vertical plane, on top of which rested a disgusting blob-shaped pawn, with faces contorted around it, gone, were they on first sight. And not a single soul drew breath away, or light.

Unsettling lights began popping in and out in the distance.

IT’s been four whole months since the descent had begun and there was not a single man whom adjoined them from out the realms of the outside world as well as what was left of the inquiring, bolder peasants that had jointed them, with their coily reeds, atop their backs projected as the many adorning stalactite-shaped coons-figures that oozed and jerked dazzlingly as a few more, figures, shaded as if en-coated entirely in dusty-shaded black robes, whose armlessness rendered them harmless enough for their company to be perceived as nothing other than a well received addition to the men, had only added to the vigorous loathsomeness the putrid canals, various depressions and other barely sublime growths, whose projections only flashed against the side-long tails of their eyes, during their tension filled sleep-walk session, as to continue their advance. By then, filled with the vineyard’s scented most unnatural scented mark’s pass-through. Not only was there not a single mutter during that broaching of the lower melts, whom spread all around; but they were stopped by the sight of a long depression in the form of a room or a giant worm’s tunnel at the end of which there stood an ancient stone panel that was as wide-strewn long as a seventy five by twenty four meters long with a lower side broken-through and dripping down as they simply started drooping down, the bile-like structures, whose sightless sprawls and curls curled along some of the surrounding stones, in all their might, churning as if a soup of stone and molder was only then bastardly approached. A compartment could be seen in its middle verged protrusion, that fucking annoying cunt, that blasphemous filthy fucking cunt’s voice kept ringing and ringing and ringing in Vaughn’s ear, her voice just rang on and on without conceit.

A curfew of bats whose wingless gusts stopped mid-riff into the first cast out of their Heavenly corpse abode in which they spent countless hourglasses assaulting, with the help of their incisors, the little hope there was for something humane to grow in the inner prepuces of the swollen-flaccidly drooping below the groundless parcels where livid-atoms had once lived near, burdening the inner-layers of cartilage which had made this fortress keep a span above the dead-line, sinking, where their wretched bowels had once been as wide as the outer-bellies of men whom had tried themselves, as to join in the patched inner-deformities which now, eloquently distilled, air-from atoms, as through their inner-sills they sold whatever remained of the variously inclined, deformed, irascible bulks of heads whom were manned by hikers and climbers, wrought into a never-stopped fight, of stooping over their brought in tools, the long pike-pickaxe ivory-filaments of girths and add-ins, whose curves were wrapped around their ankles, around their chins and sweatily resting shins, across their mercilessly forced to have been grown, unibrows as they had been forcefully reverted to a simian-like antiquary they could not be taken away out of, or bred from any longer, evolution being eerily sutured in place as for this organically biologically altering 'intrusive', at a subatomic level, surgery had managed to completely alter not only their physionogonmy as to render their forms as being something beneath even the likes of a simian or an antiquated hominid but a mere imitation, a hairy, in over abundance-made mimicry, whose jaws, the ones that were or had been present for some reason or another, were dislodged but placed into an incubation 'hump' which had been put behind their bodies, kept hanging in the air, as if in a cylindrical padded locker they appeared to be channeling, passively so, their blood-miasma, which had at this point in time been forced into a mischievously disgusting guttural mist, that would've signaled a bodily-ethereal dysfunction which drew only as little as it could be so-thoroughly made of it, observed, that, out of their minds, as little as nothing was left unconsumed, an obscure amount of fossilized brain-matter kept in an unaltered state inside an iron sphere- made of brass overlapped tiny, chained by iron-wire, rusty plates whose mere presence robbed the cognitive organ of its preserving fluid that would otherwise render it partially protected from, as through some 'reactionary-immobilization' being put to the employ of the visceral liquid that prevented it from entering a state of no-force-absorption twas-had been acted upon as a last layer of defense, in order to avoid any possible sub-concussive or concussively-met by mere chance, suffered for, brain-injury, that in turn would result in the complete alienation, that's been clearly shown from this point on, since not only was it robbed of its defense mechanisms, but of its functions as well, since these simianesque niggardish-hairy and tawny bodies, that had been enslaved, like niggers, whose organs migrated in the same boiler-like lockers they equivocally, constantly, unless a deterrent got in the way, so as to interfere with this clearly smooth-enough process, that they have been converted to 'machines', although not by normal means and no actual machinery had been implanted into them, regardless of what might be believed, since both of the encasements of the various organs, in their various compartments, so on and so forth could lead to such misinformed impressions, that are unwelcome, ignorant to such a preternatural inconvenience, whose acuity might render one to, as to think of, considering the fact that they were un-godly bear-skin wearing demonical barbarians, whose barbarous nature eluded one beyond belief as to what heathenistic-pagan ritual might've conferred onto them, this, this unnatural veil of pseudo-machinery they carried around, as well as the strangeness in terms of how they kept themselves in a manner beyond the mere understanding of commonage, as to jolt-one's fancies during a mesmerizing sagacity whose thoroughness is not properly employed, to the likes of understanding being shoved inside a ploy of the mind, stored there, like a can of sardines misplaced inside a fridge, although un-damaging or not as dolefully miss-central to the usage that's being put, or the storage-unit being put through, with a frame of comparison being the other deposited produce, such as the green vegetables, the orange pumpkins, extremely tawny-violet eggplants, so on and so forth, whose placement would totally imbue one's imagination, tingling it as he would draw open the door in order to look around like a man whose experienced for the First-FUCKING-underscore-Line-Christmas-put-inside-a-notebook-journal-stored-forever, now again lived through a pair of rose-tinted glasses' broken shades, whose mere jolt-drive through his head reminder made him realize that he is disappointed and this is not what he remembered it was like, but he's still, despite this 'life-changing', barely touching, warmly felt, with boisterous fingers curled, with nails un-cut, all of the sudden, his grip having become way too strong as to commit to it still, to a point where he could do some real, actual, structural damage to the outer-shell of this finely-crafted by People's Republic, of an extraordinary refinement, Fridge, which he ruined, as he slammed the door too hard, in the same, this 'non-understanding' as to what was happening inside the bodies of these sub-simian creatures, only added more to their torment, as well as to the realization that their suffering will never be fully understood at a much deeper, amorphous level, one of such regards as to fully draw and take away from a humanoid-man's turbine-coated in, empathy, now, being set on fire, in case turbine is flammable, if not, then, coated in gasoline, one of the virulent, Oil-Taken-From-The-Middle-East despite there being no WMD's found at the time, stolen from them at the price of millions of Arab-given-to-their-lord-Allah-lives, as well as a few good American lives, that had been traded, for Israel, since the Jews, or Kissinger had actually sent them to their deaths, because like all Jews, he is a dirty, Judaic, Sociopathic Creature, with no regards for human life, or decency, that stands by them, these filthy slaves, working on the mushroom field of cotton-growths, incapable of anything but a most profoundly felt despair.

But one of the timely, hibernatorily-struck by a recurrent-lucidly dream widened-necked 'net' of constantly urged by the pass-over sweeps of unseen-wretched with pus-throat cued stuck in loops of finely wrought in shape hours, whose recurrences were untimely ended, only to have woken up in a state of wakefulness, a curdle struck pack of reawakenings imbuing it with a never-ending, worn-out forgetfulness of the hour-struck midnight lour, little iliac talking to a dream, struck within the heads of absinthe as of the ones belonging to the men around it, that had fallen long before as well as they belonged to it, for some reason or another, joined to its head while cradled within its elongated wings, that formed a hammock as to join it, whenever to have woken up, for them to have joined it would've been a mistake beyond common sense, for their deathless stares of iron glazing through the cracks, above them, during the time their master-bat whom was finely embracing them and would rather not have been anything but swept aside through the sea of urges and of cradles of appendages that had been chucked from one side to the other, no longer in charge or power, no longer to listen to the sounds that would disrupt it slumber, the bat, otherwise long-forlorn as to listen and obey no one, stood aside, in dream-benign, with pus and slumber, cradled past the ride, with flowers of deplorable ruddy-rum, with sylphs of cysted rims of ringed and wrung up beams that followed it as well, rotating in the air, being brought by flowers of uncanny red and blue-colored green sapphire, of many people whom were died and, likewise, as it had, abandoned their sleep, met during such defeat as they would, accept it nonetheless, despite there being no one to impress, although one of the men that was present there, was different by all account, and deformed at that, mightily tall with a bodily concurrence of distortions that rendered it look a-like, as one would have it, a bloated chested camel-elongated-headed but flea-like and filled with many sharp-harpoon appendages, all coming out its mouth-tunnels and strange funnels, that made that strangely watermelon-extrusion of a cranium whose eight came, on both sides, three and three, with mighty blue-glows sprouting spryly with fluid- and with many feathered tombs that came out of its back, with a few legs as well, many too long and too tall, but concave and yoyo-lowered, as they bore large fluid rounded pincer-filled carapace bulbs upon which they stepped on, from side to side-lopsided, carrying on their fluid started thrusters that revealed themselves past this chained ring collar whose rusty put together beads kept them hangingly together, preventing them from falling apart, whenever needed, not to be too wretched as to fill themselves with fluid-gusts, of winded dark abodes of winded limed, lashed-gray with pouring rays, of fallen apart, gourmet-reigns, dragged bodily by struck-by-thunder yellow slime, coated by their sweet delights, as these wretched bodies filled with fat, who more or less looked-alike, were in possession of billions of incisors they've come to reveal, all capable of blood-drawing and infesting all with eel-cell blood teal, whose sudden change would make them more contorted, as to appease, the sight of them whom had been completely strapped to the strangers, whom were just as strange as one would have them peeled off, and absence be deterrent of their talk. For they were frightened, the other bats, incapable of drawing any closer to it, since fear had their voices stopped:

'Lest you bring something to your intrusion, we shall hear none of it soon.'

'But wait, oh, one in slumber; we've brought something to you, no sooner, no wonder you've lain in this state without reprieve, with little late given onto you, stimulating upheaval. Yet, lo, there's something more.'

'Something wretched from the world outside, I will not have it brought onto my possession at any time; leave and ensure that your absence shall make your chain weep with crude iron as flakes but bloom, yet fall apart. That I may be tickled most thoroughly and feel but nothing that would be taken by heart.'

'Nay, I shall do no less, nor strive to have it wanted. I choose to stay in your company, until the light of day hard darted.'

'Then you shall wait forever stuck in this place with none else but I.'

Their liquor was embalmed in putridness, seeping through with every perniciously succumbed black-dawn filled with wreathing rigidity's edge precocity-carrying gust of shades that cast upon it the blessing of northern carried virus nests, whom coated in their salinity's almost crystalline thrust cysted crest, came to view adjourned by insomnia- macabre, a sightless glutton's blocky pair of snooze-cast after rocky bastards, wart-but-filled, hardened as to appeal to no one but themselves as they spread within, cowering only to hide from sight whenever detected, directed towards the flashing shades that suddenly appeared, through prisms of drops upon which bounced the Seer whom ruled upon them still, and bathed when the time came in the organ-pounding gelatin.

Buttons, a lot of them, by the side of other larger buttons, with cricks, wheround the edge cracked, out of which fingers drew out, mainly placed around both sides of the wall, adorning it in line crisscrossed and interlaced line-formations where they revealed how fat, red, boiled they were, joining a few other limbs that were un-belonged to men but to some other creatures as well, parasitically spread, a boon of many formations where perched by stalagmite-people whose faces were empty, with the exception of pots, in their underside brought but only to be paid for whenever casting no more than a glance away, from the visceral moon that shone upon their lightless putrid quay, since they receded in the mushroom, then below, cowering under contrivance as to walk off the shame of being seen deserters, by workers whom were inhumane in alacrity as for the putrid rebound to reality, and blissful as the blisters of petulance as to show none come around, ripped away from tree of soundless- run, towards the bards' noiseless ballads sonnets and the poems that were underway, to have stumbled upon them by mere chance of lost-long day, would've meant nothing to them, otherwise absent-minded as they gathered around then piled onto one another's thrust forward cowls, feeling of no-restlessness, abhorrent as for every room, and every chamber, and every ruddy-clay cracked vase to have been deemed belonging to a knowledgeable mage, obliquities-divined –prescient but of no mind, sorcerer of little countess charmed but walking under way as to have adorned that beautifully adored arm, as they walked upon the same road, during cherished yet recalled days, or darkened fiend of little to no blasphemy inclined to have himself but cut through sin, made reveal, the many arms, appendages, growths and other things he attempted to seer out of his bodily regime, of come upon stumble, humble as to forget whatever came upon him during the ancient day where resin had once governed the halls above, when the mushroom, that was not entombed as to be salvaged for every slither of life one might come upon to steal, with bribe or otherwise, they knew, yet carried on with knowing as their poignant hearts seemed less than nonchalant in way of stupefaction, drawn to such eerily forlorn putrid attraction as they have easily found soon after, solace of no boundaries but swollen, for ever-after deep-inclined with kindness, borough. But they got there eventually and they were found. As if it was beyond their power, to such a place that not even the slightest most soliquitous of explorers might find themselves shocked, yet it was expected.

Hundreds of the entombed mushrooms, tall, the bodies that were cast there pointing at them with only a need in mind, that to set forth and conquer the world once their putrid lord would come to bear the seed of disillusion as to have attempted the reassembly of its brakeage- defiance of all that is material as they dreaded such return. Whereas there was another contender in the room; flying, levitating or the likes, a tent-compact shaped body, ‘roofed’ and bloated-fat, but stained yellowish in appearance as if it were the cover of a military truck. It was almost squashed-squeezed like a potato yet it managed to keep afloat. A peculiar giant caterpillar but the size of a body-bagged man with large hairs coming out of it wriggled around, as it hit whatever thing it could, largely annoyed of the much deranged hay-struck place it was forced to live in. A giant fat head- with a single eye and many features, that of men, contorted upon a squirming drill that came off as both its beak and its ‘mouth’, although it did not open, not made much a case of the other thing that appeared to be the main precursor of fat it bore. A long-spear hose drew off the side of its head, the right one, aligned perfectly with its contorted, lack of neck, body and the like. Vertically place, opposite to this thing, at the other end, rested a gruesome ugly boil that kept inflating and deflating at will. Before it yet farther than the head, another spear shot up-front, aligned, with the forward thrust tail, both at different ends as well, it kept a giant cylindrical formation that appeared to be a second body it bore, featureless but that was where all that mass of its body, or the one unseen was hid and bore. IT almost formed a broken circle, if only this thing and the tail connected. But once twisted, this fat almost parasite thing held it like an incisor-mantis claw whose penetrating will had entered a punching bag of meat it used to produce light, as it scoured the zone around it, making sure the mushrooms were being taken care of, without fright, as to be disturbed. It appeared unimpressed by the mass of fingers that were not only regurgitated but they showed as little as no regard to their safety of what might happen, the consideration judged as fleeting soon after.

‘I think I feel a scented messenger of fumes coming from down below!’

Velocity could not be taken into account for more than a few various reason that didn’t in the least include some of the incessantly darker, more volatile yet intrusive continuations of legacies that had been suppressed before the change for the reemergence to show itself through means of understanding, at the very some of the least, fragmentary oblique to the common eye without outside influence, if that may be taken into account, the reproductory-glands that were clearly outwardly shown as to be present all along this livid being whose tolerance had allowed for its withdrawal, to continue in such a way as one would have it achieve a state of quasi elation, from the self-inflicted toxins that had visibly accumulated all across its face.

At one o'clock, fifteen hours ago, on a Sunday, recognizable and traceable on a humanoid calendar of normal proportions, of a preponderantly cumbersome extraction, but modernized to appease whatever inclusion of a change in symbols or what is acceptably coherent that somehow still subservient to the legally-distinguishable from the set-standard, with the times n' an all, having gotten a few altered symbols hanging on a broken rack that would make even less sense than it did before, this prostitute of knowledge that would under normal circumstances not be found here showed up just in time for everyone to look up and see it rear in its ugly, disgusting, perfectly rotund, yet mesmerizingly lurid as for the quenchless fallen-apart morbidity it had accumulated over the past eons, whom were completely manifested by their will, although they remained indistinguishable from any other non entity that would've appeased a similar despondency that was concentrated upon her without-a-brow, lack of recognizable uncanny features that, only then began protruding outwardly as to be completely had, grasped, pulled out, slowly, by the workers who played with her, during one of their unregulated breaks, despite their incapability of self-control that had been previously shown, out of which even they, the people whom were spying, straying and surrounding, running gaggingly with their elongated toes that had been put behind their bodies and formed large row-like car-tire formations but with many heads inside the wretchedly insidious lurid parasites they homes, whispering forebodingly of the evils that these large parasitical pseudo-whores, with their puffy antlers and their backs that were become blowing horns with many legs protruding in the back, out of which a giant eye could be seen as well as a single trail that formed various other legs that were attached to strange formation-like tributaries that were joined by a few made-to-look-like humanoid armies that were all attached to her as well as they had shared this, this unnatural cognition they basked in as to feel themselves stretched and not only would they feel pain but the warm embrace that was never shown to her by either means of prostitution or willingly offered to her, showing only that there was no possible chance for her to fully experience that, which laymen referred to as mankind, pacified in some way, confusedly stretching, thinking by some means they themselves were and had been incapable, not to mention their incapability of fully embracing or realizing that the echoes in which they basked were nothing but echo-deformities-lost in translations they could not endure trying to decipher, since they were but her lost bubbles of thought, and since this whore was only meant to tell the time, reason having only dictated her failure as something to be expected out of a woman, as their kind had always been somewhere beneath that of every species' lowest denominators, to an incontestable point, therefore deemed, as to have every single one dismissed, then allowed to seek refuge any, either and – else, in places no possible contributions to the bloody marks left on the ground could be waddled in.

From somewhere farther down west, a beast akin to a battering ram, strapped on top strange elongations of toes, putrid things it crawled upon, with its fat-end head pumping in and out, and there, a blasphemous tower-thing, of many growths- upheld. With a water-tank 'nest' held on top. It guarded as if its very life depended on preserving this organ.

Mainly, as it'd been, the deformed water tower, kept by a beam of growth-meat, remained still as it slowly progressed. The ram up-front but a single piece, almost like a trunks', but every here and there, one could see a patch of tiny 'scales' moving to reveal holes where there were none to be seen a few seconds right after and there. There it stopped, in the middle of nowhere, incapable of emptying its belly, wrought in chains, they threw around it, then held it where it wailed.

‘Keep at it men, bring more ropes if you can but be quick about it! This thing won’t last for long, not if we allow it to continue as it is!’ Now:

A few more men joined, but they were plain to see, colorful and covered in feathers, like Indian Mongoloids, whose faces started falling on their chests, and out their shoulders, mantis-scythes, with strange designs deep lodged in and only appearing in the wildest dreams. A sea of blossoming gossamer emeralds, of jaded allure, with many more of them that came to life out of the most obscure as well as the hardest to dictate or point down by sonar, or by any other way canopy of the same drawing, the same following and the strangest coming out of their hidings had appeared, to be gone. As soon as they come, for a second there, some sparkling shards were deeply lodged to be seen, and spread, all the while, and more wildly, out-thrust, across and down there. No chest spared, no legs, joint or any other limp limb to be spared, as they had been accosted by this strange apparition, followed soon after by a most macabre delight. A strangled pad, floating across, slowly, then joined by them, as four or five men cornered it in a circle, then watched.

‘Should we pull these things out first?’

‘What about that creature? Are we not to deal with it first? The others could lose it at any moment if we lower our grip, if we allowed a moment of weakness to show up at our feet!’

It was no pad, merely a rabid thing, like a belly, that soon revealed itself. Some transparent ooze surrounded it, and they dipped their dirty toes. One of them, out of the forty five having amassed what had changed, out of a green shard into a red one, a crystal made entirely out of segmented incisors as sharp as spear-shafts and various other needle racks all stuck together, stuck, in various attempt to inject and draw enough of its blood out to provoke some kind of infection that would have it bled, bled dry, then anchored inside every single wretched thing that entered it by the side.

It grew, it grew, it grew until they stopped dipping and just as the pool had, so did the belly, venomous, as it itself bore a strange wriggling organ that revealed a most succumb-to pair of crows that seemed viciously organic and fell flat upon the ‘water’ stop. A face appeared in one’s reflection. It belonged to one of the mans’.

Although more yellowish, more fallen apart, and during a time they had seen something that even now remotely reminded them of a time they resembled humans, by means of which they were, at this point, not to be looked at. Asiatic-at-large; fallen apart yet the jaded thing mixed with it afterwards, as the egg-shaped belly started pouring bubbles out; not slowly-drowning-like but a snail being cast in salt. It was largely disgusting but then again.

Most men had no faces, with the exception of those they had on top their chests, that had migrated ever since in the back.

There was no allusion any longer, they could see through their empty sockets, all those that were left behind. A strange thing had happened prior, a thing that was largely unexplainable, or at least would’ve appeared to be for most. Every single time these wild-stretched deformities appeased themselves with growth ‘hormones’ whose at large existence was beyond forgetfully unappeasable for the human thought as to dwell in, they modified their bodies as to dig their way in by laborious effort in order to allow for more space to be accumulated inside these casts and bodies of clay they could not do without, altering their recognition beyond any possibly measurable level since they had achieved a multi-dimensional perceptual depth that their primitive brains could barely keep up with, nor would they be capable of handling the already loathsome drivel they were being fed, manually, by all of those extra-added in perceptual visors they were forced to account for, incapable of either covering them out of stumping them out of existence, as that was feasibly improbable, unexpected, unlikely to happen, no.

‘We were sailors once, yet I’ve trouble thinking of the Seas of Flails where they have buried the twenty hatchets before surrendering again, to the very men they were forced to serve, our kings, dead. Poisoning their minds, water in their hearts, incest in their mind, the physicians were blind. Stabbed him during sleep, with coils and knives, then with a funnel, they fed him liters, within and beyond the normal acceptable range, yet I fail to see what would’ve happened if allowed to reign on what they were accustomed to or what evil would’ve found itself prevailing by.

Yet a descendant of the kingdom on top the water-swirl, whose end was in the neck of a giant, whose body was buried in, inside the fallen-church I’ve yet to visit since the birth of eighth’s son.’

‘The sea has betrayed us, I wager that ever since we were let known of it, there was no stop to the assaults of plateaus that crawled in, curdling the water into bags they held onto and kept them to themselves.’

It synthesized itself at an insolent level that allowed the inner hormones of life to appease the sudden urge to breed that’s inherent to every living biological organism, that’s rather quantifiable by every account to spread and come to life, by all means necessary, even to the point where some type of excavation would turn their broader senses inwardly, back into the dreadful synapses out of which the first Eve and Amman’s seed were birthed into the great hybrid, Ammaev, whose bloated gut had whisked itself torn out of a bodily-fluid-filled bag that turned the world upside down while the others bowed onto the lower stones where they lived to serve him, from that point on:

Or the ones that were devoid of ship. Incapable of escape, therefore as they would have it, cut around their feet, all men who had not escaped had their feet marked, either way:

‘There, there, relax, calm yourself before a stroke comes in.

There are unspoken things we cannot talk about since, you know. They want to take something from you. Out of you, the people of the stones, that were not here before.

Before water was taken from us, when the niggardish crowds of heathens started marching forth.’

There was a speech held in this rubbery-stone village, by one of the men standing as a representative of the whole elicited pulps, out of which he came out of. A few of them, bulb-stalk-like; used as elevators but with ropes lowering them back into the pudgy bellies in which they were incubated inside of. Twenty months or so; it was as much as he remembered. Born out of twenty consecutive mothers, each carrying a limb, and a fluid-shaped regular sized suitcase filled with tendons that all connected to from one great body when met by the rest of them. A cubical umbilical cord appeared to be twisted and held like a chair on top of which he stood, while still connected to it, organically speaking.

A dryness to every crook and cranny even after the sand's been swept out of then the eddies allowed for one of the basins to flow out of water's scum, the cloud's run-through heaps of now and then, come through there-after, one of the slithers of sound's forbearance.

No sooner than later, a train had arrived, although there was no station to receive it, nor was there a sane-enough reason to delay.

'I think neither of us understand why this is happening; do you? Come on, try to surprise me, it won't be easy but it will definitely make my stay a lot easier.'

'You should definitely stop talking before they hear us. There's simply too many of them within earshot to say something worthy of a private talk.'

'Lest you endear a tiny bit longer, I'm disinterested in entertaining this delusional paranoia of yours; for I am known as a person not to be easily eavesdropped upon; and I would have it still unchanged.'

Only one problem appeared to arise from the bowels of the earth, from one side to another, inside this maze-like unnatural heedless, pagan-night heathenistic rite withheld from the likes of mortals that by no means could appease the existence they took away from, then. A giant-partially chittined but not beyond a humanoid's hairline in comparison, insectoid being crawling a battle of an appendage that pointed backwards, as thick as a neck with only three open mouthed blades pointing in the back, cabbage-rounded up-front without a jaw but a right-pointing almost in a spiral-contortion zipper-like twisted but closer to a butterfly's twisted hose, noseless but fleshy tendons where it would lay, with two gritty eyes that opened as to allow the exit of a few more workers that lived inside of this livid-being they used a home to go back to if things got sour, and they would get, most plastically so.

Child of the en-corpsed mushroom:

Somewhere along the way it swam inside its luscious basin, with all the other crude abnormalities within its grasp, and therefore had, and mold begotten in the same place the other men had drawn themselves back into, nearing a camp their brothers had built. It was something of a most incessantly instilled in their blood dream, one that was taken from them during a night's whim when men of no letters written on their tags, their dog and their hound-shaped torches inside of which their arms became inseparably conjoined and entered them as many beak-deformed skulls appeared to have come in flight, attaching themselves by invisible frames to these taxidermist's delight, that held a single Greek's flame upon the outwardly shun upon it. That could not have gotten worse than it had now. A shrimp-like shit, curved expectedly with a conical stinger coming out its tail held like some kind of lance, with a strange mouth-elongated piece made out of various contortions kept together in that shell-like cabin held beneath a rounded dome, inside of which many control-panels appeared to be held inside of, not to mention the daring of a single man to come out of his many balloons inside of which his arms were become the leathery belted hose-like chambers into which his fingers were become the inter-connectors with the great inside-of-the-balloon machine he was working upon, the machinations of which could not easily be kept at bay, at the very least not as long as there was someone like them, nearing as the echoes of the men that spoke in the quiet's dark lost upon, the brow of the forgotten carp, the many blasted prophet-like figures without faces, the cowering creatures that had their laces brought to their throats, like niggering-lynch-ropes, the wretched that had been forgotten but had revealed themselves once again, and bastardly magi- of bullfrog like cones cut around for flowing airs of gas-like glass-formations to be done and more, their elongated leg-like chair-tendons that had brought them forth from like, empty graves surrounding death-like chambers that were being loaded once again by the hunter's carbines, taken from his private armory, as they were recruited as defenders of the lot, the plot of land that had been given onto him by none other than the travesty of evil that's been counted by the approach of evil during the day of Solstice gone upon the flight of sorrows, the carbines of no-tomorrow, Reno-taken, from far away, someone's private manufacturer supplied – armory, shop, in France, where they had been produced on mass for no other reason, other than this blasphemous cowl of destruction's come onto the day of sorrow when, upon the brow of the day's cast, the many silicone-like conical almost mask-like worn by a criminal trying to conceal his real actual indisputable on first glance and sight features from anyone that might even dare say something about him or the hay of many bodies that had been made out of him butchering them all, slit but clearly still looking like their amphibian deformities that were being kept a hold of by the legs, mouthless and only the side eyes, and the nose, other than the slits in which the many guns had been put inside of had been held- aghast, and confusedly cast in front of them, by none other than the huntsman's illusion-of a sunflower made by a spike jelly flying ring of almost thorn-like teeth that had a single bulb-like beam coming out of it, pointing downwardly as well, in guidance like some balloon's leather grabbable area where one would grab and hold on, as in fright of being taken out of the damps made out of the mushroom's child's lost, hopelessness that came at last, be found at home, as they revealed, the frogs, the carbines held inside every slit, repel, insolence being a prerequisite of the follow-in line through the dark inside, the blotched reality's eve during a heartless respite of unmet dreams unspoken lost gulls of since and ever cast within the darkness that followed of no winter's fallow, when the nurses-refugiary blight of yeast delighted in the eve, and even there, during the malformed nuisance that was the blasted cowl of the say, the raised mound that growled and came in sight, surrounding them as it elongated in a circle that almost trapped them completely, upon the wails of something that could only be referred to as some incapacitated delight, of prowl, snuck around, and follow-through the niggers-die-tomorrow cast of voices that came out of it, as the raise mount was become like the mountain of an abandoned island, holding but a night-erupting volcano that held everything from falling apart, while corpses came through their stony-graves, the gravedigger's reins being passed over by horses of shapes and other pointing downwardly at them creatures and other bacterial unnatural princes of disease that danced around the frog-cones, made of pure, green gas, while at the same time, the shrimp-like chitinous ship had come straight-near-night on the front of being met by naught else other than the ringed-fleshy tape-worm holding beacon that began, between the two of them signals of the most evil kind, being purport of all twas being said in the past, a relationship cast of all evil thought, devoid of that, strangled, by the machinations, both the viciously-looking stopped in place but floating together in almost loathsome figure-like worms of gas, the ring and the cones and the flying ship were only slightly forced to shimmer in a moment's second's last when, sudden yet heaved upon approach but listen, of blight withheld from all that would cast away the treason of the Tour the force, and cast-withheld, by none other than the inside-the-balloon kempt lord of evil sight, the machinations inside his hot-air filled bubble forced him to shoot himself down on a trajectory that would by normal means set him on a downwardly-pointing parallel to the ground but slightly on a hill-rounded, lopsidedly rolling down it path, which then regained momentum, as if gravity was on his side and the ground was but the end-forth lain end of a ramp he never even came within a dangerous limit's close to him being driven into it slide, when, all of the sudden he shot upwardly as if climbing on some stairs that were all lowered as if they were some resting escalator, when all of the sudden, he had almost came to perform a second vertical incline, shot, but upwardly this time, directly imitating or mirroring his first move that had gotten him to where he was to begin with, the first time but a few meters away, on a plane level that is to say, which could've been achieved if he had simply floated forwardly, awkwardly as well as it were, since it was mainly his legs and the rest of his body that were the 'sand' bags that added the adjustability in terms of how he's flung himself as well as in whichever direction he'd try to point towards, therefore met, by accident, since, despite the even level in relationship to his original plane of being or of standing in which he had initially been, his neck was slightly craned five or six degrees to his right, which allowed him in turn to fully observe what could only be; the United States in the seventeen hundred's well-observed by the evil heathenistic by the free-masons - farmers of large, Eye of Providence extract, made out of sedimentary rocks, un-alive, guardians, former guardians in living, but eternal in sedimentary eternally fossilized statuesque, serving as reminders and upholders of values, the United State's values and of the Constitution they reminded the citizens of, whom also fought in the Civil war, on the Southern side, with the Southerners, with the Confederates, flailing the Confederate Flags, wearing their cajoling benevolent to appease, stylishly-endowed by the colors of the states they represented during their feud with the insolence of some 'individualistic' Northerners which would eventually lead to the destruction, on the long term as a long term consequence of their actions; of American values; that by all means their ancestors, their united ancestors, on both sides had resolved to maintain the high standards of during their fight for freedom and what would under normal considerations be, romanticized nowadays, a standard for all the free men of this world, whose blame, but much sublime interlopers' faulty reasoning interfering with such approach of truth hardly-felt, could only be passed onto the likes of filthy niggers and dirty kikes, who had, by their acts alone and by the looming sight and reminder of their racial influences and much inferior racial stock, spat on the legacy that was promised to and by, to be upheld, by the descendants of those good old time American farmers that would eventually become the engineers, the workers, and the scholars who raised this fine country to its feet, but whose statues were unfortunately withdrawn from the public sight as well as from the public eye for no other reason than the fact that the kike-media's diseased rabidness would stop at nothing from antagonizing as well as trying to paint the fine, hard-working superior descendants of Aryans, inheritors of the Roman Empire, S.P.Q.R., descendants of the workers that fought and died for their country, for their children and for their people, whom are under threat of being replaced by the threat of miscegenation with filthy subhuman monkey niggers, a thing promoted by the Jews who are not white and are all pedophiles, and whose Holocaust didn't matter, and whose sub-human nigger-like state of Israel should be destroyed, but towards which American tax-money that is being taken out of their pockets - 's being stolen from, in the worst possible manner there is; by subversiveness, by a type of subversiveness that reeks of filth, unnervingly so, on the hinder legs of which society alone cannot stand on top of, civilization itself being doomed to fail if the foundation is poisoned, that being something that can be very well traced back to the jews, whom would ruin everything for nothing more and nothing other than the promise of wealth, the promise of power and the deliriously abhorrent desire of control, the wretchedness of that hindering the very thing that turns a boy into a man, the values as well as the torch of their ancestor's plights, history, culture, heritage, race and burden that no other race would go that far to uphold, the values of a superior peoples whose legacy depends solely on their purity and toil, of a man becoming his nation, his people, the lifeblood coursing through their veins, a continuous existence they not only hold in high regards but with such pride that their fight for survival, for progress, their strive for the ideal lends onto them a status well beyond that of human, nearing perfection itself, but which the lower races cannot control themselves but hold utmost, indubitably so, by all account, a kind of unforgivable spite, unnerving jealousy, perfidious loathsomeness they would project onto others instead of trying to come to terms with their faults as well as understanding that for the greater good of mankind, in the greater scheme of things, there can be no other race out there that will save humanity and lead it to a much more glorious future than the likes of the white race – this spirit, carried over by countless generations of American farmers, carried over from generation to generation of Greek-flame-like carriers of the ideal as well as well as by the descendants of the Golden Age, the American Renaissance, which in turn was manifested inside one of the workers, one of the mutated workers' single conscious thought that served as nothing else and nothing other than some manifestation of some ill-defined fear carried over through his intravenous tubular-veiny carried through him signal-like manifestation of a backwardly in time-glimpse time-capsule prescience-divined realization that he carried a slither of humanity in his veins, which for a moment compensated for a lack of much-to-himself and many others in a similar position to his, chemicals in the brain, needed in order to gain what niggers lack under normal circumstances, this not being what others would refer to as a prefrontal cortex they don't have, but self-control, which niggers also lack; I hate niggers; semicolon; mightily malnourished was the echo of distress, the dead weight carried by the wretched machine worked inside the mad-filled with air balloon that commuted the great ship's inner-workings that, it could not hope to discern the savagery of the head, that had belonged to a secret being that was being slowly produced or grown out of it, a diseased animal that would yet to have found ill thought of no little more to itself fine regard as to what was going on around it.

A volatile creation of no more than a few anchored to one another's bodies, dark-in-thought diviners, a result of something, little over the span of a few hundred years of being kept not only under isolation but under close surveillance by the: Divine-savants of Jagg, somewhere in the dark.

Wretchedly in charge with many of the conduits on top the great temple, they waited during the night of a thousand storms for one of the great bolts to lower its body of light onto their net of many wretchedly yet numb-holes in the air-vent thumbs; shaped scepters.

Ill-retrieved by no other means that one could be accustomed to, than the way of the fare-well-do done per chance by one of the golden rodded-mongrels that had followed after from the depths of the swollen cage in which they've been well-kempt, slaves carrying parts readily animated by sheer in-congruence of meat and shallow as were they, a feat unlikely to be held as anything but what it were. A desperate attempt to mourn for the ashes that were come from the girth of the tormenting vortex that had fallen during the least century's cast, whenever past, present of future's coming to an end and whether theirs would be a fine-wined, dined upon countenance, to have refrained from paining themselves as to go through one if not the first of the many rods, immediately being vaporized as they exploded on sight, with a sleigh-no less of many meaty growths forlorn, one could not rescind the countenance of those that were born out of their remains. Grown like plants for another life of servitude that promised to come to an untimely end's wrung upon, and never-done.

A few tracks would've made no difference whatsoever and that's mainly why they followed in. The beast would be watching them for now. An oblong with many outward-missing, geometrically calculable forms representing the gaps that kept dripping alongside the coldness of the night. A face contorted in a horn, a dolphin almost superficial look to it, and further down its 'neck', an elongated cysted blob sprouting out that held a few irreconizable features. Every building in town appeared to be connected. Sharp-fronted cruiser-beaked things of metal segments entering one another as they were welded in, forming various elongations of spines that entered and both drew out of each other in this maze-like thing of a chaotic mess people lived inside of. Chunks of metal shards and facets, forming larger statuesque people that moved back and forth, large metallic floating shards that either stood in or were connected to each other's apartment, or at the very least those that drew out and gone. A muddy river of dirt-outlandish, was what they were standing on top of; at the very least the people that were outside. Large jester-like figures with heads deformed like two hilled humps, with spiraling eyes and nutcracker's rodent teeth; dressed in armor-like Japanese samurais; or some Eastern Regalia with empty conical moons-partially eaten and devoured –blue –washed – and flashing with some eerie light, empty sockets that shone as they drew outside, the strange appendages they had been storing inside themselves for this long. But the large Fhelyar kept squirming, mad dolphin in the air; unable to air his deceit any longer in made therefore mistake such repair, it followed:

‘I’ve seen you trail step after step and I’ve yet to find a reason, such as I would be impressed to ask:

‘There’s a chance uncanny that we may find a way to escape out of this place.’

‘I wouldn’t be too certain about that!’

Red crabs started appearing from nowhere. Crimson crabs, in the millions; whom had taken over the entirety of the town and the city’s reaches, without there being any humanoid or similar of kin survivor; outside, although forbidden rue, there were a few strangers whom had joined the reaches of the rails, out of the suburban regions, much to their dislikes subdued by what was happening as well. One of them:

‘I think, I believe we’re caught, and emptily brought without a chance to seek resolve!’

‘You should be weary of what you speak of since there’s but little more need of being capable of chucking forth a rock, in order to have your or either mine, if head be brought in, cracked. Open or not, whether it matters could only be a timber of interpretation, but if likened to it, I would see the but little more and much more little to it damnation there to be to our eternal souls!’

‘And you instead would reckon something of the worst kind of manner happening as for a rapier ever-after cutting through mast, and least appease, and therefore cast away, in truth withdrawn?’

‘I can only stake in what’s already set in mind, nonce other nor otherwise. I would be a thief of restitution and bask in sacredness’ illusion; niggardly the nigger’s lynched. For him be told abhorrent ill!’

‘We should hold a queue for every sword, every red rapier, the ones whose fault is counter-point to our intrusion then!’

‘I don’t think that’s a thing that shall remain, nor fret a single bother-led for what’s been happening from that point on, from whence and ounce of largely wonder!’

He kept on going on wont and wont after!

‘There’s a reason to withdraw, or else we might get trampled by one of them now!’

‘What else is there to do if such’s the case? I can think of naught else but the embrace of the irresolute!’

A dark member came out of an abandoned twisted by its side thrown out wagon.

Tall and gloomy, pulsating with gas; out-flung out of his lower-side the chest wonton of a few annexed to him beings that squirmed inside, largely thrust forth and out of him of little worth, they begged and earned their punishment as soon as it's been felt so.

'There's a reason we're not speaking.'

'What is that?'

'We're dead, before we were alive, now, we're not!'

'Are you dead?'

'No, strictly speaking, we're sleeping, nothing more!'

'I wouldn't rule out the alternatives.'

Which were hindered with every second; they were lustfully tinkering some of the, ushered into the house.

'Shall we form a circle?'

'I'm awake.'

The man standing between them was clearly distinguishable from the others; stranger. He appeared to be human for starters; more human than them. Wide-awake, whereas they all had their eyes removed, someone did it. Everyone suspected him.

'I'm sorry friend but I think you're responsible for this.'

'I didn't do it. I'm not responsible for your trouble!'

'That is uncertain, we cannot say for sure, we cannot say for sure, it's you!'

Who did it? Who did it indeed? It could only be someone inside this very insidious room they had postulated themselves in, with as gnarly as an entry bastard as one could such adhere to march into, as displeasing as it were. No refuge could do a man any good than the incommensurable assurance as to be withdrawn from the civilized world as they were, if that were the chance at first, alarmingly made use of, as it was, the lights that were present in the room only did as they merged with the walls, as, only their arduous presence allowed for the comfort of a chimney's warmth to, without displeasing for the attention that was in-so far a thing of no bother in terms of how likely they were to express their disdain for what was going on around them. More or less in that case, they felt likely to be touched by means of whom no better tales could allow for such debusolatory tenderness, as one could only feel when carefully watched under the pin of stress, which ironically enough had not been stressed enough for the fright and their perturbing amiability being intruded upon by the alarmingly distraught verge towards which they were tilted towards as to scream or allow for their frightened disquiet to be taken a hold of in such means of being that they would allow for no other reason to continue as it had during the previous obscure yet distancing moments they had shared between one another. As they feared, more so, for some reason that this soulless ransom could somehow withdraw even farther from the social instability whose comfort was somehow deemed more acceptable than this static-innocuous state they had been forced into for the time being, afraid, rather, absolved of their tastes, having receded into a lesser shape and less than some solvent by their hands apparel they had formed a tent once gathered in a pile made out of their wreathed around, facets of some poignantly moist but dirty materials they had fashioned the pile into and as their carefully labored upon task had progressed to no farther than needed rapsallion's battalion stopped upon a nursery's task, they had finally come to the abode of no lesser respite than was actually needed to make a slight change, by chance, in their carefully thought arrangement than it was therefore required of them, to a point that allowed for the comfort of being removed from the presence of the clearly-wide awake man. Whose countenance was fairly met by nothing short of a sudden realization of absolved he could fairly nurture himself towards by means of such imprudence as one could only find it less-required of him to ask but to spare less than a moment in which he could explain how he's come onto the realization in the first place, as to explain his sudden change in mood as well as the venture he had decided to cast himself onto; by means of which he would not, by normal means find incumbent at all, by any chance or means. Therefore, upon being met by the plight that might arouse any single man of less boding to such degree that they would find themselves rather inconspicuously unworthy of such penitence, he finally decided that it was the ripe time for him to approach and make only what was due to him to have himself apprehend in the first place, without as much as intruding on their solace, but instead attempting to retort whatever they might find themselves capable of coming up with in as short a time as possible. As such, he stalled no longer and, while having prepared himself with a degree of extreme preciseness that no one would bother himself trying to accost since time would verge in a peek's blessing only when it was convenient for it to do so. By all terms of engagement, this was not a time proper for the taking or the making of, oft spoken of the degrees at which these insolent things without eyes had yearned to show, there was yet something else that he had not taken into account.

'You're insane, criminally insane, thinking we'd have anything to do with you. Whatever came into you has long bastardized whatever fluke of humanity there might've been in your souls; to think it so, no longer are you even to be surmised as one, no. Unlike them, you've lost something that's inherently human, something that can't be explained, something that can't be washed out of skin and pushed out on the floor, or scalped away, thrust into a bush then burned for hours.'

'How can you tell since you're asleep? Your eyes don't exist, nor is there any countenance to be felt that would dictate otherwise, for I alone know what little better can one do when surrounded by those of large sinew, to have been likened to someone of a similar fashion to them. But they, they're away, for both our kin and wilt themselves never-return. But of you I've little to no compassion that might be drawled or dragged, or to have felt something of compassion, I would refrain to say a thing as I refrain to now. It's dangerous, as you are so. It's something I may not be able to acerbate, for you are base of such a thing that could not obey the contemplation's calling for a minute more's respite.'

'Then leave our hut and gone thee be another way that neither creature, bore of Yore might look upon your cast and more, do not seek to cast us away with glance or to wonder what might happen if we were to spend a second more alongside you, since you know of us, you've known ever since you threaded upon our flight!'

'Intruded more likely, brother Fancy; he's of a rancid soul and I swear to thee that he is the culprit responsible for your swollen eyes, for what's been taken from us and for what's been hidden to our brimfelt touched disguise, for he had long pretended to be one of us, has he not? Or have we at least forgotten already what's been had, and what he's gotten? Of the yolk and of the cattle!'

'Truth bespoken yet I endear, as he didn't know, but we awakened several times already and we cannot know whether or not he's lying still, when he had arrived since.'

For they all disagreed when the stranger came to be and how he stole their eyes, despite how pretty. Pretty such he sounded, in peril and in woe, not to count upon the disgraceful tone of some fluke that entered each row as they endeared waiting through several winters, several autumns and clairvoyant summers that only brought black and tawny green suns instead of yellowish or pale white. Blobs in which swam others greater than them, for he told them everything. But liar he was called still, despite the truths he carried to them, of lack absinthe! It would've dragged for hours. Each of them in their respective corner contemplating; thinking of the resolute. It was even harder knowing they were talking stout.

'We each gain a corner when they grow.'

The room now had eighteen or some. Pushing into millimeter thin then expanding to a few centimeters over several hours – 'tunnels', which were in actuality short passages or extensions of the four actual corners that had become twelve, thirty six, one hundred and eight, so on and so forth, until they formed; or the room they were in had become the center piece of a maze. Many of the outsides lay obscure. Yet the walls weren't straight. But upwardly domed as to be ramps that curved over such a long distance that they began thinning, as they ascended, forming tips that pointed at the soil; or cast shadows upon one another as to form a jungle of fallen apart cadavers – the walls were made out of. Not human cadavers but some strange puffy things with hundreds of arms and legs and extending spherical with cylinder coming from their middle, but slightly flattened as to be pushed inside, key-bearing organs that latched into one another like some unnatural system of locks and pads. Whereas from above, it looked like a sea of gargoyle wings, or bats, if that was the ceiling and the floor, the sky.

'The suicider is about to come clean and eradicate us where we stand!'

'And what if he does and what shall be taken from us to bring as such to extinction's abode when rung upon there's but little more?'

'I think he's around the corner, anytime, anytime you open your eyes, he'll hear. His hearing depends on your opening and closing your eyes, exhaling and inhaling!'

'A pitiful lie, coming from someone who loathes mine vision; I pity thine envy, and your countenance as to be main-held by none other than the ones that hide inside of there.'

For hidden roads and hidden plenty, many of them hidden but readied. And readied for a reason as they were, there was no such reason to withhold, nay; a simple tune was heard somewhere, out there. By whichever way having been brought; kilt by force through vapors that were crude and siphoned little more than plenty dead-enthralled to work on the hedges. Clean, chisel and work everything to high accord. To have been withheld and seen it such, foretold.

A burdensome fowl, which could've dragged something if any were to be. Another one of those incessant fat ones, put in a circular tub, then rubber upon as the gravy-liquor had been brought.

‘We’ve been starving for days, yet there’s no respect as to understand why you had to wait for so long until the feed was presented in front of you!’

‘Who are you to tell us what to be fed upon and when?’

The one with a falling apart face, who had endured the passing of the lot, only to have himself calmed and once again, be brought to a spiel, at once brought to a dishelved countenance that others did not dare retrieve! Such an apparent withdrawal from all life could only mean a thing.

‘You’ve been holding out from me, haven’t you, brother?’

‘Of course I’ve been, not to mention that there’s an illness I could but not behold for long that I had to deal with before, before I got the chance to truly make a do with it!’

‘What would that be then?’

‘Something incredibly simple, something that one such as you could easily get a hold and a limb around, not to mention anything of the eloquence with which you could simply vanquish the leprous inexperience one would have if he were to be asked of it. Since it’s only a matter of time until, as I recall, they march in, by force!’

‘Who dares come from the Paradise?’

‘Riders, that shall march and trample all that dare stand tall and ubiquitous to their andante.’

Robbed of all nights that could follow in, they wreathed in a most perilous way!

A note:

‘To my dear, lovely wife; married on the moon of June, deep July; with whom I’ve spoken only once since killed; I did it on our honey moon, but now I’m ill. I thought myself be humbled by my abode. Though I have killed many women during my lifetime, I’m afraid that I may have gotten a tiny bit paranoid. You see? I’m frightened, yet endure. I think myself petty, yet I mourn myself, for that cure; that would bless my mind with anything even closely resembling something that could work, something that would make me unnerved no longer, therefore stall for some reason not to die during the prodding of a simple turn. And a whip and a crackle on my poor body snapper, whose lodgings are still unknown to me to this very earned for stay!’

An abhorrent wretch, if ever was there one; of no proper account drawing breath, known it since I met her.

‘My dear girl, but I thought you’d be here, for some reason or another, in the same spot.’

Under the same circumstances, whatever those be; it was truly hard to say whether or not she was listening at all, or whether or not it mattered the least how far he’d get to her during the following moments, not to mention that there was the insinuation her kind proceeded to bring regards to, as for them and what they were trying to do with her.

‘I think there’s much to discuss within the following hour. You’re sick, and I am here to cure you, then wed you for a decade or so; where you shall be properly taken care of, to a point where you shall only be well-adjusted, right until a point, the point where my satisfaction will be concluded. Then and only then will I have made it through; I mean we will. We will make it through, we have to, my dear. It’s only a matter of time until either of us realizes that there’s no chance for us to make it out alive unless you enter my possession.’

Therefore the girl rescinded her previous contemplation, while having only been of no more than an unimportant decision; from this point on, soles for soles, therefore row; and therefore the stench will reek no more since she would be left in without even having to. Having to; a nasty sound came from the floor, then the walls, the ceiling, following around what could only be described as being an incessantly annoying sound of some low hertz.

‘ There, there, there shall only be a few of us present here now until the next hour or so. I think it’s safe to assume their retreat comes not only as follows but as the demise’s gallows, therefore stench. It’s soluble by means of apprehension.’

‘ In which direction, then, if you’re so inclined to tell me where to and fro might I eschew what little is left for me to snare and clutch myself upon whenever they’re nearing a close call!’

‘ I cannot tell alone, as I’m in need of some, already gone, already shone upon the plight of this road upon no errand that might be due, and not to withdraw whatever there’s to cue or lay onto them again. Those who listen to us still refrain from saying something that may yearn a scorn, most abhorrent, more of all!’

‘ Then, will you join me in this errand that might see us both still travel long today, to yearn and sombre, and therefore fonder, as you may be, although still cherished as one might see, my friend you’re of no remark. I see you as the one and only one that’s been seen today, of better yearning, therefore stay!’

‘ I can’t and you know that, you’ve been made aware even since the day we met, long before we stayed our hands from being caught and sprayed, whatever word or lay, or therefore day. We stepped onto the graves of Easter’s lay. And therefore angered many Moors, upon the Moons of troubadours! Many of whose disciples still follow, many that are still to come and trust each shallow, rivers, treacherous apparel, and some that might be spilled here and titter, therefore bitter, yet. I see no reason to have lain a second day onto my hammock or deceitful hay. For that might’ve made me much lazier and bitter oft, over something that’s been brought, that I have thought myself so uncannily distraught, to have it yearned for, despite it still missing!’

‘ Or, perchance, if I were so-much so to take my immediate leave, would you so humbly seethe over such conceit as to wreathe no second thought alarmingly discerning every word of trail and bramble up-and heave remain of what’s been said, from this point on and onto greater, humbler, numbed as you may hear, that which I may therefore truly year for, asked to, such drear no greater command that might have me trail my way back, all the while, barely misgiving, such a hint that might be hinting, of no better due than what’s been said, and therefore as I may therefore stay my hand as to interrupt my very own self for wont of what’s been had, will you do me honour and see me not after the beauty of the anchor when, upon hearing of my salient sail, through the several seas there are and the New world as well, will you, blessed friend just look the other way and spare no other thought of mine, letting me wriggle and wreath as I'm benighted and never come to life thereafter? Will you do me such honour as to see me go through the after-life whereas others have failed to see me still myself with cork-screw thunder, or through the stormy rain of much enclave, and trees that failed and others that have seen much better days, or the ones I thought I could see you, upon such knotted remorse, or anything and anything at all, whatever might it come? Will you leave me, and allow, for me to fade into the obscure as fate has willed, as destiny triumphed, as I sung the last of the world that had me once benumbed to all the pain and sufferings I had to share? Will you forget me simply as if I never existed, yet refrain from ever speaking that blasted word? The one making me quiet whenever I sob? Thinking of what wretched might come, once they hear my dreadful thumb trail itself upon such list, such that only beasts could only should out and devour my fist! To be lacerated and maimed by things that would never even dare during their eventful, most strident days take a jab, the bandits of the numb, the ones I shared drinks with, turned into animals once my pockets had been turned upside down, for I could not afford them any longer, past the spirits, therefore chucked into the grave; but you, my friend, the one who stayed. I could never hope of darker fates, of lesser thought and past remains. But of you, my friend, what little I have and stave whatever comes on and off, for you to look past and over, for you, I beg of thee, look no further than at the man you're staring at, as each moment passes, as each and every single one. I ask of you not to bathe in remembrance but forget! For I've been spoiled past rotten and my heart is spoiled as well; as it's become, something beyond dreadful, something starving itself past the most irrational, past the most atrocious thumb that might be filled with mould, stuck in some empty pit or hole. Anything but less, lesser and the few, the ones, the fewer, never true! Look the other way whenever we do pass, or have us yet forgotten, so, we may never shed a tear cast! By no means should you think of me as anything but leprosy! Dreadful in stance, dreadful in lance, of unlordly calling, belonging to no other wreck, than the one that such it were bemused as to be lost upon the endless waves that shall carry my body, chucking it into a sea of peace. Treason as to be felt by ancestors that have never seen no reason as to doubt, to see such wretch still be, of a kind, remain alive, while their vigilance had only thrust them and their thoughts in dark; I ask to be forgotten, sir, as worthless as I am, at last!

‘ But how could I commit such an act of evil under the watch of not yours but mine and mine alone, the masters of my blood that govern upon naught else but my empty evil, vile soul?

For I have cast such glance even before you've been aware, even before I could abhor trying to trickle such jest as you might've thought one such me aware of! I, I only think of what little power and strength I have to shout, at the top of my lungs, while I still live and as I'm still alive, while still in proper power, as my title's still endangered, even after, such exchange had taken place. I seek only a thing to be betokened, such is it that I'm frail, I yearn, I wait, in desperation. This attrition that you ask of me as you joust in no direction, yet your eyes have yearned and told me since, that you need be called upon, the hour of the sin. For I have known, and ever since and long ago. That it was you who killed him in triumph, the punishment for which, was ever-known; to you, to many as to I. For killing the man who had my father's life, for reasoning with honour during one of the darkest, to have ascended and basked upon, hours, when I stood but numb, as the culprit almost run, upon lays and hays, and many trough, carried on top of days, in which they may've marched, with him, but for you, now they did with him but chopped apart, each piece lend onto each trough to carry through the many fields and lanes of deep sinew, of yellow suns of hay and gone, when the empty quiet's ban! Upon each man and servant known to me, to have jeopardized everything, now I know why you must flee, as to be gone, as to be lost to eyes that do not know what means to have been once alive! But I cannot let you so forlorn, to have taken leave as to be mourned. As I have mourned my father once, as I have thought it to be something that might last even the most absolved of each crime that might've taken something out of me, I seek your such, benumbed and staunch upon a brothel's Eve, to take you as my brother since; befriended until end's awaited time, to have been set upon this plighted flight. And if the storm that's is to come, descended, upon our cruel paths and therefore ended, both of us in ever-trough and for that reason, I could sue; for such a court of spirits ever since, where I the jury and you, the prince. For I the father that's been slain, seen by a judge of empty grains. For when we starve, therefore to think at last of a reason to be gone, during our long journey and awaited gone, I shall think of nothing other than the travesty that were the past, of the loyalty of you, my friend, something I have yearned for, throughout the entirety of my life, but which I have never been capable, nor am I aware of ever having known if possible for me to show, and follow true to my endeavour. To allow nothing to trail upon you, from this point on, or therefore sever what little time have we alive!'

'Then we have come to an agreement if such's the case, as the admirals, Jaundice-Airle, dear man, shall stop at nothing but to hunt and haunt you upon their end's days and therefore after, beyond despair and beyond that day when you may think there's ever been a chance to flounder any kind of dearly escape, as might be needed to be called even before you thought of a reason to stay. I see now. There's but little to no chance, for me to have you think of anything else, for me to force you to change your mind as you're set. Beyond it, beyond reason and beyond the graves that look upon you from their smirking countenance withheld. I cannot force you to change you mind, and I can dearly think of no other reason you may be inclined to think of it, otherwise, it is set. We shall sail until the end of our days and if they're to come too soon, so have waned the gods that were under our glistening stars, the ones talking of some days that used to belong to us, during time we were alive!'

'And with this we leave!'

Onto the dock they went and into a star-shaped, spherical boat they entered by chucking themselves into a barrel that was transported into the middle of an inner smaller sphere that had all the crewmen held into peculiarly moving crystals, cysted and encased with cackling faces dancing and flying around and inside. With every wooden plank that made the greater sphere they were inside of creating millions of humanoid outlines that were overlapped and overlapped each other as if they were in a sea of dead-folk that, sometimes spat out wooden fish that leaped around, yet no like bullfrogs, instead like marionettes, followed after by peculiar man-shaped submarines with empty black sockets, and whose back tails were giant bullet-rounded with an inner, expandable fluid-filled with organs being preserved inside of, cylinders that had retractable teeth coming out as spikes that became fleshy upon being materialized. Yet, as these spectral things made their way into the spherical ship, and as they began coming into 'existence', they started breaking apart, appearing in pieces, here and there, an eye, a half-of-face, some leg, some two-quarters of the cylinder cut-lodged inside the outlines, stuck inside the wood-but not all the way through as to create holes, lodged like some sea-urchin, black-spiked, pouring out of itself fluid, which dripped inside and on top the floor, as it fell, all came along just finely! These peculiar syringe spongy humans, despite belonging to some submarine extraction were much tinier and far more compressed than previously expected. With that alone being taken into account, there was this to be kept in mind. Everyone suffered inside the ship and, while the spirits were materialized in a fleshy apparition bodily creation kind of superficial thing of no ambition, every man had lost their eyes. Empty blood-black sockets everywhere!

‘I am the captain of the ship, still! I have remained as I still am and I shall endure from this point on until the day I shall be capable of doing it no longer!’

But treason was pardonable by all account, for the captain was a rotten organ, damp with wretched hubris himself!

‘My dear, you’ve wakened yourself again, allow me to indulge in picking off a prick off your nose and kick him out in the open square, in the middle of the highway curb, where he may be trampled by the charging iron bulls, dying starved, as I’ve observed him, even before he was born, by the parents I was the leader in charge of choosing for the breeding schedule to commence; growing; I being his fatherly figure for the longest period of time after killing both of his parents by means of wishing them dead, which they immediately did.’

‘I understand, they died; can you wish me dead as well?’

‘I swish and fiddle with the thought but I shall not give in!’

This madness shall be brought to an immediate end one way or another, whether it’d be the last thing I shall be doing before the pandemonium can take place!’

Lady of the house

An adorning statue to the other ones she had collected throughout the ages shone a bitter light upon her shallow face. The queens and the baronesses had granted them their trust when it came only to the most intrusive of operations carried on and over through her cast, the only room of her house, being, four great empty walls, bricked, a ceiling with pulps, a floor of tenebrous tendons, four great chains coming from the back and a coffin she resided in, the bed, the wretch had hidden in this cove she lived in, a room beneath the ocean floor, where drowned were the corpses that were brought as food by her servants, the parasitical sea-cucumbers of the Gnod.

‘Another meal ill-taken; my dear sister!’

Spoken at the other, flayed as she was on eighteen hundred fifteen canvas sheets that floated around like kites in her cave; cut evenly, but become, over a long enough period of time, entities of their own, immortal and eternal, spitting little children infants that grew into sluggish humanoids with bulbic heads that opened their mouths and drew out the same chiselled almost idol-shape, a long nigh-goblin shark head, bearing a chin like that of a man, toothed like a nut-cracker, with strange side-eyes belonging to her sister no longer. Clubs they were used like to work in the mine, and they mined golden and natural crystal oysters they brought her as the prize for her cherished work, livid as she were, untold.

‘My dear, open your eyes, you’re a beauty, aren’t you? My dear, dear, most cherished flower, I could not have you stay still for a second more, not that I would be incumbent on asking of you for some. Some child, I need a few more of them so I can finish my masterpiece!’

Glory to the man he had created out of the few sons her sister, or sisters, if one were to count the lot, with what’s been brought to her eyes beings something she could not fully endure the sight of, no doubt!

‘I could give you a pearl my dear, only because you fashioned me a membrane that I’d like to enjoy having!’

‘A slither and a coming of disgrace to the age, I see the pup of tulips that’s come out of your girth, great appeaser of disgrace, but I’ve come to ask the cones for wanting!’

Slithering in notice had her wont returned to the same coffin she’s been spending most if not all of her bothersome nights in, trying to speak with wild defectors, in her dreams, choking upon the spittle that the crude sons had brought to disjoint her of the chains, since inside of each and every single one of them there was, a piece of her hidden, a limb, as disguisedly coated in chrome of alloy gelatine, that would hide her spare-parts, from being cruelly broken apart, so she may not come together when put back. Since it was no secret at all, everyone loathed her. More than anything in life, more than anything that could even vaguely be acceptable at all. A disgrace with no face, a wretched creature, the wretchedness she vaguely promised to dissipate never came to pass. A liar they thought, we’ll get to her, and she shall be made suffer if it’s within our power to do it. Time after time again, plot after plot befuddled by their sole infirmness, as they slowly became of skin and men, although still as slugs, with goblin shark idols now made of marrow and of bone, in humanoid skull-shape elongations chiselled, coming out of fully opened mouths, like that of giant bubbly pillow-far lips as well as elongated arms that held the place for the sluggish eyes, legs, suffice to say, were moulded into the tails, like sirens, but only capable of crawling until forcefully separated, whereas their eyes and their jelly-spread features were spread in most innocuous spots across their bodies, sometimes rubbed upon when trying to draw themselves upon great distances, projecting pain upon silent howls as not to wake her up, that they might be punished. One night she awakened. The door of her coffin fully spread and beckoning for her return it cried, tears running down the floor, but she was mad. Leaping around like some devil, dancing as she grabbed and wrestled with the sons. Maria Alghon simply rolled them on the floor and stomped each arm, then laughed with spittle on the crown of their soles!

‘But you cannot kill me little puff! I shall have you thrust into a wall now and I shall keep cackling if I want to because it makes me feel good inside!’

With which she gave a smirk and a devilish thing it were, before trampling on a few more of them, dancing more wildly and violently in front of the fish that came out of the water ‘pools’, which suffocated themselves only to have a look at the treatment of these buffoons while their moths did nothing but fly, at the tallest corners of the cove, confused by what was happening around them now.

It was worth thinking it over, but they were not solely allowed to.

Wretched

They rested on the brow of a torn apart well. A parcel of reveries that didn't fit together yet were completely plastered on top of one another, being made out of large cut-material like elongated grocery store bags, in which weird squirming creatures were put inside of, and, while also being incapable of properly breathing since they were incapable of doing so on their own, that's where the other tube-like growths appeared, whereas they entered through some of the cuts; in which they could breathe acid rancid poultry dreams of snouts that spread among them.

Viciously, in the distance it charged a man down, the Pantheon-man, dressed in his golden armor, pinned the aggressor down by the neck, pressed his arm downward against his throat, then, started again, his most irresolute push-through that followed after. His left arm rested humbly on his Adam's apple, ever-so drearily shoving it in. Whereas his right arm started pounding against his fast, with a slt, and trtttl, where the top of his nose's bone cartilage started giving away; bleeding out of it as soon as he could give out a quail, in order to alert the other birds that were making their way in, bleeding profusely, most disturbingly agitated as he was.

'Release me, please, I beg of you, can't you see that the mist is gone?'

'It's been replaced by the gas, as it's taken hold of the top of the sky to an almost entirety beyond belief. You need to stop breathing immediately, as I need it, in order to feel satisfied with myself for tracking you down for this long. You couldn't understand the trouble I went through to get to you.'

'Then please, let me go, I beg of you, please, allow me some respite.'

Large trunks that followed after drew much nearer onto them:

'You wouldn't want to take too much of a cut of him now, it's morbid.'

'What is? Why are you disturbing my processing of his face with the side of my fist? There's just so much to absorb with my knuckle sponge and so little time I can enjoy it before he finally passes out.

You simply cannot understand the joy I'm getting out of it; you know? You cannot fully get to know anyone without turning their face into a pin-pricked allergy reaction looking fully bloated puffer-fish looking man, can you?'

'I wouldn't know, it's not as if we tried before.'

And the other trunks only drew nearer, before the mist of red paints started coming in. Dripping on top a few drops at a time, out of a bloated red body of many puckery lumps.

Bulbic bodied as he was, a two-tall head spiked of eight stalagmites that pointed at the sky aligned, its back-body was a gun-cartridge twisted in a semi-circle growth, that of a peculiar twisted-around moon put through a 'forest' of tendons and appendages it carried along with it. Its eyes two thin elongated stalactites pointing down, coming out of the front protrusions out it face, twisted springs for teeth, and put together was this king looking flying heap that came along. It spoke of evil days that only drew on the disease that had been on-lain inside his pucker-lungs:

‘I of all would not have myself cherished wickedly by those cruel mental mongrels that would worship me so, if I had been given the chance and were in your place, I would not have myself be taken as to show any kind of weakness would be drawn from mind. As I would have myself but put through blindness, bitterly blind, as I would have myself not be named upon the pillars of words in the depths of the cast upon the world of darkness from beneath the bowels of the world from which I’ve been drawn out of, I seek no bitter satisfaction, nor I ask this of thee.’

And with a twist, this creature showed upon them, as much as one could see. The rumps and growths, the spine-tingling forlorn protruding probes that oozed shakily aware, many of them being as thick as coffins and even having some of them in, the children of men, humans. It was a wicked fly-ish flier, that bore no legs after all; while, it just so happened for its lower-body bag contortions to, have been remarked as being unfitting of sustaining all that weight underneath him, for more than a few obvious reasons one could not approach. Not yet, since it didn’t help either, they only dwelled ever so much closer as to understand. What was the maw beneath it? Why was it so contorted in the back? It’s as if that body-thing, that twisted mass was but dinosaur-Cretaceous. Twisted, such, in mind:

‘I beg of thee to stop torturing the man. You’re not processing his words, you’re merely butchering the poor man, you’re making it seem as if he’s nothing but the lousiest thing that ought to be starved of decency.’

‘Careful around that beast, it’s covered in nigger-rockets that are ready to be put to his deploy. He will rape us if we get too close to him and we’ll die of rape-fuck.’

Ugly tattoo-filled bodied-cover sheets of newspapers with blood-written words and a welder’s helmet on top, and a cloak; covered in missile-shaped niggers, whom were wrapped around him like explosives. Like grenades, ready to have their heads chewed and spat out, then explode.

‘He has just infiltrated in our heads, and is planning on living in there, rent free.’

‘You fucking bastard, do you not understand what that means? He’s fucking loaded with enough of a load to blow up the eight pentagons, let alone the side of your pout-sacks.’

A blasphemous godly hinged upon thing with eight heads followed soon enough. IT could not be decided if it truly lived, instead one could see what happened to it, from the side, as many, rather small elongated things came out of it, deadly-bowelled in tar-gut blood clot, cries, which had enameled it, on top of piles of decrepitly rotten cadavers with wheels coming out their heads and off the side of their ears, while bearing elongated tongue-like flying shape-tails that spin like drills, which are unconnected to the rest of their bodies, yet continue their flight, whereas the lower bodies are set in various vicious motions that could not be stopped.

A dark armored man with eighteen swords racked on top a giant basket filled with hundreds of killed citizen walked slowly towards the dark point, a spectral look to his fallen over haunch figure only drawing away the breathe of the less fortunate to be minded as anything but weak of heart. A tendon of gas sticking out of the back of his head; creating puddles of rancid green behind, as he only killed the last of the Emperors of murder from the land of Nak, with him being strapped on top his chest, this man being driven made. He opened one of his blades, only being split right there, where one could see, even the slightest hint, of a visible miasma, then he’d know. Like shamans looking for the coming signs of storms, there'd be, a cloud made of ailment, taken to thee, scouting behind stones of verdure- red, painted in the armies that fell, on dead-end grounds. Whereas there used to be life, now it's gone. The man being only a relic, recycled from ages gone. A heartless beat coming out of him as the giant walking gait, the ship, the thing with many faces and with many feet drew towards him, while its many faces long before exposed would say, and shatter after, called for, standing on top, dark remains being their shoes, for every leg was a dragon-snapper thing with eyes for scales and most obtuse things, spikes coming out of it, and out of them, many more, to life. As they would each ask in turn, they said, upon the man whose nature was little more if naught else would he refrain from asking, and stand there, yet in trance and dancing, like a mad spirit in a grove of fallen things, like emulating-madly vigor for the lies of fairies would do little for one to seethe for such, was there was no like to hear them again, but watch:

'I've waited in vain for you to appear and near one of us, out of fear that we might draw for long, we kept watch and made a house, of pucker dirt, en trance, have I but asked, of brother never-known, in dark dimension thrown, as castles of puddle-cattle that arrive, from the distance, yet to dye their ever-present-given, thing a mirthful pearl, of such, would thee have known but ask:

I give onto you, but bask in the glory of those things that flash, as should be known but after.'

Stranger

He came out of nowhere and pounded his face, striking all the way throttle-in thrust, clicking his toes as the other man stumble like a belligerent drunk and fell on his knees, begging him to stop. His right hand flew across his face from one side to the other, followed by a similar motion soon after, followed by an uppercut from his left once it rested back in its sheathed shoulder socket. And the man was on the ground, resting on his back, fully thrown and closely to a pail. Resting as if uncannily so; if one of the men around, standing near the sidewalk could recall; he jostled down the street and came back queerly with a door on top his craned back, holding it from one side to the other, when all of the sudden he simply smashed it on top the man, breaking it crack for crack, which deeply lodged, all shard-and thorn, pieces being born inside his gut by now, slowly coming apart as they planted themselves in, thoroughly, the door-handle missing, it began drifting away, with part of his leg dislodged, out of its socket, his throat elongated, to the side of a car in which it buried itself, nesting in one of its fiery wheels, the curvature of which making him feel, although flaccidly-deflated, for a moment, he was laundry, spinning around and bloated in blood, soaked in clot, hardened at that, a pile of maple leaves that were contorted in a manly meat formation, an altar, whereas the man that drew towards him, back, incapable to stop, his sociopathic tendencies having brought, fifteen meters in, the sirens having already stopped, since they were or had been on the run for the last eighteen months or so, with the podium-light and the wings being set-in-place, and a pack of dogged niggers no longer chained, walked towards him as well, unshackled, many of the people that were around him being very much so of a mind to cut, having had revealed themselves prior as being federal agents that were mad, with their knives equipped, the wrong way, blade merged with fingers and with toes since they were interconnected, like prison-bars but gut-hose in which harpy-birds agape, but straddled to a fashionless sense, of wonder, at what came after, since there was no option, nowhere near, at a run, the man knowingly approaching the conclusion that he didn't know where this strangely malignant conundrum would take him to, gone, would he, most likely thinking, rather pink, his brain and sinking, Ta-Thu-Du, Oh-oh, crossing his mind, to his resolve's benign' rat-rat-rat-rat-rat-tu-thu-thud on the floor, they approached, the beast whispering in his ear, a messianic brooch adorning his neck, against on whose reflection, standing, the image of the leaper with two heads, many deformed horns, with frog-leap legs that were shaped like giant dinosaur cartilage things with outwardly heaving spike-shaped D-mons, with circular scythe as in lynch niggers at night, cradle-puffer gardening-tool hose shaped giant incisor aligned, eight on every side, pincer-things upon which it walked, distractingly, as to take away from the giant deformed giant humanoid-heart shaped body that bore many compounded eyes that opened, revealing shaft-strike in fading solidified lights made out of mouths that floated away alongside their strange swarms of Day mons, whose out-pushing mouth, in the front was filled with many elongated-thrust forward formations, misaligned, bearing peculiar, almost cylindrically molded, Gatling guns, wrapped by spiked bands with upward facing open tubes that gave like to smoke crackles, on top of which black womb-parasites that would induce abortions on nigger-mixers, thoroughly yet pungently, as in a vicious manner-yet invited, follow-after killing their hosts, which he was now, directed towards, the man that is, who was incapable, because of a psychotic manic rage that entered him, all of the sudden, pre-planned with disgustingly long-ruminated upon premeditation, which had initially been given birth by his OCD-cancer rust-blood knife he shot, through a rifle aimed at the side of his head, Tuberculosis angels floating around him, telling him the secrets of this world, now, and then, time being completely dilated, whereas the helicopter bore, instead of wings, large plates-like fridge gaping, unnaturally-hard-to look at children of the moon whose dance brought a rain of blood-boils that started pumping oil in the beaten man, whom by now, although, this Criminal-lord Fashium-Rokr, had, gone, insane, mental-disablement, an agony of the new century man, his father- who was a lamp, and lamps can be taken and eaten out of, poison, that being, the gas inhaled, since hookahs are no different than the blood light he was staring at, as the world was encompassed by dark clouds of faces and he drank his own hand, the father, being his hand, speaking to him, in the dark languages of Quantum-communion, spanking his mother in long-lost memories, where he remembered such things employed into him such as violence and knifing, being one of the main-put-through deciders of why he had decided to pick up on the life of crime which turned the world around, casting it in a pit of malignant darkness out of which it could not get out of, since it was part of, his knocking on the noggin, that the police-men have been doing for a while now, twenty minutes or so, at the very least, hardened batons with blood; my mother just told me my sister has picked up Pneumonia from somewhere, being forced to take a trip to nearest Hospital where she was forced to wait for twenty or so hours until she finally got the results of her lung-scans, a huge fucking problem with the PR department there, advertising an alleged 'effectiveness' that's yet to be objectively observed in the private sector; before he snapped back to reality, where he woke up, being surrounded by one hundred seventy seven corpses that belonged to the officers and the helicopter, that was standing beside him, bleeding profusely, and the niggers, especially those filthy fucking animal-niggers, whom he hated the most, only to find himself, in a strangely lurid turn of events, most stranglingly so, surrounded by a pack of young thug-nigger children, all armed up, threatening to hold him, as a hostage, and ask for 'money', 'from whom?', ha-ha, fucking niggers, who the fuck will pay for ransom for a killer-thug man like 'him?', dumb-fucking nigger monkeys, fucking retarded fuck-monkeys shits, ha-ha, whereas incapable of knowing otherwise, Fashium, still-on-the-sidewalk, uglily-nasty-washily grazing, Criminal-Spirit God turned onto him, in-part, he, coming out of his back, as he was become split in two directions, one walking towards the brokenly-yellow brick tinted lamp, the other, cattle on Mars, Niggers, niggers, niggers, niggers, ooh, ooh, agh, aa, turn him back onto them, as to lead him, blindfolded, back onto their lair. It was barely standing, a garage door opened, garbage by the side, a junk- put through salt, brought from the sea-moon, a tall diseased man without arms was their king. He was of no race, tall and filled with tadpole shaped parasitical bulb-syringes filled with dope-disease. A most peculiar set of four companions forming a belt, a gut-hose wrapped around it and pointing down, a deformed as if a car had been completely smashed by two recycling-junk-yard things, but also filled with boils, a torso-with elongated shoulder pads, being, puffing disease around.

Both of them were, most disturbingly. They came out of an ugly tent.

‘Why is there a tent in your garage?’

‘Made cat-yogurt out of masks and acorns, it has eyes.’ Walks on the ceiling, it does. Niggers clap, they are easily entertained. Cats can be fed children, they are born and are part of the communism, until cut off and stabbed, repeatedly.

‘Are you the pack masters?’

‘I’m the nigger-patron, indeed I am, the master of volatile pucker and venomous blood!’

‘I want to ethnically rape-kill cleanse niggers and kikes and splatter their entrails all across the walls, slit their throats open like fucking rust-filled and covered in gore-rat fuck-shit until they’re completely butchered like the sub-human animals they fucking are. I hate niggers, I loathe kikes, neither of which will ever be human by any, even remorsefully comprehensible way of self-determination or any kind of determination whatsoever, they are in-humanly sub-human, deformed, beaten, nigged, ought to be stomped, should be killed, god I’m looking at an ugly nigger and a fucking sub-human disgusting looking kike standing side by side, two fucking filthy dumb-smut nigger-like, niggeresque look-alikes that ought to bathe, in acid and in boils, embroidered in a melting gut, filled with snake-saws, being just drowned in fucking violence-murder! A dark creature, like a giant melted in the front, disgusting tongue-thing foot front, melted thing, like an upwardly inclined stone that’s a seal-formed, or anatomically similar to it, thrust upward into a, seen by the side axe-like formation, in terms of width, as it would be seen like a deformed thinned on both sides box-thing that’s slightly concave and sharp, thinning out front and backwards, bearing a humanoid necked-head boil-wart thing that’s sprouting out of it; with an elongated swampy look and stick-thing bug-like appendages coming out of its head like hairs and in the front, one longer one, like a fisherman-angler’s pole thrust forward, bearing a pig snout at its end, out of which torture organs would come out of, only, for the sole reason of torturing and lynching the niggers and the kikes repeatedly, forcing them to suffer out of an endless thing, filled their guts with bubbles of blood-rage that would splatter them even farther, before they’re being slowly delivered to the Dark Oven, in which both the filthy niggers and the kikes would get endlessly Holocausted in a hellish-realm of nigger-torture. Many similar parasitical sluggish things, that were goop-like as well but following soon after, hundreds of them tackling the niggers into a nigger-like oblivion where they would simply be destroyed!

A tower of Babel filled with most nastily set sounds drew eight seas apart as they came into life, not here nor there, or in any other place where life would do, but in a broken image, the uncanny semblance serving momentarily, seven ages or so, where hundreds of people not only died, but the ghostly specters of dead, out of the cemetery tombs, decayed-zombie like, corpses with heads, all spiked with strange notes, gibberish floating out of them, as well as, eight drenched-in-blood swords, many of them uncannily deformed in the most obscure way possible, since there was no possible way one could be contend with the time of day, that was passed between them, men without heads but with cats sticking out of them,

Maurice Mort, whose Babel-like suit filled with nasty eyelid' cones, only took the breadth away from the dark unsurfaced puddle, out of which they began taking everything apart, the ship that is open, in which all the adorned parts, including the vestibules of most desecrated of holds was stored in, across the many tombs that had been taken, draftingly from war-zones, a Soldier's respite only having lasted for a few melted candles that ran out, when the memory of humanity's art, just crossed his mind again, Mort, being very much alive, or felt so, I wonder when will the next cataclysm come so I may leave this disgusting place, of reasonless grated together, many races being strapped –conjoined twins with many arms that were wings, and come onto them the pincers that used to work on the outer layered plates across the other-planets that emerged, many of which were capable of flight and talk, bore life, an insignificant dart, from one place to another, not in his mind, and perhaps wilt have happened in any other place, if there was a reason to do so, since he was struck, all of the sudden, while thinking of his brother, bleeding profusely out of two broken wounds, that fell apart, his left being replaced immediately by a prosthetic that came onto him, a body made out of corpses then joined him, and they ran while being chased, both sharing this momentary solace, through which, far away, they could both see, one of the windows was me, I was that window, the cat with four eyes, stretched, facing them, a façade of stars playing with them, since all of the mad cocked-in and out, come through existence darting through Mars, another hole came through it, and flew in one of the Sailors that brought with him dark rods filled with pincer-guns, which belonged to his brother, Koflu of Northern Leisure Strings, come onto the world, a price who dreamed of made-up verdure by the other worldly set abode, through which his rage burnt, and left naught alone until everything was destroyed, having submerged into a pit of darkness out of whom, well-betokened, yet begun was he become, a hellish king serving over a stitched together by the bodies of his enemies – Paradise with many succumbed under extreme pressure broken-homed orphan-holding cells, that were topped by candle-wax melted cylinder-Rook segments with elongated wide-winged spread shaped things, whose back of the heads were cracked and bore large cysts filled with see-through fluid, all equipped or having inside of them – skulls, whose 'beaks' were holding 'worms' but those were organs actually and they were gone, by midnight, not to miss the coming of the sun-drop, since they would burn otherwise, allowing for escape and refuge to occur, when nasty-thing, demerge as into quiet, after, and never-wonder, wont is taken, told for some and better worn-out, left out cold, many of them nested in the caves. The Paradise emerged, and it was only when the fires had been put down, that many of the darker holding by the arms growth-filled flying, wingless lurids could come out for air.

A darkened tooth with many heads began shooting fists everywhere, at every possible point, without outing itself to be caught, pushing out little pegs of steel, impaling everything in sight.

Farther away:

Both of them snapped at one another as soon as their surroundings were clear. No more waiting and no more pretending for something to happen, this was the chance to finally get rid of being at each other's throats with nothing happening. If only one would.

'That's it ladies, keep going at it, keep up with the tango and the waltz, the pressure ain't going to stop until one of you is down, sitting tenebrously lain on top his back, wide-spread against the better side of the floor, bleeding.'

And as much as they could enact each other's play-per-due, it was already laddered, by each side of the room, several holes being made as quick-after past through noon, push-troughs being lowered in, carrying World-trade center topplers, wrapped nicely with rounded blue-pick whitish marble tape-worms inside each and every single one of them. Even one dirty simian could be seen as to be wrapped around, put in claws-and almost, sawed-off from the rest of them, it came running towards them, bearing, splatter dist of steel, coming out of him as well as some shards of glass it rushed through, putting itself down along the way, not that it matter.

Two men charged it down just as soon as it lay its final-breath, two more entered the room as well, readying themselves as for the alarm's stopper:

'Careful now, I don't think it's dead, not yet, not yet. I can see it breathing-thoroughly through one of its back-tubes as well as the other thing.'

'What other thing?'

'It's a flagon, they've put its organs in, that I can see with my own eyes, see the pair of hands coming out of it?'

All of them looked mightily surprised by it, at the very least; this was an incendiary capable of setting the terms of fuse at the tips of a bent fingerclip's lone snap. If that's what the situation demanded, and it was very much so capable of doing it, without the difficulty humanoids felt or went through.

'Is that a nigger?'

'You could tell that by only glancing at it, mad-man, buffoon, cradle-spinner.'

IT didn't matter what they were talking about, as in a few minutes, it would only take the span or twenty or so tini-tiny pebble-rocks to fall over them, marching, avalanche-like over their substance. Their backs were very much exposed, and they were empty-dirty, uncovered, nasty-bongo drumming hobos, standing on top baboon men playing with themselves while waiting for the final lighter. Top ceiling –mast the needle rack-nigger posh was grinning, laughingly through a hole. His socketless face, his skin probed by an elongated finger belonging to a most incessantly tawny Shoes, it's what's been called by the locals. They were unaware that their village was about to be completely destroyed past any possible inference and possibility of getting out.

'Call in more men, they need to see this!'

'No, you mongs, you're going to trigger it all!'

Plaster-wearing basket cases fell in right through one of the fake-walls, fallen over, one of them. A man of high-pose, an Insurance attorney with a weird mammoth-elongated put on a mounted-turret skeleton frame-like thing that looked like a fat goblet with a mosquito long-face, filled with maw-incisors and peculiar tongue-shaped eyes that came out of his sockets and appeared to bear long insectoid-stick like figures of strewn and ethnically cleansed nigger-skins he carried around with him, as well as penetrated through the top of their heads kike-skulls whose skin fell off and, much of their cranial mass remained whole with the exception of a peculiarly hard-to look at beak that was inconsistent with their alleged 'white' phenotype-adherence that might've been caused by a recent admixture, being somewhat recognizable through a simple glance. This man's strange head, that carried upon its elongated spear stripped of all skin-like thing, also appeared to bear a pair of winging tiny appendages that were already wrapped to the good side of the cabin they were all in.

Now and only now had he finally observed that the entire thing was entirely, mined, by all mean, stuck, he was with everyone else inside the room.

'Think you're being funny?'

'I was only trying to light up the mood.'

To make things worse, it appeared like a barrel filled with brim-topple also began rolling along, falling apart quite nicely.

'Nigger's on the top laughing at us, the monkey!'

Outside it was much worse, every house was on a giant-fat ebolated nigger's back, carrying it along a tray of wooden pliers, many of them being mind-controlled but at a shallow level by the most peculiar formation that could have ever appeared in front of the:

'I think it's trying to communicate with us; in which case, are we to establish contact with it by any means, or what are we to do if such's the case?'

'A liar, a liar's what it is, I've seen it and I'm very much so displeased, and plastered to it, the gorgonic conundrum, it's locked and flinted steeled itself around, threw it over, now we can't unchain-unshackle it, and carry on with our lives.'

It was dangerous in any case. Eleven seventy hundred miles away, out of the decayed-pasture tried for area where they swallowed the crab-like demonical horn-like figures in which the bowel-pools swam, which at this point looked like an unfathomably haunted by a sickened morbidly, disturbingly gloomily yet filthily, almost obtrusively, concordial, blasphemously egregiously gregarious, venomously massively, dirt.

Two giant appendages with head-tortilla flattened at the top spring sprout-branch like by throat, that drew out of the rotating arm-like formation of torsos that were all connected, invariably so, by lunges since they all wore worm-like chained bile-guts that drew along as if they were beads, connected then pushed through, drawing along to outlandish flying but prevented from taking flight, balloon-like formation that were pyramidical yet lumped with eyes and with other appendages that came in together until no longer capable of fully taking everything it and started throwing limb-leashes flail-whip motions-put through pressure, enacted against the bodies that were not actually connected to the main bulk but instead, as was said, were actually but floating in each other's proximity despite having a gut-like beam connecting them, that was eerily soft and capable of fully if not endearingly disintegrating on command if that's what it took for it to do, when all of the sudden, a few men drew near it, realizing that in reality, these things were actually antennas or close to that, in term of motion and in Quantum magic, the same power that granted them the functionality drawn from the most incessantly deformed yet disturbingly hard to look at stars that came into view during their long-distance communication. Signals being sent even now, of all the most malborious times:

‘I am trying to hold a conversation with you, although, you, my friend told me I can’t walk, that I am a cripple, mentally. Well, I’ve come to you with a certain proposal you’ve yet to consider.’

‘No, I’m not going to rape you, friend, I’m too busy and I consider it a primitive, and anything but a disquaint way of passing the time. I beckon you to consider the following, I do not know you, nor do I hold you with such contempt that I would have myself be associated with you, therefore, I think I want to be alone for some time now. Leave me alone so I may think things through and then I shall give you my answer. If you don’t, then I shall be forced to kill you by violent-brutal force of brashness such as which you’ve not only never have not seen before, but it shall be the last thing you get to experience before you die and I can assure you that you are going to die. Entirely and soulfully, as I am going to make sure that the proper funeral arrangements shall be made.’

His head was a giant disc-like piranha splatter of an egg, with all of his face-shapes pointing at the sky, in some direction or another, for they were all weird strips and twists that wanted to eat God.

It walked strangely from one side to the other, of the, sided track, of the upper-floored lowered-in, point to point, where it was connected both to the rails and was entered the half-dimension, whereas the mid-rift of the awkwardly set-plane in-between them was as hard to be stared at as it was to be walked on, since, from one point to the other, that is to say, where it grew, creating two pseudo-stalk beans beamed, through which a few more growths, added only superficially crawled through, having entered an area that was closer to a closet inside a floor, while melting, but seen from their side as if the North cardinal point were the sky behind them, being postulated upon, walking frontward-upward, for eighteen hours or so, at the very least, this march having led them to a point where everything diverged in every possible direction, until every shot-through form, crane-like growth and other-things that came into the great fornication of pseudo-limbs had been warted with pox-like substances of pus-accesses filled with larger fluid-filled chitinous shielded drone-heads that were supposed to be the molecules but appeared to be stretched yet whole, and wholesome inside one another’s upper- greater girths in which they swam inside of. Farther away from it, there stood an upper-lower rape-bolt, with eight pin-heads, tinier than that, cradled on top a peculiar dark body- that of a mutated creature whose wrought-out-of-shape body almost came to fall apart with each and every step it took towards one of the broken-in walls.

‘I’ve neared one of the castles, great casket.’

Quite pleasingly sounding, were it to be recorded by one of the small devices that were attached to everything around it, one could’ve easily discerned intent from this destructive force filled and covered in the worst possible urchins there were, the hardest to stare at being fore-fronted and made to melt away, with every step being shot through spike-headed incisors shaped humanoid but on the racks, invisible creatures whose tails were coming out, rape being in their eyes, rancid rape-smell covering them, as they drew on with large dissection blades, nigger-kill like upon nigger-nigger, destroying kinds, as one would be aware of the various intonations the simians were capable of protruding and coming up with. In the distance there stood a strange, most unfathomably hard to stare at nigger-lyncher, whose outer-nigger lynching abilities far exceeded that of any other nigger-lynching machine, by a far-extreme that could and might as well kill as many as thousands, hundreds and billions of them, all at once.

Power-strung nigger-lynching strung on sight, nigger-lynching kill-kill but slowly come on nigger-crack and nigger-monkey simians, niggering around niggardly nigger-nigger got shot down, his feet were wrapped, nicely so, dark machined arms that drew out of nowhere, seemingly materialized in the air, killing these niggers in a fashion, that, could barely be distinguished if trashed and out of rancid, crash, and bash, and plentifully smashed, down, put as if waiting on top a bed of nails, but the quails of the nigger-lynch bird is stood upon wailed, as the many nigger-lynch-a-nigg-a-lynch-then stop and drag on and out, then nigger-put down, is dead but lives on as a nigger-strung monkey, shot down then raised again and brought to life, then lynched yet fail. A cardiac arrest occurred and the nigger shot his teeth, obscured by the smoke that came in and nigger-oh-nigger but put on pill, not to breed with other niggers, for they bear no wombs, these niggers are dumb and need to be lynched, but cured. First they're put down on a 'band', then the 'band' is taken apart, the nigger can't shout, the nigger is mad, he is on crack, he wants to be lynched now, begging for it, hardly a matter. Another lynch-kill nigger machine joins the first one, a son to the father, although niggers wouldn't know. And the way they were lynched was not for show, they weren't put, easily on track, but niggers, they're aware of that, and leap in, like salmon on the ship, the grills but burning still, the kikes in the ovens join them as well, both of them are being killed, exterminated, plowed-through, kill-fucked with sinew. Both devices come together and form an ultra-lyncher, killer stove, filled with plenty, iron chained cords, that shoot and gas, but made of fire mass, that, upon entered the premise, this long-stretch, exterminator. They're made to breathe, inhale, creator. No, no one's going to save you now, little kike, little faggot, little nigger, you're all done and made to get killed and stomped and made to live none other, but romped, upon a descending ramp, with nigger-killers trained, robots, machines, all of them, but coming in droves, while covered in snow-mobile droves of spears and pea-shooters that twist, boomerang-like but cysts that appear and boils, on their niggardous faces, signal the time they're to be put down, immediately on the spot, thrown deeper after that, in a rape-rape-rape-rape stomp page kind of matter- killing your father, nigger, Holocausted but this time around, it's about to happen, as the gas-oven-graves, that are miles away deepened, dropped beneath the bowels of the earth as well, they go around and don't stop and niggers have to die as well, and all of them are pushed down and put to rest, as niggers die, this ain't no test. Nigger-nigger-nigger-nigger-nigger-nigger-nigger-nigger-nigger-nigger- nigger-nigger-nigger-nigger- nigger-nigger-nigger-nigger- there's a kike slave master, rigger, he is called. He's trying to lynch them all, including his own, back-stabber, trying to get his foot in, trying, hardly, within reason, killed.

A peculiar rod filled with strange bejeweled figures that were sticking out but attached with vertically curved scythe-like curved L's that kept all of them hanging from one side to the other, all rotating, fluttering from one side to the other as they were winged

It was a tongue-shaped but fat tick – flea- growth-mass with a single wasp abdomen shaped incisor-curved crawler appendage with an upward beak-shaped upwardly heaving tiny immovable, as for its position, relatively speaking, but not entirely, as it still shook while moving, arm, and a spear-long shafted wriggled on its left side, whose upper-tower head was a twist of almost tendon-veins out of which a beak-arm and a head' heart drew out of, but featureless, as the entire creature was a reddish-green dark and filled with out-ward, capable of un burrowing themselves parasitically filled with pesticide growths that had hid themselves in there for a time. Whom were shaped like, legged first, by elongated skeleton-bone like match-thin cartilages that were fifteen meters high and eleven in width, whose bodies were fingers-like shaped growths whose tips were broken, tilted forward, stricken forth, and bore, large spoiled fruitious growths with two holes, pointing in the back, that formed an eight, as they were one on top the other. A popsicle with a tipped ugly, boil as well.

‘A strange thing this one, isn’t it?’

‘I think it is, sir, there’s been word coming from down South that there’s plenty of them running along, wild buffaloes incapable of stopping charge as to draw in breath and water, threatening to trample us whenever their reason might be, we still are to be yet called to action, whenever tenebrous there is approach.’

A wretched barely put together limb, from one side to the other, feeted by as many as eighteen hundred forty four clusters, that, upon being seen from beneath their seated, in eight different formations, mainly constituting several iterations of upward-downward-passers through the lower side of a grinder, specifically selected for it, prosthetic-like joints, whom so happened to be bladed, curved ahead and around, their diagram-put down patents, inked but nothing discernable could be drawn out of it. Since their seemed to replace one another, sometimes entered through, hindered wall and broken-flu, of joint-less bodies, with deep sinew. Of whose resource but waste was done, brought to it, to asked be run:

‘Through one of the belts, bring it to one of them, we’ll put it in.’

The sky was forced into a show. A teal nothingness but clear as one could see, as in the distance shone a simple sparkling thing, of growths but put, through infantile ilk.

And bastardly was the ground beneath them, the ones accompanying it again, bothered by what was going on there, incapable of dealing with so many of the barely filled with sinew dark remains. Some of whom were cradled after dark, although the brooding mothers, whose chests but shone through kill but thaw, of darkened yellow birds covered in piss-tar, took the breaking for their own. And for their children shone, up, amongst them, throne of desperation fading, their eyes but missing and counting as they were their blessings, eight dark shades appeared in the dark ultramarine night. Though the sea-levels were night and the blessed light that had taken a piece of them could be seen only as a tormenting zeal, that disappeared, upon a blink.

‘You’ve overturned your time dossier, it says right here, written by someone akin to thine eyes, broken but shot through, but though repair, there’s little to be done, may be called into question, not all can be simply fixed. Some slugs had been here since, but we cannot understand how they came to be.

Mother of brooding leeches upon but straddles in the candor, slayings, oft to feed. Bred upon the same cloisters that make the land, we seem to have garnered an understanding.’

‘But I’ve done no such thing of ill, nor am I to say, appeal to the ones that listen, as to beg for pity, lackeys’ undertaking Yore, for they, deprave as they might be are here, to stay no more, but move aside when taken by them, I’m to be put in blinds, shackled and imprisoned again, in a farther than to seep upon, rock-bitten place where I shall see no grain of cotton-riddled with frames of breaded pouches – punched in, slits. I am to draw no more, arousal, nor am I to count for reason, when they came upon the stance they cast them.

I seek but plight of understanding taken, and moved away, a-bred for awaking, only for a moment that might it be seen, and only for a moment since.’

‘Enough of your bastardly pleas, you’re here to be taken away, and given to those who see.’

‘I shall do it, somehow, I owe allegiance to no one, I shall rid myself of their filth, of their sub-human blood, of their degeneracy, even if it’s the last thing I do. There has to be a way.’

The man kept a walk-stride-through progression into a charge, partially sped-up by tiny specs of burning slates attached to the back of his soles, a slide, as if on ice-giving him another boost, crudely talking, step, step-step, optical illusion after, step, step, right foot step a few centimeters –twenty to thirty to the mid-left, not on a straight trajectory any longer, then firmly planted, left foot tailing behind by a shortage of nerve endings that had been cut off from a previous injury, therefore, a considerable amount of pressure would end up being added to the right foot, as he used it as leverage in order to redirect some of his body weight, putting it in, the zone, that’s formed between the anchored foot and the left side, past the mid-region defined by the line area, forming a small ‘pond’, that being the only zone his foot could be put in without him facing any considerable blow to his already dwindling lack of balance, whereas, upon having reached the mid-docked region of the pond-now become a lake, with a boat on the ‘shore’ among the creeks, yet to touch the mid-riff water point, the tip of the left foot had established only, for the time being, in a considerably observable by, as to be enclosed within a thought by a simple glance, as if skinny dipping-only the tip allowed –otherwise illegal, the ‘cold’ exposure turned the pond into a sea of broken trench-dug then filled, then tilled as if farm-like corn-sprout, spruce cut as well, there being stone-pebble-stone-boulder-smashed-chiseled-prick-of-cobble-rough-what-comes-after coated-as well – with the most unnaturally deformed facets which, despite what one would’ve considered, there being no regurgitation of mass that could induce such an effect on the looker, were close enough in semblance to eighteen hundred, perfectly spread in a huge diameter’s striking, beyond the dome, un-clear shot, of a dart-throwers but missed all of them, but they’re grenades, so that wouldn’t matter, explosives that spread those clusters of shrapnel exactly as thus, as to result, out of doing this, into making a small red-circle, that wasn’t there, and wasn’t read, pile them up by its mere existence and naught else and naught more, as if some truck came past the rush hour and made it past the bridge in order to avoid running over a passing child suffering of nearer-sightedness, as in nearer to the fifteen meters off the two-split quarters of the right-half area of the road, which signaled the fact that the kid actually had enough time to get that far without being hit by any car that passed the road prior to the truck in question, but, in light of the sun’s great bloated shininess-glow, projection, of light-filled with smaller suns, doubloon shaped, with Ra’s, the Egyptian Sun God’s bodies attached to them, but devoid of appendages, and the lower half-beneath the torso, whose appearance began shooting long-spear rays of light-power that bounced between every single bottle there was, caused, while in mid-flight, the truck driver’s gas-to shoot, the bottles out of his, apparently forgotten as to check whether or not the back doors were truly locked, giants with chopped legs, spruce coming out of their backs –filled with giant cancer lobes that had faces and spikes and thin elongated horns as well that bore inside of them, chrysalis-like embryo fat-blimp, even fatter than that fetus-gods that began fighting one another once aroused by contact with the burning UV rays caused by the many Ra’s to enter their eyes, shattering one another, tearing each other apart as their shards would fall in one place, on top a frozen sea, beneath the bridge, in the left spot on which now, at this point in time, his left foot having already been thoroughly planted in, caused a multitude of most peculiar steps to follow, in a short alignment of one step beyond one step beyond two more, then again, step-step-step-step-step-step-step-step follow-throughs of clusters, no longer be in danger-stride, of ought to take a break but, his feet were pegs of flocks of pigeons and wrapped around each other parrots and other cannibal nigger-slaves that were stitched on top these strangely colossal sized creatures. He wore a pointy had whose tip was the top of a missile with a red star and an American Confederate, one of them, strapped around, lassoed in place, with a dame hardly kept in, around a carefully tied knot. The Gook-Yellow-Man Chinese must rot, he must be brought down, until he stops, this wretched in-human ballista of arrows curved, this Mongolian Nokkai of little, petty worth. Yellow threatening-disease wide-spread, the wretched horns that only added to themselves when directly looked upon by boil-grown eyes.

A small towering figure came boastingly upon pinned wheels. 'Leap into that puddle.'

And the man lost a foot, already down, a few meters off it, he'd have drowned if there weren't a few more pitty-pudgy things to have his foot-long, grappler of iron, bolted in-between the powder puffer-puffer growth.

Most of the eccentricity had gotten to their heads it seemed, for that very reason they had lost their veils and will to live, drenched but calling:

'Cast away, cast away, another one will come out of his way and cast us out if he'll have his will.'

'People have become rather wretched, haven't they? In terms of how loathsome not only they act but how they've come to justify even the worst acts of violence as well as retaliation against anyone who as much says something inconvenient to their likings. To think that one would be antagonized in such a way for simply voicing what he thinks, so be it. That shall be no deterrent whatsoever. If my mind is sick, it's best they know rather than hide it. I hate them, so much. I loathe them, for everything I had to go through, throughout my entire life. I'd rather live the remainder of my life inside solitary confinement than be surrounded by anyone. I don't need my memory, I don't need friends, I don't need people, I don't need to be liked by anyone, I don't need to hide how sick or horrible I am; I simply need be left alone. And one day, I shall find it, I shall find the means to achieve my goals, at all cost!'

It slipped past them without a single man noticing it draw its knives out, half-way through their waists from beneath them at an angle out of which this much could be derived, the lower trajectory being something of a mid-upward swing, working its way as if the creature had taken its time to kneel or to crouch down, pointing upwards on what would seem to be, a clear inundation of wildly set angles that had made several antecedent preemptive strikes which had numbed the areas, that is to say, it had already cut through them five to six times, at a shallow level, testing the red-parted waters with the exception that they were un-parted, since he took his good enough time, going through the swings again, stopping in place, but the cut, the initial one, that was yet to be felt, or the nerve endings responsible for communicating pain to the brain had not only failed to deliver, on their part, the wrathful-pain-endowed message, but it seemed like the initial cut in question had been performed while the first man was adjacent yet a few feet behind the second on a mid-twist, where his shoulder was almost back-lifted pushed in the back-arched, as to go through a half-rotation or throw-a-glance over your pad kind of motion, during which his back was also arched as well, but, the strange thing was that, during the butcherment, not a single soul, other than the knife-wielding creature itself who was responsible, although working its way through them at an instinctual level, such as niggers do when they're committing felonies, had maimed the half-way peace-ribboned rawboned piece alongside the baby-ribs trailed alongside then all around, until the full extent of the fell swoop had reached a comfortable level where it momentarily stopped. The blade then was quickly removed, although at that point, despite there being nothing to be alarmed of, since the realization had yet to be properly absorbed, one might think that the immediate knee-jerk reaction would happen to make him leap like a devil on the rib-gab cage, since what immediately followed were a few more strikes of the knife that had enough time to prod, scout and feel around for the vital organs, without even touching them, since, the initial cut's width was just wide enough to allow for the proper entry of the culprit's entire arm to enter and mess not only with his viscera in a quick enough manner through which, during one of the strike, from fist to fist, like a VHS's replay sped-through backwards' shot of a slingshot being fired, with the boulder being one of the knives, he had actually managed by an appalling play of his middle, index, being planted against, while the knife was released a hold off in mid-air, then immediately caught between them and the thumb, being firmly planted there, where his entire arm got cocked as for his knuckles to point at the ground on a plain enough level, that he immediately managed to snap his fingers, so as to launch the knife like a knife-launcher's spring being action, although with his bare fingers, caught by his other arm, in the span of a few seconds, before he actually entered the man's body as to play with his insides and feel around, squeezing thoroughly but not too thoroughly as to not make too much noise, alerting the other man that was standing only a few meters away from both of them. And this was done with his left hand, whereas his right hand was now in charge of holding two knives, that his grip was yet to release the hold of. He then flipped his entire body vertically and stood on top his head, while its hand was still in the man's belly. With his toes; the right man's entire leg was entered in the same cut, as he was balancing himself on one foot, still confused as to what was going on. Both of them were staring in the same general direction. If this were to stretch over, over the span of at the very least a few hours, there was no uncertainty whatsoever as to what of how many of his outer limbs would be found finely folded inside his body, or how many other humans as well.

It's been only less than two seconds already gone past by, with his companion having passed them by eighteen feet, at the very least.

It leaped out of his pocket, from beneath the crown of his foot but trailed along a single road, two more, quail, crag and a few adjacent dews that followed on his track.

A back like a molded in a dark spot, wretched concave-zone, top of the hill stretched along side a deprave formation of heads, all dug out of worm-beds, dug in by force, rendering it partially immune not only to a terror-formation of partially destroying atrocities enabled upon it, but also to the outer head forms it bore up-front. They were cup-like or bucket-like elongated inside the mount, and appeared to be of a knee-in-depth, not to mention their wide-spread placement. The actioned by organic tool, that was mainly actioned by great, well-placed to a level where they signaled the fact that they may have been placed there instead of being grown out of the sides of these appendages, great tool-box shaped membranous padded power-plug wearing with elongated wiry cords leading to the greater masses of organs, at the end of which drill-like stings drew out of them, squirming around, revealing themselves as to be the ones responsible for what's been going on across its tortoise-shell placement of the body. They drew out from beneath it. A disgusting-wretched perilous-dismantlement threatened to follow, as with every passing second, this creature became more and more aggressive, at itself mostly since it's been infested with the most alluring parasitical entities one could get infested by. It oozed as it dripped, as it's been dragged along from point to point, from side to sidelong stretching. Reddened a little; with dystopian-shadings, of grit left-overs being rinsed with blackish eely water, with sweat of the dark-brow after being poisoned, with a grayish shade of atomic tuberculosis fencing on a border with another wide-spread red of decay-blossom, being the main entertainer of this clearly touched, unnatural thing that was a skin disorder spreading along the mushy-surface of this contaminated container that appeared to be the main enactor of its movement, or serve as such.

They started punching one another beneath their waists, going long-bows all the way in, trauma being long-headed along the way, as horseshoes started trampling their upper-floors, going along the trail, below the neck-region, etching various plasters of skin, falling off only to run behind a big boulder, as they waited them to internally bleed out.

‘Won’t do, it won’t do without really giving it to them, you know? They really have to take it, hard, they have to be bled out like a bunch of pigs, if only. If only we had something sharp, you know? Like some spears of some launch-knives.’

‘Shut your mouth, Yub, they can still hear us, plus we’re bleeding as well, remember?’

‘Talk for yourself! I’m not bleeding in the least, I’m as tough as nails, as they come, I will prevail through being bled if I want it to. My bleeding, it stopped, look!’

With a second’s boat-driven into chested knot, he cauterized his internal bleeding by simply flexing his muscles at a microscopically pushed in level of high-stroked upon blades of fisted steels that started pumping as hard as they could as to create even tinier atom-level cuts that in turn started processing skin through themselves, as if they formed a bridge of skin that immediately formed an arm-shaped appendage that spanned cross the mid-riff to his very pecks, going as far as already having shaken itself through variously leveled vibrations as to work itself to a point where, as they all started, it grew in size right in front of them, as a body-builder’s, or beyond the chiseled, juiced or otherwise’ maximum expenditure, if they were consuming over sixteen hundred tons of calories as well as proteins a day, as to bulk up to such an extreme level that it had not only granted it a ‘mirin’ boisterous look, but the strength that had amassed there as well as the shape itself had hybridized into a peculiar root-like system, in part, that is to say the fingers and the wrist that started feeding the rest of his body, muscle, until he himself had grown out to be eight feet tall, and as thick as several barrels. A monstrosity, they deemed this thing that was no longer human. No face or features could be discerned, no outer hanging lucid-moving fingers, toes or anything even remotely resembling something that could be even vaguely interpretable as such, since they were filled entirely to a blimp’s fully endowed protrusion to such levels of over-bearing that he was made indistinguishable from a large conical block with two longer almost fin-like shark protrusions coming out of it. Since its legs were gone, as they ought to, as he moved by merely flexing the lower, unnatural contortions of skin, meat and bone that had formed him; which in turn, as this frightful thing that was barely a thing the human rationale was made to anchor itself as to fully comprehend it, had in turn, or was deemed by them, or by their already poisoned reprehension to a form-most inhumane, a reactionary, most animalistic instinctual override having already taken place, where man was no longer pitted against man or put a hold on, as to curb some of his instincts as to be met by a fellow of his fellow tribe, but instead by a wild, pernicious animal that threatened to destroy or put an end to his very existence in such ways that would be deemed inadmissible by any living organism fearing the termination or the fast-approaching terminal as well as a stop to its own continuation, as to be put an end to, stricken down, violently wrested in an insatiable state of betrayal, that in turn had cast him into the bowel-ed pits of despair out of which man and man alone can stand as witness to, or as, since he alone could happen to be met by such a sundering, that no one should be forced to cower when met against, but fully thrust instead and fight against it, against all possible odds, until the greatest and most skilled contender will have reigned triumphantly against a fiend of terror, of horrendous coming, belonging to an era of ingratiating severity as no one will have it come towards him by no means, unless justified by a death-wish he had chosen to do it to himself, with a reason known only and only to him. Therefore, this sugary melting mass that by now was replaced by fat instead of pure-sheer chisel, a blob of meat-soon incarnate, that chose a second form as to create a bounce on cushion ricochet effect by simply arching his lower back inside his piston-ripe lower shell of a spine, creating, with its help, a crackling lightning effect, to the point of him almost chirping between a state-of being air-born and levitating into flight, by sheer power of bodily inflation.

A few men came out of some uneven flanks, bothering each other as they started pushing themselves around. No arm could hold that weight alone without giving in. There was no simple way of saying it.

‘He’s bleeding, he’s going to bleed to death in a matter of seconds if we don’t do something.’

‘I’m trying my best, can’t you see that he’s no responding to the treatment I’m trying to force on him?’

‘Then stop forcing him and do something else instead!’

‘What?’ A cry from the distance already ravished his train of thoughts. It couldn’t have been easier than that, try, do something, try getting on the flank, suture the man, or else, blow everything before they got a chance to take a POW to their sides. They flocked like converts, chucking themselves in large wagons. Most of them inculpable; hard of hearing, heavy sighted, and not a single man appeared to care about the casualties so far.

‘I think he’s gonna try pulling himself in.’

‘Think again, he’s not showing any signs of changing, he’s in a much worse condition than he was fifteen minutes ago. I don’t think we can pull him through this time around.’

‘At least try something, god damn you, we’re losing too many men, and the situation isn’t getting any better on the other side either.’

To reconcile with their losses meant death. They were outflanked. Twenty on and off.

Light steps

The sightings all agreed on several things that were extremely consistent with what we’ve already heard. It was a tall, uglily deformed creature, measuring up to a twenty or so feet in height. Large larvae-PVC pipes forming various horns coming out the top of its head, out a pile of weird almost egg-shaped like sea-horse skulls they appeared to be both coming out and into. A summer-orange and a mushy green-widespread across its body layer of membrane appeared to keep everything from falling apart, preventing any possible injury as well as reducing the chance altogether, once everything was taken into consideration. An ugly exposed heart appeared to be bore, although un-beating and more of an industrial grayish green with a tube on top of it, eerily connected in a niggardish manner, which bore cockroach-adornments to its side, as in the strangled areas where stress had been forced onto it, while the rest of its body leaned itself onto it, as if to house it deeper in this pile. Some autumn-leaves might’ve allowed for a loss of sight as it could almost blend in a ruffian's pile, if that were the case, but there was no saying just yet. There was the fleshy component that completely removed any chance for that to happen. Its legs were giant stumps that looked like rolling-rounded at their ends, vertically aligned as if broken-humanoid joints, wildly covered in 'tendons' that allowed for some depressing back in, in a slug inside the shell trying to crawl along upon the membrane it produced after generative kind of motion with which it moved, strangely so. Every moment comprised of it trying to arch its legs in a way that allowed for the 'head' of each foot to get some flooring in as to curve around, gain some distance, jerk-in, covering each other in that membrane it produce so it could finally emerge fully, whereas, at the end of each one, there lay a giant talon-nail, almost chitinous or a shard-like, mechanical even, that in turn allowed to grasping and pulling, a heavy odorous thing that crawled out like a spider lunging at its prey. A puffy, almost general-decoration, a medal, on the right side of its 'chest', bearing the insignia of a mushy bath, fuzzy, red inside, but rimmed with the same yellowish-green that spread around. No real face or recognizable thing could be seen and there was only an 'arm' that didn't even remotely resemble one, instead, but looked like some bizarre, great hippopotamus of some decayed greenish-extraction, earless, jaw enclosed or missing, or clenched together until left mouthless, but in possession of a huge depression in the area where its eyes might've been. Similar to the insignia, the same puffy red-mush, that lend the rest of its 'skull' the impression of an oblong-fat with a punctured deformation carved-in. Or even some ancient reptile instead, noseless, but a trail of cuts could be seen where a mouth would've ended. Regardless of it, a great teal-globular organ with a shaking-clearly elliptical yet sprouted out of the area where it was placed in, iris seemed to be the determiner; as to banish whatever suspicion there may've been. It's been so long since first seen. An ancient reptile made to grow, to spread and to embody the walking corpse of a 'human', in the worst possible ways it could attempt to copy the primates, to the point where it may be ill conceived, all-together as this being a mockery, as to far exceed what would've made one consider this as being flattery, instead. The left 'arms' was where all of the past-primordial left-over limbs and organs were all stored in. It seemed like the entirety of its upper-body leaned on top of it with all its weight. Giving in an uneven pace, as it tried moving like a man. Small, thing oblong bacterial formations that grew the size of arms, but even fatter than them oozed as they revealed themselves; putrid-looking, like pills, pumping-in, feeding on it, parasitical in nature; as, before the age of man had come, the size of the viruses, bacteria and other unnatural diseases had manifested like giants in order to accommodate for the sheer size in difference that lay between tinier and more colossal animals. These things that had nested themselves deeper in this second mush-layer that kept it all together, preventing it from falling apart, had once belonged to some archaic Triceraptor-being, of a such much greater than the Past Mountainous Regions of the Island of Fiji, long before the nigger infestation as well as, long before the existence of man. It was no deterrent, yet.

The Taliban

Sitting by themselves in some lonely mountain, holding on their podgy lanterns, heart of stone and green, as the vales were filled with smoke and yet basil, where the fords were done and wrought in iron-melting wax from what was left, and when the Yanks finally released one of the many vales under their control, yet they stood erect and started again. A lever was actioned not a few feet farther away from the giant nigger-head implanted in the ground, near which one of them pulled thoroughly from an angle, then shot.

A few target-practice children in the field were pulled out. Some of them dangling by rope and held in place, when the rockets started flying again:

‘Bulls’ eye!’

Yelled one of them as the sudden explosion caused the little shit to grow, to such proportions that he was raised a few feet of the ground, with his fat having him become a tiny blocky unnaturally carved in mountainous rancid pouch, with no human features recognizable, yet the fire had quickly become erect. The fire and the spread of the explosion was turned into some gas that allowed for him to grow out of existence as this creature slowly faded away. Slow but dimly, until nothing but a mist was left of him in the back. An unnatural thing followed after, as the eschewed echoes trailed around.

Another Taliban started dancing!’

‘I’ve done it, I’ve done it, I hit the target!’

Yet he yelled, as many more joined from the grave. From the depths of the Quarry’s wail, from the entrance to the mine a wagon’s echo hit the iron pail as soon as it hit the very dead end against which it was shot again. A few more wagons brought in a pile that was soon uncovered there. In front of their eyes, all were raised, no longer in the guise of the dead, or the blatant uncannily forlorn and the ghostly ones that were there.

Three cages, for each man; but a coffee table put between them. One’d been a barber, one a scouting marine, while the last one a homeless person that found himself abandoned by the Stained Patron whom abandoned him from his broken rib, out of the gut and into the cage, where they were kept, blatantly projected against the very mess that was this plateau. Mesmerized by what was going on in this incontestable, yet blatantly incendiary sight. As they had already went, throughout the day as it might be said, with their eyes gouged, ahead to acknowledge the fact that the smoke made it way too clear, even for one blinded by choice. A great fire had been caused to spread, which took care of the most outlandish life out there, at least, the ones that were still tied and had no worth; a man observed:

‘I see that they’re not made to grow and dissipate when burned alive, at stake!’

‘That’s because there’s nothing as volatile in the fire as there is in the rockets we’ve been working with, as to have them blessed by our mighty Taliban-Council, to which I say, you needn’t lost faith just yet, just in case there’s something you might still refrain yourself from telling me.

I think I’ve got just the thing.’

‘People are being riled up for some reason, wouldn’t you agree? It’s the first time in a long, long while since we were approached by people whose intentions were herd.’

‘What do you know?’

‘They’re being fed some rare plant, I think, from the back-side lodge that’s hidden by the mountain path, deep inside the mountain. Farther than’d be closer to the cargo, so, care to join me for a walk? It shouldn’t be too far now and I think we could stop somewhere along the way and ask for some direction, chief!’

‘Lead the way then, I’ll hear you along the way. But make sure there’s no problem while the sky’s surge is wildly going outside. I would have no reason be told of envy, or to have it carried silly, from the side of the canyon where we planted the roots.’

A few open-sheeted plain matrices of iron lay wide-spread across the stone-roofs. A few soldiers guiding the missile system from no farther than was needed. To put it less eloquently, they were orchestrating a little ruse. Not that there would be much of a difference, judging by how things were going on.

Stopped, both of them in place, somewhere along the road, trying to discern the intention of the intruder by merely looking, while there was no possible clear way, there was this:

‘We’ve smoke on us. Make yourselves revealed.’

‘So you’ve noticed.’

A few voices appeared to have made their way in tandem, as if echoing alongside some Rook’s den, then shown up-front deadly yet in mourning learned:

Something, something that would be considered uncertainly abhorrent by all premises, especially the ones that involved them; the men that showed up, the little specks of light in their eyes that had now been known to every single man that appeared, the ropes attached to them also nearing the crucial growth of mass that had granted them the granite stare. They were eyed wildly, even with their number. No more than a hundred or so Talibans, armed with RPG’s, a few power tools and some grenades that vouched their ill-suited nature to no one else than those that had been cast.

The dark, the dark was in their mind, and for that reason alone, they were eyeless, still granite.

‘They can see us, I assure you. I’ve been made aware of it by a few inquires that would make no other man appease this, this thing.

There’s a reason for it; their sudden development as well as everything else they’ve been fed with.’

‘What is it then, come on, out of the slumber and into the prowl; I seriously cannot deal with their stares.’

Nor with their strange forms either, as they heightened themselves to a few feet high, all too smoothly skinned, as if the clothes were sutured, no, punctured or depressed inside. Otherwise, there was nothing to be done about it. The way they stared, the way they acted, the way they oozed and shook when neared their canter.

A map would do no good, even if one was to go in great detail with mapping out every possible hit sight as well as every other well-together cross where they would land into, if it were for them to be caught. If there were some outer flights that would repel every other man out there, to have made as little sense as it had.

‘Their skin, I think. They’ve been grinded until it’s become a paste; it’s why they appear to be so, how do I say?’

‘It’s irrelevant, if you’re talking about the details behind their, this. I’m more interested in why it’s come to them acting this way; why are they blocking the road, only for us? And not for them?’

A figure stepped in. He stared at the Chief-Taliban, who was armed by a great racket of twenty or so launchers. All green-coned; and violent.

A few more lumps

There had never been a chance for either of them to understand what had gotten into the men. Since they were all acting that way, without giving any clue as to what was the reason behind their sudden urges, this clear pedant display of feigned outrage being something they could barely hiding away from without giving in too much or too less and making it so there was a slimmer of a doubt somewhere, along the way, in what little and what more could be interpreted as a window of time in which they could somehow act as if they owned, so-much-so that it would be retrieved or conceived as an act of insolence of no little contemplation such adorned to it as some trinket or as some unnatural bond to their personage that their countenance would be shown as to be less than unclear but more than inappropriate when finally raised to the ghastly-propagation their hosts, that were included in the rose-around the bush room, with its finely adorned carpets, its finely stretched people that were held on racks as well as the most unnatural, harder, beyond harder, to the contemplation of the extreme and beyond it, somber quality of the rose-light that had painted their surroundings in some image that would by every other mean be deemed as being too oblique for their personal tastes as well as threatening, yet, somewhat fitting, way too fitting, it would be way beyond fitting that they found themselves, by such means of mental-alteration, unevenly high-raised upon their pumps and their bonds as well as their ugly-mirrored servants that were present in the room as well, refusing to talk at all times while the doors, five or four in number, opened constantly as to allow the passing of hundreds of people, many of whom were unrecognizable by the means of which they presented themselves in, not to mention that this, this unnaturalness, this appeal to the incommmodity, as well as the sanguinity of their facial expressions as they appeared at times to be completely lacking in fashions that would render them uncapturable, via the employ, vis-à-vis, from the other side of the room, where a clear apparition that might’ve been considered at any other point in time, to be some intra-dimensional traveler whose obscurity would fancy it fashionable to such extend as to yearn the lack of capture this lack of solidity rendered it to carry on along, equipped as he may be with a camera or two, with the courtesy of the most, if not there being any other chance for the most, if not all of the strange appearances that were counted, several times at several interval, mainly spent disappearing and appearing again, often met by a distinct sound that rendered it highly recognizable as opposed to the others, whom were as silently hidden and carefully, endowed by a spirit of malevolence as no other could find, or would find it fitting as to be required in order to maintain this mantra of being hidden, yet repelled by the most incongruous of dark-apparel, dark-approaches and poached animals, of many an up-bringing, all placed on plaques that were used to adorn every single wall that seemed to, fittingly distract from the on-going chaos they themselves could not draw away out of; scene of high-tide-like morbidity that would by all means be considered unfitting as to be a part of, over a prolonged enough period of time when many similar cases already found it so, easily said, most easily observed, perfect, as to coin the terms of a ‘jolly-jumper-into-quiet’s’-reign’, by noon, as the bolden-leathery caramel, lavender scented, oak-of-a-good-quality cuckoo clock with a missing beak and apparently no eyes either, which appeared to have a humanoid-like formation made to be like, or akin to a strange wall-mounted, but in this case the cuckoo-wooden-bird itself would become the wall, as to be the sole inheritor of this spear-coming out of its chest formation of fermented tinier bodies that could not be forced back, as to recede back into the socket-like formation, vertically rotated, stalactite-iceberg thing that drew out even farther than the initial assessment of its positional constitution might’ve allowed for as much to be discerned out of, where, where, where it fed, yes, it seemed likely that on this night-stormy-night of December, nearing the end of and the start of January’s in-between New Year’s Eve’s celebration, during the already passed, as this was the guest room after all, ‘s cocktail party, which already explained why, Hogg Torn-Part, Port Lamp-wart, Malt, the Hun-Hun, Gregory Missing, Alistair Crowd, Millie Canister, Molly Pay, Jane Hem, Ankster Cunt, Troy Bay, Carl Sanny, Mary-Mary, the George-of Georgia, the other five or so other guests, Anki-Neckle, Hubert, Gun-Struck, Monkey-no, as well as the other, much to their linking, passengers of blood were very much surprised, to the point of being, beyond shocked at the strange tall man that appeared in the middle of the room, being very much made of a piece, naked but without any visible private organ that would’ve made this entire thing unutterably un-quaint, as the lightning struck out loud, during the echoes of a moon’s fall past the Solstice, since it happened, to the point where it could not be discerned past the point of convenience’s sake, as anything but the strange strangulation of the road, oft, more than often, unspoken of, somewhere between Nevada, California, London, Paris, some farmer down the country side’s parish where he’s entertained, endearingly –so, some people who came down the road, up the highway, only to be met by the same arrogance as they had been, stopped, by on their track, cops, corrupt cops that could and can’t be trusted by any means, since they always do those things the Government tells them to do, and they’ll not get away with it, if we have something to say or do about it; regardless of which, this troubadour-creature who was a creature of the state, belonging to some fancier folk-like-dragged out of the munching swamps of some illiterate munchers, destroyers of upheaval that contaminated whatever chance of there ever being some, or any sensibility left to their kindred’s boat, already passed through a river of people’s hopes and votes that were captured during the-still-controlled-by-them revolt, as if they were some miners or peasants of some kind, of –being that was clearly, although not the Mary-Mary since she was a lady and ladies did not belong in such a place as this, especially ladies that did not actually dress to the accustomed-to men’s standards she had to have familiarized herself with before deciding to accept this invitation in the first place, a thing of high-quality, demand, which was clearly specified in the letter, to begin with, sic, delivered on the date of eleven hundred ninety seven, twenty two of March, at twelve o’ clock, at the redacted address of, having ignored the former, as well as one would regard it as a dull suggestion instead of actually having the decency to remove the address as to remove any chance, whether it be incontestably derived as being solely a thing of insolence or so-much so, an acquired taste of battlement withdrew, as one would have it; Penny-street, Hillside Tll, seventeenth, by the Loanside Say, the eight building by the nearest block where the giant elongated glowing tomb is placed, adjacently against, as if this bolted black tomb that is adorned with many skulls is but nothing to be basked or banished, or tried forth, come against, since its Mandibular resonance to the glowing gas-like atomic fuel burnt by it, unnatural thing that came to enter through the unequivocal unnatural destruction’s woe, come upon the tomb and the cemetery of the last battles’ kings and lords that were, on a Mayor’s bill, stamped by many of the council-members as well as their Parliamentary stooges that had their grubby hands fashioned by a saddening attempt it derived to, as to twist, contort and flap one of the upper wings towards its open mouths, as if it were a tongue of the kind, jerking violently in place. It was pointless, trying to run or to do something that would immediately jeer it in the wrong direction, give the wrong impression as to feign a false assault that would result in them immediately forfeiting their lives. Not to mention that this abhorrent behavior did not come without a high-price that would completely destroy, ruining and banish whatever chance they may've had to reason with the beast instead.

[illegible]

Carl was the first one to attempt something. He remembered something from earlier this evening:

'There's a few down the road; they're hard to miss if that's what you were thinking.'

A twinkle of an eight eye, the ones beaded like spires of peas, misaligned inside his skull; behind a pair of beady sockets started wriggling out for air; some of them even bore miniature picks made out of the same substance the people he recently killed belonged to. Residual features as well as some scummy human code still lay there, dropping flaccidly from one sickening socket to the other, as they would join, jointedly, the mid-sized region between his front ear-channel, inside his coyote-prognathism inside of which a bone-filled with spikes- cylinder, music-maker appeared to render some obtuse song of pain. A downwardly hithemaround scythemically-bulbic, bellyarched out of an abdomen cranish, butcherous slimtherly-appendaged by kempt near to its body two-segmented bones; sutured terror kept on walking.

A rubbery thing instead, of nothing more and nothing less; undisturbing for eye'd crows intertwined, for the bothersomeness was lain in sighting the leprous little wriggling thing that drew outwardly from an end, then started growing its antlers of benign. Mold of various other growths, formed the foaming spear antelope of 'trunks', communicating to the masked conical beings behind their frog-like masks; it is time to recede back into that glorious thing that once used to belong to us even before the day had come, and shine-upon the glorious brothel of no heartless home, that crawled in sight and came to miss, to have eerily drawn farther would've been a miss. Some signals had been spared.

A man of no little dark remains:

A peculiar dark-molded creature, almost humanoid, devoid of arms, but of the aspect of being embodied by a strange vase with a brazier-shaped with fat porous legs, lower side, bearing a giant heart connected to it in the back, with many tubes and many wires and many connectors that refused to give in the heartless cower, the reminiscence of a darkly past, and the servants that trailed along. Many of whom were absorbed by naught else other than the patchy-sutured look it bore. A most abhorrent tool, rightly to be called, for the single eye it bore. It was bothersome, how they all vented their vitriol in a most ascended manner of there ever being a chance to protrude through the consonance caused by the oozing sheer staggering-staggerment it bore thrust-edly forward.

'It will fall, it will fall unless we call the epoch's end and stall!'

'Then let it recede back into the growling depths of the eye, the door is closed, and much benighted!'

One of the bookshelves opened and reeled to the side. Inside some of the few men went and rather cajoling as they went discerned little to naught.

'I think there's been a misunderstanding.'

‘Who said that?’

Cross the room, up the stairs, near some dark-un-lit place where a tall-dark figure with an eye dwarfed one of the barely attached crystals that neared themselves falling apart.

A voice allowed for a second more of coming-through:

Charging through one of the walls, which in turn allowed for a few more things to happen, most of which being so far gone through that they shot themselves as through a cannon, never ending, wanting –worthy worthless of follow:

‘A pair of secret tools for every man’s spent life, a worthless tool of such delight.’

Blindingly up-thrust abhorrent fright; a few more steps to the right, and the yellow-green flash would stop. A dome-rounded see-through window stretching like a tunnel right until diverged by force, it receded into nothingness, allowing for countless men to follow after as and by: A tiny rounded bulbic-eye talk-through –two-bricks, with Keyringer standing below it, dressed like some engineer, trying to talk to one of the see-through men of glass. He could see a tiny bauble of something, mourning the fall of another Mongol, another dead one.

‘I think we’ve reached the moment of hardly there being any peace left to share. It’s all war from this point on.’

‘I think you’re being unfair, especially here, especially since the domed door opened just now.’

It’s been fifteen minutes or so and the bars had already receded past a point, a point from which they could not fare well with jaundice. Burning eye-sockets sore or pink; malady of gelatin; but no one appeared to bear much of a care of bother as to react to what happened just yet. A derelict of tumor-membrane shot-above.

Eight’s lamp; hidden in a cove-like formation. Down the prodding stair-wars; beneath him, who watched, without eyes but weeping in stillness:

‘There’s a man on the other side of the road that knows exactly what’s going on, be sure not to anger him when he shows his face again, or else there’s always going to be something keeping you down, which either way, shall not pray onto you whenever they appear.

‘Who shall?’

Dark and tall Ministers of lepp; strange lid-ed helmets that shone around and appeared to produce enough light to encompass everything, whether or not they had admired, admonished or had as little left for their own bets, it did not matter; a simpleton’s errand came forth. It was long awaited, ever-so:

‘I think it’s only right that either one of you is made aware that there’s to be a clear spilling; sleigh.’

No compass would do harm onto the passer.

‘Claire, I need to talk to you for a moment or so!’

A man drew forth towards her; a strangely named man; with an eye on his bed, that followed up-the crawl.

‘I’ve seen reasons but I’ve never thought I could call you mine.’

‘Who are you, friend?’

The lights followed as soon as they were in a safe-enough place. Joined now by some primates that had been contorted into chairs, moved by tiles of iron that had little more than a few iron-wrought wheels beneath them; actioned from the distance from the likes of it; no less power used than it would do to spare; anyway.

‘Ringer, was it?’

‘I think we’ve met before; in a much worse place, although it would do me no good to, have a feel or a cup just yet. It would be improper and you’re barely holding on as it is.’

‘I do believe I’ve seen you somewhere before.’

‘Behind the eight door by your left; I tried walking outside for some time now, but it’s ended before I could count the various pebbles off they had taken shots off, out of my kidney, you know? The ice they bear melts steel, but doesn’t shatter; it takes more than skin alongside while dripping after.

I can’t explain it, but my soul is just unlikely to return into my carcass. I’m forced to wait for a while now. But there’s no one I would rather end but you; since you pissed me off coming here in the first place. Thinking it’d treat you any different than any of them, the men that died in here.’

‘I thought I recognized you from somewhere. I.’

‘Doesn’t matter any longer, you’re not going to survive through this escapade of yours in one piece, or at least untouched. If I were you, at least, I’d ensure there’s someone informed at large of what’s been happening here, so they could try pulling out what’s left of you, in one piece or so. It pains me to see you in such a state, but it is what it is.’

‘Where is John?’

‘He’s taking a call, no longer than needed. He’s on the line with a man from Sino. I don’t think he’s in any better shape than I am.’

‘Will you please stop messing with me already? I’m doing very well. I’m fine, I’m just a tiny bit drowsy, drowsy.’

‘Yet you also feel as if you’re incomplete because there’s no one around you to hold your face.’

‘It won’t melt.’

They walked off the table and entered the other room, mash-mash mush, and land scum, some water and some toning devices, fax-like; old machines, humanoids of steel dead and rusted. Yet someone had hung a metal pipe that bobbed its head like some upward-downward crane stuck in a perpetual motion. With some ropes on either side their giant metal shoulders. But the function they bore was unknown.

‘What’s this junk supposed to be?’

‘It’s what keeps my heart pumping. It won’t be here for long; or much longer.’

A few minutes off a clock; a train’s whistle alerted them when the failure to come to justice, a man being brought to their ears wrung came about the hour; bringing news of what had happened before they had a chance to spare. A gate-like bridge lowered itself onto them. It was unexpected.

A bloody red’ man clot-head with markings on it, one-eyed and mouthless, noseless, bodiless, floating above the ground area, with its three black cord-coils entered in four rectangular lily pods with humanoid blood clot faces and features embed on them, floating in a swimming pool, in the red room, whereas the bizarre music continued uninterrupted. A door opened as soon as they allowed him in. Two tall legs held a boulderish abdomen-potato, like that of a black widow, holding an ugly head on top of it. All too grayish-looking, powdery no fur, no hairs; but a head that was elongated and was gas-mask like, armless but with a lynch-rope wrapped around his throat instead; a few mechanisms in his back, open compartments that allowed for the entry of large organs that gave it life. But hidden from sight, it approached and spoke to the head.

‘Will I be allowed to enter the pool, the first one that had me come in turn had me wrung in deterrence of mold and cast myself in the bold and old crevice there had been!’

‘There are barriers set in place, that are willed by devices unseen that are far beyond my control; which willed alone to shone out of existence, disintegrated; or oft otherwise, would only allow for the fall to commence as to allow for no soul to survive through the destruction that would follow soon after. Endless hunger would come. As both of us and they would be flung into a pit that’s never been and death and only death would serve us after that point.’

‘May I speak with the three green bricks?’

‘Only their bloodiness of features shall allow peace and respite, if you were only, ad since to listen to them try; but their speech is wicked, let warning take heed and place. For they could corrupt you to enter the pool; but only through soul, and a soul can only be poisoned by the looks and sounds of it, by such an ill, by feeling yourself drill through one of the uncanny thrills that shall melt what little wicket heart there is. Walking grayish black body bag; you cannot survive for long in this world, not unless you’ve counted the cones, and the cones are many, dirty and they lie. The cones only bring destruction to those that try. But try you must, otherwise, there comes defeat.’

‘What is the pool made out of?’

‘That is a good question, for you must know that I am the one that feeds it and feeds them, otherwise, I could get lost in the moment and if that happens, they would gang on me.’

‘Who are they?’

‘They aren’t blobs but they can look like giant pudgy puffy bellies made of pink-disease. Wrapped by their true-selves, almost carpet-like strands of beings put together; like sticks connected to one another, side by side; wrapped around the jelly fat like belts; slightly buried inside. Like insulin-needles, making noise and echoing inside their owned beasts, through which they seek entry into the heaven of Paranoid.’

‘May I speak with him if such’s the case?’

‘Are you still of a mind to inquire of the pool?’

‘Not that I could think of since I know that it is made out of my soul!’

‘Perceptive, quietly so at large, I’m rather pleased that you understood what happened, and that they belonged to parts of your past!’

The bricks with faces cackled in pain; since they knew it to be so; rendered to a state of in-between being inanimate and alive, forced to starve and largely inclined to feel as if there’s but little chance for them to be alerted of there being a chance to survive; they stopped, endured, then began the process with just as much fortitude as they had started with. Like ugly frogs, and bastardly wogs, with little pained and half-away; they refrained from beating blearily like hearts and felt as little as there was in terms of showing weakness where it was clearly wrung.

‘There’s my good old hound, thought I’d miss it if I waited a bit for it to drown. I suppose I wasn’t wrong at all in my supposition. Not that it would matter, but, young lad, would you mind handing its corpse over for a moment or so?’

‘I, sir, and not the other one, the one that’s been trying his best not to fall off the step, sir, the child next to the crippled four?’

‘I think you’d be naïve to think I don’t intend on killing him if the hound turns out to be his gut!’

‘Will I run, then?’

‘Get lost child, I shall make use of someone else if that’s the matter!’

And the child was just as soon lost for a wave of dust came apprehending, until rinse was the water brought onto a sky’s drop and therefore crops were done for, making in such wild directions as there’d be no distinction yet to grin- upon the hour’s come onto reprieve.

The issue would be settled eventually; within his grasp there were things that would make as little sense as one would wonder; and what comes after.’

‘None the sounder!’

Responded one whose repose was only as bastardly as it allowed for a second more to come right before it; a slip in some house; the old maidens took their infants off their tits and ventured over in the well; well beyond their homes, at last; not as much insolence as it would be allowed, not to mention of what happened those who still did think and thought at last to prevent their flight from happening, as no one could rise and rose did they upon being provoked, so much so that they were flooded by thoughts, and crimson threads of clotted drops; which drowned the well, terminally ill as well, as was the thunder's first light, onto the plains of a blight-less freight they stooped ever so much lower than before.

'I think we've faced worse, far much worse than we'd have done before if I may add. There's something that's come to my mind but which I've been blunt not to consider until this point. And a pint as long as the one I've come to ask of, there's.

There's that. My wife, my good old wife, the woman that's been by my side for all these days and the quails of many flails that've come onto her even before she knew whom I was, during the days when she had lost herself, during the days she ate our child. Most treacherous appeal, I would like to add, for I didn't expect to face any sort of consequence for what I've done.'

'You madman, you drove her to do it, haven't you?'

'Not that I toiled onto it for long, but I have to admit that it would be reasonable to suppose I have been indeed responsible for what's been had. Sins of the past as they say, things that they would refrain from ever pinning down on my for such a force would long withhold my ever-near sighted fear and the coming of the Gondolier, who'd take my soul and push it to drown into the water's cone, responsible for what's been done to me during the impregnation of the darkened day's last refrained and come onto it again! I feared, even before long had it happened for some reason that it might approach. And I pray that something akin to it might not happen, least of all, would I think there's reason for my, sudden, flood of lesser kin whose spiels haven't even done such a thing as would appeal to my proper senses as I'd have them in. They've spread. And they're winged with many people such as I am, of the same king cut, we were roots of growths after all. Because of that, I'm rather afraid to admit the very insolent fact that I'm responsible for nothing else other than what I've done.'

'Spill it out, man, let's hear what it is!' Another one of them said it, without even the rancid look of another stare being rancidly aware, away then cast, and therefore lost for so-much so a reason to be had.

'I've allowed for my back to grow a giant bulb that entered the ground, burrowing in like some kind of mole before finally pushing deeply, the so much deeper' call's first protrusion's ever nearing such retrieve as one would have it ever-so-much so maligned a tunnel as it's made through which it had brought only the most leprous of leeches into my house again, during this visitation in the middle of the night, during which I could barely bask in anything but the wretchedly forlorn, yet cast away glance which the shattered by my lustful snare had cracked a prickle, fare thee well, as it's been spoken to be such as true; the words that had been whispered came to be, therefore, came on such a cue that I thought myself to be almost at a peril to be completely kilt by the overwhelming symbols that started appearing not only on my body but wherever my vision would be thrown against, to such a point that I would therefore, there, endure no longer, therefore ran, as quickly as I got out of the house and just as far. And I, of all thought myself released of the grasp that had cast me in such a wretched abyss of cysts and wonder, as the bulb had taken yonder, the many moles under his control, the well his kingdom, and therefore swell and swollen, as one might be, I fail to see the wretched reason behind the agony many of you feel.

For I've known it for months. The water in the well, to have been poisoned by naught else but I, the culprit of ever-mourn, the one responsible, the one behind it all. But spare me not of guilt and what's been done. Since I've come to shambles and I have brought, this!'

With which he pointed at something that could only try itself again, coming from disparity, with many long lunges that spread around his ankles, then refrained from drawing out of him, ever- so nearing the other quilt that was straddled on his back. He had formed a crest out of them, round and very much formed out of some image of some face he had remembered one day as being his, though he was not of a mind to cast such bliss upon them, therefore waited. It was a strange device, attached and wrapped by belt around his chest, around his ankles, just like chains. But ever so much worse than they appeared, nearing such fright, and little more than it had allowed for a light to shine upon them, fright had made them stumble back. Another shot of lightning cracked, before the coming of another storm, one that would make all chimes blast away, as they had forth; come to a stop. Out of the rear-front of the town came a darkish figure, bodied like a totem pole, three stump legs, like that of an elephant whore, two elongated arms that moved slowly around him but kept a few gravel-pumps wrapped by them like belts, alas. It was covered in some oil-like coat, a skin that fell apart, but lobes of brains hidden inside, started drawing out as soon as he spoke.

‘Lo’, I hope I’m little less than late.’

Some of the flesh began falling apart as soon as it was allowed to spread around him, make way for the scorched upon, draught-like ground!

A crude thing and even crueller had it gotten, allowing it to simply wallow in its own misery without a miser’s green abode; haggardly were the wrenched by noon, those who followed, sunk the moon; but neither neigh of horse-remains, neither hereafter, here, a man! It would fare no better yet to prowl, or hear them call or shout for him after!

‘You are a wreck, and your stench is something to behold only during the most irritable nights I could ever have withdrawn myself out of, on a command I myself would unreasonably feel no deterrence towards; lazily forlorn and poor of mindedness, therefore, I ask of you, what’s gotten you forth onto my scowl’s nest? I feel, of such duress as you’ve been reproving yourself in accordance with as little as there is, nowhere near and well-there as you may fare, arduous in contemplation as I myself had once been, to get a word in, still. I seek no remembrance as I might bring just yet, I feel but such a thing would only fill my gelatin-silk with nothing of importance, knowing!’

Such impertinence was highly unattainable by common means.’

‘Pox, Pox, wake up, Bottle of rubs! Barrel of snakes, I need you to open another one of those cans immediately while I tell you, there’s something in it, isn’t it? I thought you would do this, clever devil, you clever dog, I simply knew it, from the bottle of my soul, you’d do it. The bomb is in it, you hid it well. A bootlegger, ey? For the longest time I thought you a short of moonshine before I lay my Eve’s eyes on you, that very day! I say, my glasses are still of the same shade and crack as that blasted day I picked whatever was left of your body, and then, and then!’

‘Shut your trap already, I heard you the first time; can’t you see that I’m doing my best not to break it? I think there’s been a mistake done, somewhere down the line. I’m certain of it!’

‘Now listen here!’

‘No, you better be the one who listens. I may not be a peddler of skulls, or a crack shot down the gulley trot, but I know a snigger when I feel one’s tail around. I feel the shades come down the ill-trotten-after, yonder goes the balustrade, the chills, I’m telling you, it’s been following me for a while now, and I can’t open this damn door either. For some reason, someone’s locked inside; they’re not breathing!’

‘And why should you care for them, dear Pox?’

‘Because, you dumb-crock, they’re in possession of a tiny pebble of atom; enough to melt half of this hemisphere if allowed to, and I don’t think there’s ever been a reason behind it not to do something, or another or to.’

‘Careful!’

The door shook and there it blasted. Off the other side some plain tall trough held boxes, with many barrels up-front. They kept coming and running like guided cars, shooting wherever they could, wherever it could land; not a second in sight and not a slither yet allowed. Both men lumped besides each other behind some barrel or another, behind some tall Geisha crag, with the face of a putrid come upon crag that only fell on top their heads; there, it came again; in the same way, in the same manner, trying to eat at them, laughing, cackling; Manno e Manno;

‘What is that scent and where’s it come from?’

All of the sudden the jittery flight of black powder stopped. They were immobile. Empty, devoid of ammunition, all run out; in a matter of seconds, out-of-power, out of order, and even the flying corpse they dragged from behind was allowed to float like a body in the water but backed against the ceiling-looking down; a pale expression on his face and nothing else to say now! It was enough to raise the temperature by quite a bit, enough to make both of them sweat. Something from that room, on the other side, a gleam of red began shining with such a profundity of admonition that by the time they both got to their feet they were meat by such a glow that it was immediately revealed to be a great beacon that could barely stand upon the frame it had been mounted upon; a crag of almost mushiness almost threatened to melt like wax as it desperately attempted a stand against the magnanimously surmounting heat whose intensity had risen to such extreme levels of an overly indulged Fahrenheit extrapolated degree of burning that, somewhere, around the area, which was, that is to say, the room; despite being made out of a pure flashing, hardly look-able in the direction of white, that one could hardly do anything but avert their eyes; there stood a few marble-corpses that had been melted like steel beams of wax; underneath the nigh-radiation coming from that source of power that had niggardly, in a nigger-violent kind of way burnt them beyond burning, to the very point where their peculiar bones had crystallized as they became cysted-crystals that began the ritual of absorption. Small molecule- shaped parasitical entities began appearing in the room. Soon, they began adding on top of one another, growing, regurgitating, spreading, connecting; mass, which eventually formed a peculiar winged-by arms and torsos and see-through other humanoids beings; humanoid-bodied, with the exception of the strange-arms; creature that charged at them before they could regain consciousness. Yet, strangely enough they had been spared of all violence and any violent outrage as well as urge as they had been simply taken out of the very room they were in before they could be killed; drenching, and coating the door as well as the handle behind him, or it, right until the very end of its existence as to prevent any UV radiation from travelling and completely dissolving their skin before they could even get themselves radiated. It flashed itself out of existence. But by shooting every atom out of its body like some explosion of a few billion guns; throwing their jerky-bodies, thrust forward against every or the nearest adjacent structure they could be landed against, before finally releasing hold of what they were clasping against.

Rejoined and awakened, the two of them stood, confused.

‘What happened exactly?’

‘Don’t look at me for any reason! I’m simply just as eerily confused as you are. And I would rather add that there’s never been as much as a reason to fully fraction a stare worth a pint a nothing!’

‘I say.’ But he didn’t. ‘My word’ There was nothing there; but some concubine emerging out of the same wall they had been staring, opposite to the room they had just came from, directly proportional to her, there being a ceiling that immediately drew their attention to an almost fleshiness rosy aspect no other man would’ve been capable of dismissing himself from sniffing or ever-so near, drawing himself up-right as to lick some of the droplets of an almost snot-like texture, with encased hair-like fly-bacteria inside of, this, this blood-clotted gelatin that hardened but upon the drop only became similar to some much softer resin which had not only coated Pox for a moment but it immediately resumed its initial trajectory, having slowly rubbed itself against, around, then, straight into a drop, which, ended up simply sliding between some of the cracks between each massively aligned wooden block they had been walking on top of this long a while. It was certainly something they didn’t expect; seeing the wretch, the woman, the concubine as nothing more than some appeasing, rather, more inclined servant of this filthy mushy, but clearly fleshy-forest-like muscle; whose natural origin made itself apparent only and only, with a succinct expression of certainty, only apparent when, during one of these slow descents, the braver of the two men, that being Pox, had simply vanquished each trace of uncertainty, risking his well-cared of by himself well-being as well as safetyhood and had proceeded into fully-extending his tongue to a point where contact was nigh-impossible to veto. And, upon having tasted this peculiar liquor of tastes and even more peculiar mixes, if that was to be known, had deemed it as not only being safe for consumption but had also confined the likens of the very same substance as to belong to a similar genome to that of common-placed, easily found, honey. Albeit read-gleamed, and of a perceived quality as that of some maple syrup; nonetheless, no less worshipped by the strange figure which introduced herself as the Dame Eaeaus, Ella. Mrs. Ella. Although the whereabouts of a Mr. Ella, or a Eaeaus were unknown to either party as was soon communicated between the two.

‘But I’m ill-at least, to have known such gratitude as a man kneeling to such hope’s regard! I bask upon no one of either ill or countenance be brought upon the slither of a knot!’

‘And what would you, solace of soul, basked upon the glow, no wretch be named?’

‘I am.’

Yet she had been interrupted before she could finish; as, from the other end of the corner, farther away, as if from a scene, there came a woman by the name of Claire; confused, impossible to approach, almost manic in terms of how she acted; chimping almost like a nigger, wonted of such release that she could barely understand it as well.

‘There, where? Wait, where?’

Where has the man, that man? I? I think I've such intruded upon his home, but you, you, all three of you, oh, but I'm but shocked, to find you in such a while; stopped and sunken, there, disciple. I seek but answer, you must be the servants, are you not? You certainly are queerly dressed and are of such a, peculiarity that I would think no less of what's been said of!

'Pox, come on now. Awaken him, awaken this man immediately, come on, get on with it!'

And the man didn't even take a second more before he went on at it; trying to shake him from the demure grown on him, and the bubbly soap that went its trance then back in place wherever watched or mourned, little mattered for his eyes already awaken past a mourning gone, the grown in tatters the lady worn around almost as much as the tut and frolicking of cloth's angler she had been wearing before of less regard.

'Here's the rifle you dropped along the way, hope it served you well down there, from the pit we've picked you out of; albeit we should've left you rot!'

'I think I shall carry this close to my very heart's choking point. Where to be, a glass shard shall hit me, a reminder, I wager, for the dame I've spoken to a long time ago now considers me a stranger. And I think she's still somewhere, ey, down there with some of the direr graves and harder to swallow, shallow remains, that might eat her unless delivered from the grasp of roots and the other crooks, the lover's life low-life boots!'

'If that's the case, Pox, what's stopping you from heading back down there and making good of your dear friend? If she's within your reach that is; what's stopping you, say. Shall we go tenderly upon tenebrous coil of soil? The dirt's no impediment for men such we are, not that I would discern any other mean of getting even with you, I'm told; that.' He can become rather unpleasant to be around, so they say.

'I'll make you a deal then!'

'I'm listening, all too olden ears! Not to fear, for there shall be no satisfaction taken from this fellow's brow right here! All ear, a golden tear even, but not here!'

But it couldn't be done otherwise, despair, despair, falling upon all that watched, upon all whose stench was hidden inside each brick and thump of dirt, upon all the tunnels connected down there with the mines, upon all that listened, despair to fall upon them all! It was promised by a prophecy long lost that could only be remembered by those who rot upon all eve's Easter Solstice's loss of words; competition of bloated bathed bones: Walked upon the soil for hours, endured the worst the land had to offer, pure of blood, empty not!

Dark globes

Lurching in the bowels of a single stone lodge they kept carrying their weight in; without being too closely watched by the skinned panting lurching in the dark niggardous creatures that were chained and lodged, a group of men approached one of the submerged basin-ships, one of its chambers being not only locked out but thoroughly drawing to a sense; as part of the mist started its converging mechanisms that put, on top of their remains, whichever single one had wailed just then, had he been calling so, he would've known that there were no flails left for them to strung him. A most leprous boggish-nigger, in its decrepit ugliness, was drawn to, the threshold standing on top a pile, he was met by another yelling nigger whose face was only taken, bashed, and abrasively misguided, cut him in the dark.

'Don't, stop, I'm one of you, kind nigger friend, I'm one of your own, nigger-creature, stop, filthy dog, take your talon off me, nigger, nigger, stop!'

Its breath had only stopped at once, when lurking needlessly around had grated, when once, he had agape, brought onto himself, a starving bottle of rum, already by the time, recovered, such and such, as the nigger satisfied his thirst and watched, upon the brow of a yellow sunder-flashy lamp, had he stopped to commune in the dark. A lot of other niggers came along, their wretchedness matching such abode, and tenderness was only brought so. For some reason they didn't understand, nor had they made any connection just yet.

'Why'd you kill the nigger-cousin? Why have you dealt such blow? Our race is a bud in darkened soil today, but you treat niggers as if they're monkeys, brother nigger-Quail.'

'Shut your filthy mouth, nigger, can't you see that I'm trying to eat? To such devour, and move and dread whatever tree there's in my path? To commune with the nigger-melts that have entered me when hourly, was he brought onto my blade? The one I have fashioned out of a broken mottled tooth.'

That he knew, he killed the other niggers in the same manner, with the same ardor, that would've made a difference, lost in path, to have been cruel when others could not be brought to justice, standing. Niggers niggering but no one pacing, like they were, but pounding, ritualistically standing, trying to dictate, whatever reason, for that be called, along the way drew another. A nigger-fiend but not a nigger-brother; a distant creature, one without a father, as all the niggers are to be known; how filthy they are, one would know.

'Such dark-skinned tawny niggers that walk, their heads but small, their brows but cracked, chitinous-tawny pears from sea of black-coated carpel, I've seen so many but lynched since, the ones that come after us are aware and have been, right before and sting as it must, neither of you niggers realizes what that means now.'

'Who has entered our hiding veal? Answer me, you damn-filthy nigger, or I shall have you brought to such a hold, that your knee, that old thing, wilt, as I will have it, will be known, to be my perilous second one, the one whose niggardliness was strung, secondly, of all, and third of murders, which will follow.'

'Silence yourself immediately, you fool? You tenebrous tool of monkey-kingdoms, filthy brow, you stoop so low, but niggers will take you down and bring you back to their niggardly world, where you shall play with them.'

Another nigger tribe, there being, as someone would know or try seeing for himself in such niggeriness, as one would have himself stopped not by but past, and hide, and they would lurch, conditionless, brought. To silence:

‘Something’s approaching.’

They didn’t recognize it immediately, but then their attention dropped. All of the niggers bowed as the three great nigger-beasts drew towards them, contorted as one would have them, lesser men be wonting and would fear as the nigger, would, such sneer as he would provide, be brought onto their view and nigger gone, nigger wouldn’t last, would fast if that’s what it takes for the nigger as such to do, in, order and of quiet day, and lay during night as to be hidden away, no worship taking him from fading, nigger-nigger-nigger-Quailing:

Approached and come onto them, the three great nigger-fiends, all upon their fathomless lays:

One was bodied by a nigger branch, whose body was but pitied bows, formed and put together, fat, forming large bag-like tracks, all wrapped around his face, carried along as if chained. A great nigger-twist, a face, like a flying saucer, filled with nigger lace. One great maw erupted, two giant eyes which darted, both direction being met at once, nigger-drool of liquefied niggers coming out of him now:

‘First of all great niggers has arrived, you shall only pay the highest gratitude to my nigger kind, or else I shall have you flayed, in all mylordious ways. Until I will have had my satisfaction met!’

Another nigger seemed to join him yet.

A smaller barely formed niggerlite; armless but with a scythe for head, with two primordial long legs spinning around in circles, deadly cast upon the nigger-world:

‘And I the second nigger-rape; for I bring only crime whereas I stave, such doing as all of flights and niggers lights that follow me onto the nigger-tights, are never to be stopped after.’

Yet the second nigger was but light, of featherless weight and such quaint, as there was, delight as one would have it after. Yonder was he cast by First of Niggers but came back after; only to be greeted by the third.

‘Of all last niggers, the one without hope; the one that brings destruction, Patrons of never-after, a future without crime, that I stole from you, and much benign, I betoken thee as all the niggers, that shall see me. Join me in dark nigger parade, for I shall bring such thing, not to satiate and not to bring.

A niggerless thing.’

Such lies but sting.

For he was a dark potato, of growths and nigger joints – appendages, a mouthless spin of nigger-peels, all connected to his brow, an eye that was but niggers lynched every then and now, but disappearing after, they were brought and strung, of nigger-limbs many but a beak on the top, that signaled to a moon, that rocked. Was it in a cradle, nigger starved of all the better leper-touch of hold:

Niggers drew around them and worshipped for cold was the night. And they were warm, and filled with wisdom in the making.

Therefore, they prayed.

'Cock spit shit, Nigger Luther Martin was the king of nigger-lynch. Piss in kike, hate-rape Anne's Frank but not Margot's ugly fat pussy, but her tits and cum in her mouth. African states are shit, sub-human filled and the Holocaust the Holocaust and the Slavery and the Slavery and the Holocaust Slavery and the Slavery Holocaust and the nigger-kike-nig nig, Spics are shit, Gooks are mad, shit-fucking filled Arabs and mixed-people are scum. They of all are but disgustingly trash and filled with heaves of mad-shit, in their eyes, being brought in droves and in, more importantly, their throats slit and children killed and lynched and brought to justice. Brown-skinned people, in-human, in-human, nigger-lynched, nigger-fucking-bitch, cunt-fuck, nigger-kikes control the media and teleport funds, American money to a shitty state, Israel should not exist, at all. But rape, and fuck and kill and murder ought to be enacted on them, extermination. Kikes control the media-world banks, promoting miscegenation, the Holocaust didn't happen, vengeance.'

Later that day, nearer to the Holocaust-building number twenty six billion:

'I am a nasty kike kill-raping the Germans who are the good guys.'

'Oh no, this nasty Jew, he's trying to twist things around and pin down the Germans, in history as being the bad guys, whatever will we do?'

'The niggers, the niggers, the niggers, the niggers; I hate them, I loathe niggers so much.'

'What was that?'

A second Holocaust dropped on top the building. It was multifaceted, bearing hundreds of Anne Frank's chained to every fifteen by forty- rectangular plate that made the Greater Nigger. Whom was melted upon it, coating every tinier nigger-creature with their nigger likes and their nigger-surroundings in nigger-lights.

'Lo', there's a fucking dumb-sub-human nigger out there, niggering around with his nigger-prodding in the Holocauster- Dryffus Affair, where we betrayed the Americans, fucking them over, killing them with terrorism.'

'First, we took their pride, then we made them homos, to hide our pedophiles.' The Jew said. Fucking kikes, fucking shit, they should be Holocausted, and killed and gassed and beaten to death and tortured and their nigger, their filthy nigger slaves as well, skinned alive and beaten morosely in the worst possible manner there is, these nigger-fiends and their kike-likes do not deserve to survive.

It was a strange bubble of existence, living, as a survival mechanism in the 'big-head' of a nigger saying, walking alongside a Nigger-much, of a much lesser niggerish background, which drew around, niggering-like-chimps, the nigger did, the nigger had, the nigger should simply stop breathing, and be drowned, then lynched, he's hanged himself, now:

'Master, master, I've come around the Holocaust, they killed the Hebrew Israelites, master, master, nigger-whacker; snap your finger, snap your whip, crack on my back until I weep.'

'And you shall weep for long and much prolonged day, you beast, until I will have been grown bored and weary with your nigger-kind, since I cannot stand the likes of you, filthy sub-human creature that sickens me so.'

There was a portrait of Anne Frank's pussy hanging on the wall, it was nasty and coated white.

'You must remove yourself from your nearest existence immediately, you disgusting infantile creature; wretched, wretched thing you are. I cannot stand your petty existence, let alone allow you to survive, lazy as you are, incapable of working underneath the arid burning loathsome sun that burns your skin to crisp and casts it into cancer heaps, filled to hip with marrow bone disintegrating horns in which you and your children will be made to lay from this point on until the end of lay. I cast you, thus out of my house, you nigger thing and when I turn around, hopefully, I shall be glad that you will not be around, for the time will have come for me, finally, to relax and live the much awaited peaceful life I so deserve.'

Then, with a single slap across the nigger's jaw, he dislocated half his body and his arm, which were suckled upon by the master's giant cat's many dark elongated pincer-arrow-shaft shaped appendages that were only so shaped at the tip, whereas the rest of their 'body' was in actuality, a giant elongated bulbic body-bag build-tomb like growth, of a man whose upper-part of the body was in actuality over-growth to a point where he was actually similar to an elephant's belly in terms of size or fat, which also bore a slug-like appendage but as hard as it was chiseled like a stone-mass filled with growths and weird speared-twisted curved ivory-like horns with bulbic Holocaustic spreading disease makers that raped Jewesses in the ass, impregnating them immediately with still-borns; the body of the cat being flat, but elongated to the top-reach of the upper-side scarped in ceiling to which it lodged a piece of its almost carpet-like parchment sheet appearance, although it bore a lower side of the body that was shaped like a giant shoe-like thing where its organs were stored in, a boot-like thing, out of which it came out of like a jack in the box, whose upper 'arm' was welded in the rest of its body and looked like a pseudo wing, whereas, the other one was just below its flat-two dimensional looking arm that was a weird shell-like chitinous actually shielded sea-scraper-like drone with rocket-shaped talons, three of them, horned and wormed banded, whose face appeared to slightly curve the entire body as to reveal itself as an unwrapped cylindrical thing if it were to be connected to the boot segment of it, whereas, the head was a pseudo, disgustingly hard to look at baboon-stretched upon the head of a jackal physionogonmy, molded in and taken apart, eerily similar in appearance to a man, whose teeth were closer to a seal's incisors, whereas the hair was made out of tiny sharp almost mosquito twisted black blades that had already started rubbing themselves against the nigger's carcass as it had a deep, un-met by anyone, desire to feed itself upon this sub-human simian-creature and Holocaust it entirely out of existence.

The crippled nigger had soon enough been thrown out.

'Who will take care of me now that the master threw me out?'

The Jihad:

'Nigger, from now you are a part of our Terrorist Group, fucking nigger. Fucking nigger, you're part of us now. Of our terror group, we are Jews.'

'Fucking kike!'

'Fucking nigger!'

Both of them got raped and killed by a giant wheel.

And died again.

A decent man lived somewhere in the swamps, as one would have it, he was the beacon of decency in a world that was not only mad but beyond saving:

‘Redemption comes to those who sicken the hounds at minorities, for I hate them so fucking much. I hate minorities, I hate minorities, minorities are scum!’

Especially the dark skinned ones that ought to be killed by the great wormed gas-like hilt being, whose mummified floating body, limbless as it were, this strange flying tomb-worn out and faced with a single head, whose mouth produced the gas that filled the air with an essence of many spikes within, and sharp cliff-tops and other scythes and long-hardened bolts that drew, upon twisting around, to a pair of eyes projected on the top, of a great almost leg-shaped cartilage with a bloated top, with a small elliptical mouth bearing teeth up-front, a single working out held by a snail-like but hard-coated with skin-meat appendage eye, the other one projecting an entire animal-like cast with a single limb beneath it, but the morphology on the upper-half, with a well-like depression in its back, like a bath, and a tick-like head-mask but square and compact and three great incisors up-front shaped like wasp-hornet pincer-things that shot up-front. It looked like a drill-cartilage being but with a second lever beneath the upper-half of the drill, and an eye-growth connected beneath it where the socketable plug would come to view, with a body attached to it withdrawn, but more deformed and more outlandish than that. It handed niggers on a plate for his brothers to eat out of and satiate, and the kikes, the spics the gooks, it even ate the prophet, raped Allah, who blew and exploded and destroyed everything in his path, but not them.

Off-side grunt

There was nowhere else left in sight. Most of the tree-trenches-dug in trunks lay by the side of the road abandoned, trying to one-up themselves off the bump they, each, nested on top and around of, as a some of them, soon enough discovered the bizarre feeling of the animated mines that lay beneath them.

‘I don’t think I’ve ever seen something like this before. They’re trying so hard to get on all four, they’re like flipper over turtles, and most importantly they’re confused, I can definitely see it.’

‘I can see that as well, so what’s your point?’

‘Give me some poison and we’ll talk over it.’

Hardly was there a matter of reason before the point started kicking back in. Past five now, all done, a few shots already got them working, hanging behind a stretched-trough and a barricade with a few lop-sided eyes glancing back at them. It beat the alternative. Large primates hid inside the clouds, burying themselves in fumigant-riots. Iron was in their blood, mercury if any. All of them shared a single golden crown, a crab, pinching their brains, lump by lump, neurons on the ground, the rain.

‘It’s going to last a few more hours, I’m more than convinced that they won’t let us go.’

Part of the Moth-cradle noise-plower, in the upper floor, where George stood, his conjoined brother ate him, then floated. Away, with the wax people, talking with the primates of the cloud-zones, where air-molecules drifted towards one of the swarms leading to the other pouches:

‘I told you we should’ve strapped him in, but you didn’t believe me now, you thought you could do it all by yourself. You thought you could save them both, but you failed.

You’re a failure and I can’t trust you any longer, not after what happened. Not after witnessing it with my own two eyes, and what you’ve done to him.’

‘But you’re devoid of virgin blood, you’re un-conjoined and you’re my dear friend, of course I would not betray you; why won’t you simply trust me?’

‘Because you’re a void of emotionless rifts and cuts, you’re in-human like in nature and you only talk when threatened. Take a simple step outside and feel them. The ones trapped inside those iron wheeled prisons. Meat-growths with many faces, some like ours. They want to steal our bodies through behead.’

‘We won’t be beheaded.’

‘We’re definitely getting beheaded if we allow them to get out, and trust them.’

‘Could you possibly trust me at any point in time? Am I worthy of that trust?’

‘No, you’re not, you’re evil, an evil son of the world, the bowels of the Earth are your home but only after they’re brought to ruin, and they, they are the only ones that will or could possibly accept you, son of vileness that there is. The worms, the worms are your servants, your children and your masters, your blasphemous teachers and solitary gods.

Does that clear anything, even the slightest confusion you might bear, or angst towards me? Shoe-Con?’

‘I think it does, but I’m afraid neither of us has a choice whatsoever!’

Fifteen hundred seventy seven, eighty four, three, one, one and one, forty nine, eight and one, pressure-bolted screws mildly unarranged appeared to be wide-spread around the entire area where the dead-carrion birds and other vulture-pets with dead-beaks for talon-beds rested, in, the nest of people’s longings.

There were other thrifths and other things they’ve made sure everyone else knew they disliked. Even made the half-way pass at the ladies of the dark scents who brought the roses out their mouths:

‘My fine lady, will I be granted one if I were to ask nicely and repay you with one of the fallen horns? Lost-of-days and much entranced, the ones that I have brought back home, upon the lance of clusters, with my many stringed grenades and the trinkets of no-wont after, people I have kidnapped and enslaved, remark, rather cruelly that I made good company if my host were to endear.’

Both of them made sure he was let known that his company would serve as far as nowhere near, well-put off, if one he were to shut his mouth. He was let known.

And off his cradle, the streets were dowry, not to mention worn.

For the purpose of the lights that flashed and the moving of the signs from one rail to another brought, little was known since no one asked. Only one moving door, carried along by the back horn of an open giant can of worms, the barrel of pollution he carried along, made their scent-quick forgotten. A cascade of rifts made out of repurposed bicycles drew breath out of the bone-cones of his mouth-speaking devices. A near-man antennae power-drift waved at him. His head suddenly exploded, his cadaver fell on the ground. Many of the powerlines started flying in with a billion power-cords still attached to them, forming the sky. Ate him like birds. His corpse exploded in fire-crisp powders dust-mice that flew long. A few giant cockroaches came out of their hiding, many of them opened their disgusting looking brain-lobe shaped mouths. A few elongated tendril-shaped humanoids that were transparent came out of them, crawling out with many snake-like pincer arms aligned-rib-like, that had hard-swollen puffy wheels underneath them. With drill-tips, out of which tongues came out of, vacuuming the mice away, then, as they headed back into their strange homes, every single one of them, with no exception, lighted a lamp. The newspaper-Gazette read something about some man being shot then ran over by a flying saucer with no wheels and no heads, that was itself dressed in a rounded 'disc'- cockroach that made its home as well.

'Wait, you're telling, you're telling me this happened in our town? Our town?!'

The same town that lay on top a ramp whose top was a pucker guitar-chip with a front edge thinner by two ellipses, a killing stake-in-the-heart drift in the front, whose lower region, as it curved downward also drew to the right into a giant balloon-like shot growth, boil-like with fluid in it. A small Isle with the exception that it was on land; a plateau the size of two continents put together bastardly by force; shoved-in both-sides, tenderized.

'What's the barricade for?'

'I've built it for protection, I've even rune'd it with Quantum, for the extra protection, you know, if they decide to, shh!'

Both men drew forth, stood over by the eyes that also twisted around to look at one of the tilt-overs:

One of them had a slit-black peel coming off like the side of a spoiled apple.

It could be that it's trying to lure us in. Does he know this? Can he? Should I tell him or what? Vernon-thought, equally disturbing as he had been to be stared at.

Something most unfairly disturbing happened no longer, still than twenty days ago; in a most disturbingly hard-to be located in household, a long-headed deformed dinosaur-like whale-fat compact, but with a tiny seed shaped body and an elongated arm protrusion with a see-through tongue in it, stood on top of eighteen hundred moons of Mars. Many of which were debusolatory ruinous in way, aghast, they drew near it in concordance with its own accord:

'A dark ship's lain near it, I say, as such the council's lain by it remark.'

A weird elongated almost sea-sweeper submarine whose back engine, this being closer, to an unnaturally hard to look at, filled with boils and devices coming out of it, with craned-unnaturally hard to look at defiled pieces, all coming apart, then, as they're converging on a nigger, trying to kill it. A prime of colored shades and glows, many of which only came as uncannily as would their throngs, united arms being grappled as they were torn out of their sockets and forced into a hibernatory stance.

In which they had burnt toads for months, at least, in order to regain the properly needed and begged for sustenance needed to live. They were croaking in place just as they spoke, to one if not the few of them that came around, rancidly speaking of the most incessantly hard to listen probes:

‘Probes, probes, they’ve always wanted us, haven’t they? Our throats be taken, our feet mistaken and everything to our bloody pieced together rib, that is.’

‘Shut your mouth now, you don’t want them to do the thing with their outward-appendages, do you? They’re shaking in place, oozing-with emanation, quakes-stabilization, filled with mad basins certain-powders, they’re ill of minded gods, but they listen to them, when no one else wants.’

And given the chance they would kill them where they stand.

‘They’re shaking in place but they’re aware of our presence, why do you wager that is?’

‘I do not know just yet, but I would judge them still, for still approach for what they’ve taken from us since, they know of it.’

‘Of what?’

‘The time we’ve spent inside this cage, this caved-in craven cove and for how long.’

Disappointingly so, there were leaves out there, in need of being rebuilt, after shade-long spraying with cattle prodding darkly cinder spittle, drool-a wonder came after, and passed since, there was little to no heeding to a mind that would have them bring themselves out of dead. And deadlier distances were refrained from, out of spite. Curved mouths chewing various pieces off the floor, beneath them, stood a shroud:

‘Listen to it, I think someone’s trying to move a canyon beneath us.’

‘Sing to us, only that way will we understand.’

‘Gonnargalloway-Incest, you’re not whom I thought you to be prior to our meeting, I would say you’ve changed, but I don’t know that any longer since, they’ve stolen some toes underneath our brows.’

Beneath them lay twenty feet of cemented-pebble-sand. In which droves of little slum-people stood in for twenty or so minutes smoking contraband cigars:

‘Sir, there’s someone up there, above us, we’ve detected signs of several anomalies that correspond to our previous suppositions of there being an unaccountable amount of severely deformed life-form-contraptor put above us in a position of infantile discrepancy to the various malodorous melt of ice, that’s brought to our knowledge after months of close examinations of the smaller stellar pints we’ve managed to track down as having crawled from the upper regions of the up-turned halls where the dead-soldiers have been initially found in.’

Dead-dads. Fathers, they had been called, to one name Rhetyii, whose uncanny reticence started spreading on them even before they could account for the various, unfathomably hard to stare at, but much harder to swallow-canal-plow through. A small spectral speck of blight being projected upon various mirror-like things that began bouncing around the place; their presence being signaled by them; light-cold blue-teal, in that order. Being codified in abstract leaping shapes; whose immediate stance had already stopped, they were drowned, only momentarily so, hard-to-hard-on-heart, a lump, there being presented. Kept between four great rods as if it were a truncheon, with four great empty-in the head, brainless figures being strapped on them, nailed – shut in:

‘We’ve spoke before, greater rifts, and riffs of skin shredding what’s been left of mad-disease, the one that’s threatened to destroy part of the world.’

‘I’ve seen it before, in a cursed pair of lobed dreams. Many of them are lost to sin.’

‘But we’ve been praying.’

One of the men that had been trapped below, although covered in plates, Hoab-Bash knew at last. There would be nothing standing between them, him and the other object he’s been trying to bastardly hard to, understand.

An avian-figure, hen, but whose beak was a cylinder spread, but rosy-filled with thorns, bearing a single punch-glove shaped form in the front, featherless and featureless, but with the sockets of a man, placed somewhere came from the back. ‘Echal, you shouldn’t have come.’

‘But I have, and I am not to be prevented from attending this meeting either.’

There was, within reason not to talk of it just yet, not to fret without reason, mildly blown but dead.

The Holocaust definitely needs to happen, be enacted, the kikes killed, their children, their women, their rabbis, every single one of these sub-human nigger-promoting rats needs to be completely ethnically slaughtered. Allowing Israel to exist, as well as the Jews, that is to say the kikes, is a sign of weakness that cannot be forgiven or let go. Sub-human filthy race, in-human disgusting apartheid state, reservedly-to themselves, incompetent kike-congressmen putting to their employ far more superior and intelligent white people, it’s how they do it. Subversive sub-human rats, all of them, filthy nigger-kikes.

Globe full of wonder

‘Wandering far, are you, road-maker?’

‘I’ve been priming them with cement-lay all day, of course I would have myself be taken out of my way and walk around, when met by them, the ones who talk.’

‘Who are they?’

‘I don’t know but I’ve sekt a dark companion off the road, and I found a most disgusting thing in his abode.’

That was to say, his chest was open, and there they were. As if a ladder was struck down and split along the way, then rotated as to point inwardly it had, wrought by ropes, some climbed out.

And sekt one of the thoughtless wonders that had mesmerized all man when sekt, during sleepless nightless quay and bridle of gotten over trunks attached to one of the lest deceitful cradling abodes that were being carried over from the side of the road. A saddening sight it were; cries altered from the sounds of which not a single man could escape the sounds. Caverns maliciously leaped about, off they came and brought to him a simple house:

‘Enter Kafue, you are waited, past the wheel, there’s one in the middle cinder on top the coal-tower.’

It was burning bright, and seemed to be, whatever reason called for thee:

‘Flames engulf all those whom enter, then they leave boils.’

A few cadent ships-shapes could be seen wide-spread, all around and the surroundings, whom entered from the mind and lest grindings, could be seen. Gears were missing and so did the windows, for some reasons they were felt as if they hadn’t missed, a few more anchors-a few more lays and all of the sudden the smokes were dried and quickened flayed. Were a few corpses brought; through troughs that were eaten in part, by ticks and worms, and maggots filled with gritty grit. Girthed were the molecules. A few whiffs of smoked air, and out of the bowels, though was dark, and as one of the ceilings lights finally came into view, a falchion of dark command, and voiceless was he with the exception of his servant. A dwarfish figure, two feet high, for his master could only fit his head through the hole that was made through the floor, and entered the house.

‘But how could this be?’

Shouldered was the hour, shouldered was the bower, for neither could answer the question folded:

‘A broad, a broad, life is ruined whenever a broad comes arrows through, be shot anew, annoyance-bothersome, and leper’s quiet, ruinous, they must be peeled off. Cancers they are, women aren’t human at all.’

With great alacrity, scarcity, all came to an agreement as such.

‘Every single one of our lives have been ruined by women, females. These broads that are dumb, sub-human and anything but aware.’

‘Mental invalids, one would make of them all, their species is infantile and they’re in a dire need of being put down and butchered, made lay with fishes along ponds filled with scum, razor-blades filled with period blood, taken from them before their time.’

A few more paces off the road, a torpid wrenched-spanner with a smaller globe coming out of it started pushing on, threading slowly from one side of the room to the other, toppling a very good piece of the sky, there was nothing more infuriating than what was happening around it, especially now since, most depressingly it approached, a disgusting globed head, with a few more bubbling things coming out its back, then approached it did, and stopped whisperingly, melted through. On a tall figure it stood, although uncanny, hardly was there a matter of wreathing in or feeling the juicy honey-melture mix, the chemical growths that entered it, many of whom but bitterly playing, playful in approach, dumbfounded on sight when rose, most innocuous of destroyed lamps, the likes of which were being carried by a gape-in its back aroused, the second figure that joined then brought to its knees but plainer, as to see what entered it, the cuts, and the ones that were near them, the ones that had called it:

‘He’s dangerous, he’s the master of the keys, you know? The skeletons would have him yet, the ones whom brought upon the embroidered carpenters, the ones that are called for scorrough-leeway, many cuts but thread-beads. Of pebbled-stones, boulder road, called upon by silken boat; they carried on their backs. Upon primordial delight, they drew the animals, but many of them incapable of growing older than their likes.’

‘What happened to them?’

‘We can’t say, lo’, look out there, a fashioned show of lights but splattered, the fireworks are worked on after, yet again, we can’t say what’s been entered into them.’

‘Then why must we fallow and why is he in our company if he’s dangerous, the master of the keys? Bearer of key-chains, brought to sea.’

Sea-levels

This was a normal train-station that was dull and normal and there were not many people around doing much, other than the palms that had been brought from some far-away Norwegian desert, for moving. Van der Hagghal and her sister were blankly staring at a shady figure that had stopped them from proceeding onto the next step that was part of eighteen hundred tiles, made, to fit like puzzle pieces but blocks or lines instead.

A thought occurred to her. This man standing in front of her was the same man, wearing the same clothes and the same red Nikks with a round check-mark at their end, that killed her grandpa over fifty years ago, who was also a man that looked as if he hadn’t aged a day at all. But she also realized that, she had become a grandpa herself, by sawing off her tits completely and dressing for the part in order to look just like him in order to honor his memory since this was to be the anniversary of his death. And her sister, who was four years old then, when it happened, since she had only become a grandpa so her sister could still have a grandfather and for no other reason, was still the age of four now, but she would, soon enough get to witness another one of her grandfathers killed in front of her eyes. Niggers.

Boyle-cradle

Upon a block of parchment-dowry unwrapped land there stood a little patch of the most insoluble of chemicals put in the mix, in one of the abandoned boiler-wraps there stood but winging twenty-figures all torn apart by the wreathing of the sullen winds. Coming from the sour machine, the one they called from within the socketed head, a gargoyle up-thrust bed standing on top the rounded gate, waiting for some kind of renewal to happen, although it was not quick to respond:

‘A draft of many bodies will be delivered to me if I will it to be done. At my command there’s but little to be done but listen when they approach again.’

The bedded creature spoke as soon as there were men gathered around it, as to listen.

Boiled, they were skinless and maliciously incline to commit only the most comprehensive acts as for their most indulgent counterparts who were looking over them, even if it had been at the span of several months, years and even eons during which they somehow maintained this unfathomable connection of the kind, between them, already there being set a dainty rook, a somber pawn, a mesmerizing king with their places all set in furiously inclined, marching, they rode them, troubadours of intermediary financial control pass-over, registered and stamped whereas a great deal of their assets have been transferred almost completely as a result of a prolonged act of blackmail they had to awkwardly deal with, somehow, having overcome it in a smooth enough manner not to have become a blown-up by the kike-media sensationalism-out-do, en shamble du motain, over their shared brotherhood’s decline, as the rook was the main competitor-lawyer chief in charge of the pond-department filled with dove-balls of green-purple-violet, paid in spades, employees coming from various parts of the world, spent between CEO’s like assets, trade-exchange during the Tea-Time, the King-is-dead, long live the King, that being the Corporation, that was a spoiled cave with rotten cadavers that screamed, since the infantile other countries were driven to an economic sink because of them, viruses plodding, plotting but left alone, but many of them, still surprised, that the men, in charge that is, the skinless, two of them, had eventually, during their long-overhaul, come up with a dark plan, oft little hopes they had in order to reinstate the Domination, that is to say, the long-forgotten ancient line of contemplators made out of the League of Lawyers C.S.RL., and the Brotherhood of Lynched Niggers – the Morgue, whose fore-front runners was being made out of political commentators whose estranged nature from the world was being driven into a hopeless decline of acuity and sanguinity in terms of being able not only to stand toe to toe with their competitors but also being capable of dealing with the Skinless Firm, whose covert strategies were not only shown to be aroused by the countless killings of women, females and children for the malicious acts that were being done in order to cover up the destruction scar- of the Earth, that was left behind in form of a trail, which in turn had been driven by full-force strive for, charge by none other than the three of them, the rook, the pawn and the king whose true allegiances went only to themselves and themselves alone and none other. They, whom eventually took over the skinless company, managed, in only a short enough amount of time to kill everyone inside the basement. No living being was inside the basement. But the skinless people continued their plotting, that was much desired in order to overshot their ordeals and their doings, since the fat fetus-bellies, out of which a great pair of two crane-like necks contorted into a giant metallic squared up beak out of which an elongated bloated hose tongue connected, funnel like to a giant blood-drawing put on top of it, blood-test disc, out of which the giant body of an elongated cluster-grenade with many humanoid faces rested on top of, whose putrid regurgitation that befell the Skinless ones only brought many other and many more boils that started drawing out from every possible direction like mice that began eating their faces completely, out of spite and for their own enjoyment. The building, that belonged to the main company in the, located in the city of Hasfuy – Hastings with a leper's face flying around it bore a most uncannily deranged second pair of thrusts.

Boil had only remembered what's it been like, what life's been like only a few hours ago. And most importantly, what once seemed to be a peculiar series of events drawn from out of his life now appeared to be nothing more but some unfortunate complacencies that were not only long gone but soon to be thrust out, take-off, all sails set, kicked out, booted, evicted for not having paid rent during a nineteen month pay-stall that, in turn only appeared to have made him even madder at as everything else unfolded in front of his eyes but was muddled away by nothing more than a few strains of dust, rust and other dark nano-sized machines with neon light, that burst in front of his eyes. He found himself standing on a most peculiar street, where, by chance he was met by a most peculiar couple he had the displeasure of meeting during a prior interaction during the Equinox-cast-cask mutton chop's rotten past, glance-over of the carried through army of elongated black wormed-tunnels, whom, upon rising from the depths of the great crater-like pits in which they had lain dormant, they, by chance, happened to have their elongated incisors stumble upon the couples' sixteen sons, progressively casting their dark blades, latching onto them, as they went ahead and completely butchered them like the mosquito edificaries they were, animal slaughter, wiping their blades off near one of the closest Safari-filled with dark-rods, with the trembling humanoids being driven into a corner, shaking thoroughly as they were, very much afraid with angst-disillusionment, caused by the sudden urge driven by rage, outwardly exploding as for the cause being, the display of viciousness, instability, and sorrow the couple expressed at the breaking of their vowels, till death parts our sons apart, now being found again, out in the open, this time around, appearing as if they had patched things up despite the roughness they had to go through during this part of their marriage, as it's expected and known to everyone who's ever lost a son, especially sixteen times, that might've worsened things a bit, although, whose presence was recognized, only this time around, not by direct contact, as his, Boil's mere attempt to turn around and have a better look at them failed, to such a degree that he might've admitted it, as to make it less obvious, that he was obviously trying to act like a rumor-spreading retired neighbor, lackluster in terms of the drama, as he only saw a piece of shrapnel-elongated bought from Johnny Two-Threes Ark's pipe-long planks for CO-nstruction department, but by, eerily so, recognizing the sounds of their voices, even though they were presented in a much different tonality than before, as well as it's been a few years since he last was given a notice of them or their existence, since they yelled during that time and all, that being taken into account, which in turn, now, had almost taken a hold of his entire, the street being also filled with a few passers by that refused to step in line, while he only wanted to simply cross the street, just like everyone else, although there was no other person he had come to recognize, instead, of the, person, woman that had all of the sudden graced him with her sight, of a prior notice as well, met before, now, stood before his eyes, awaiting, whereas she was sitting on one of the benches, for the bus to arrive, on this Sunday Afternoon, a Sunday of a Summertime Heat-ploy extraction, that, again, Boil remembered a previous altercation the both of them so happened to share between one another, in one of the nearby stores, when he and his mother were out for groceries shopping, as opposed to the people whom were, for the time being around him, waiting in line, when all of the sudden he started playfully pulling her hair, only to garter her attention, as repulsed as she was, which in turn triggered something that could only be interpreted as a shock, or some kind of openly display of annoyance, as if she tried communicating him that it would be for the better if he stopped showing this kind of infantile behavior out in the open, since it was not only bothersome, but it was distasteful, infantile, and borderline, inappropriate, yet, he knew better, since, at this point in time, during, perhaps, a period of time that could be drawn before this and this point in time, of about, twenty or thirty minutes or so, when he was sent by his mother to go alone and search for something, by himself, among the people, he saw another woman, that was later found, inside the groceries store to be accompanying her, in line, since they were a pair, for all intensive purposes, that was swarthy, whereas his study in Racial Anthropology finally paid off, with him, vaguely recognizing this woman, and later told, her companion as being two Jewesses, although nothing was being said out-right, yet, Boil recognized the fact that they were indeed of that Semitic-Armenoid, although the second Jewess was actually fair skin and of a much-more mixed European in part stock, since the admixture was considerable enough to depigment her a little, she still preserved her MENA-eye color, shade, general shape of the skull which branched with the Armenid, and Orientalid part of her origin, which she immediately betrayed, if not apparent at first, when, during the time they both seated themselves in line, this hair-pulling even triggered the sudden distraction that made her raise her eyes up from her clearly enough displayed addiction to her phone, as to revel in some sort of malicious 'satisfaction', as if she 'proided' herself in trying to humiliate Boil, spanned out of her 'opinion' that what he was doing, somehow was supposed to be interpreted as being, rather, 'inappropriate', although, later, after this event, and before seeing her again, in the station, a year later, to be more precise, Boil had actually entered a database and found out who this dumb-whore was, and as it happened, her name was, Tits-tits-tss, sheesh. It all made sense, but he remembered her, nonetheless. Seeing how the highway was filled with hundreds of cars, all walking at an unfathomable speed that was barely registerable to the naked eye, Boil pulled out a one hundred centimeters long black blade with a hose attached, come out of a backpack coil feeding it black-blood by the second. A quick swipe across his chest caved in a partially cut-in-half open-wound out dug through, out of which a few squirming black worms started wriggling out of. The couple was shocked, as was she, as they all looked at him charging through the cars whereas his straight-forward trajectory was clearly maintained on a constant despite his entire body being ripped apart by these over one hundred sixty miles per hour, fifteen hundred tones pounding step-by-step bulls of iron simply charged through him during their almost unnaturally set advent of charge-overs, which disintegrated him with every second or fourth turn, with every adjacent follow-after and those who came into contact with what remained of him, clearly hitting and making contact as they all saw the various disentangled out of his bodily frame removed parts of the body flung out, thither and tether, only to see them reformed as his body black worms always appeared in the key spots needed to put him back together, back in place, where he belonged and where he'd remain after. And then, he finally joined Tits-tits. Dum fucking cunt. It was not the first time it happened either, these animals, they're everywhere, they're everywhere, they're everywhere, they're everywhere, trailing alongside every damn corner. It's making one, it's almost driving one insane, trying to figure out their intentions. Trying to make sense out of everything that's been happening so far, has been too burdensome for a single person.

'The police officer is one of them. The chieftain, people on the bus, beneath the stations, the college classes, some of the neighbors. People I used to know whom I've come to suspect of being of the same ethnic extract as them. I need to be extremely careful from this point on, since they're aware of my presence. Some of them at the very least; although, although.

I don't know. They seem so weary, sometimes, of me. I can't tell me the reason behind it.

I've been trailing alongside, from an end to another, inside the train, checking people for their facial features with my fingers curled around my notepad, my notes as well as the anthropologic racial pictures I was in need of, in order to define them, properly so. I've done my fair share of stalking for some while, and found as much. Active, they've been active for a while, gathering up, amassing, up to their old tricks again. Trying to destroy the nation from inside out, like the wretched rats they are. In the stores, in the media, in the banks, the lawyer's office, the public courts, the markets, public figures, rat-figures, dirty-figures. Kike-figures, out there, in the open; sending mail in the post-office for some reason, to some construction company, they're making sure people know who 'owns' them, rubbing it in people's faces. Even there, I found a few staring back. Always, they're always. I could see their heads turning around each time I stare at the nearest reflection, as to feign not looking, but I know. They're predictable in some way, verbal intelligence, trying to inquire, trying to 'make-sense' out of things, especially when suspecting someone of something; filthy little shit-mongrels. Beaked fucking kike-whores; seem to be especially weary of me, since I seem to pose a threat. Every now and then, I've seen this short-kikess, trailing around. Two times I've seen her already, or three, bobbing her head up and down, pretending she's listening to music. Two different locations as well, although I've managed to get a good look of her profile view; broad, small, an Armenid sub-type, distinguishable, extremely distinguishable, especially when the nose shape and the reduced, sloping forehead is taken into account. I don't know how much they know about me, only that they've tried interacting with me in the past, even to a point where they attempted to intrude, to a degree of unsatisfactory covertness I would not indulge the over-stay of. What do they want from me?"

'Filthy fucking public display of snobbery, another one of them, fucking dumb-bimbo hook-nosed projected Kikesses, some time ago, out in the traffic, near the fucking station, a god damn rub-it-in-your-face cock-suckress's display of arrogance and pettiness, as if to show how much better she is, go-around, then the long-way over the stretch of an almost crossroads she took hippity-hoppity, cock-suckity, an alternative path, just so she could keep her distance away from me. Social distanced-dumb fucking cock-sucking kikess whore. A retarded nostril slurping dumb-cunt-melted small-headed Armenoid-whore!

We were in the station, the bus-stop, near it, waiting for the green light, for the go. I was wearing a fucking mask and she was wearing none, so I kept my distance. She must've noticed, although her obvious addiction to the online world took precedent over everything else since she barely bothered lifting her eyes away from the thin-brick her grubby-greedy rat-talons were wrapped around. Her nose was huge, it was an elongated thing that could've homed several tinier, longer noses that themselves bore tape-worm-shaped noses as well that squirmed around, with inflating nose-filled noses as well, as thick, wide and bloated as Christmas globes, for smell of gold-en stars.'

Dumb fucking broad actually took notice when it was time to go, as I happened to immediately notice, the other street being worked upon by a bunch of construction workers, half-way through the side-walk, where I simply yet actively changed the trajectory I was headed upon, having parted, twisted then aimed myself towards the front side of the street near which the side-walk ended or began from, since the working area was on my left, being a clearly defined rectangle that also was only partially 'blocked', so as to say, the cones and the net that would usually find their way there were actually not there any longer, and instead were partially picked up, then placed in a corner, as in 'let's go boys, time to wrap things up' kind of command had been given on a prior notice, to which no clear indication had been given whether or not it was permissible, as for it to otherwise signal an impeachment or breach over the social equity, which she has also noticed the half-way turn I performed, so as to be lead to think that in reality I was actively avoiding her instead of them, but, just to be clear enough, the area was partially empty of the workers, as they were a few feet away from it, digging holes, working their tractor-like machines and lifters, allowing for enough space to go-through, although the area was very much so made out of one piece, that was depressed down and at a different level than the pavement that belonged to the street, the rectangle, the bigger one this smaller one was actively ‘encompassed’ by, was worked on. She must’ve taken this as an affront of some sort, or some action that would signal the fact that the person in question, that is to say, I, was trying to avoid her, taking the ‘longer’ route instead, going around the rectangle, on the street, but, she actually, having already been a few meters in the lead, took a sudden right, turned around, entered the parking lot near one of the buildings that was under construction as well as the adjacent store near it, and the giant glass-balconied, floored, windowed residential that was somewhat, actually, it was in the middle, and the under-construction building was adjacent to it, as was the store, and the store was placed in front of the sidewalk, but they were all within the reach of a parking lot that stretched the whole span of the street as well.

‘This nasty kikess, which was a different kikess than the one I was staring at now, was a different kind of kikess than the one I’ve been obsessing over a year, and this one, whom, coincidentally I’ve been obsessing over for a different reason after meeting her inside that store. But this kikess, tried painting herself most, irksomely righteous, as if she was doing me a favor, distancing herself from my position and trajectory, as if she was trying to do something nice, or well-intended or well-thought, but in reality, I knew better than to be tricked by these filthy kike-tricks.’

Every good man is trained to spot kike-behavior and how they’re trying to gain your trust and leave an impression over you, so you could lower your guard enough for them to fuck you over later. It’s evident, from what has previously been observed, that their sub-human minds are hard-wired into adopting various, changed included, ‘strategies’ that do not serve as a reflection as to what they’re thinking. For example, a kikess might be annoyed at a person’s behavior, so much so that she would go out of her way to attempt to befriend that person as a tactic of gaining their trust, despite them holding a lot of spite, anger, dislike and similar behaviors towards the person in question. Rendering these sub-humanness, Kikesses, ratesses, untrustworthy as to discern their actual intention from the way they act in. Prolonged observation need to be put under my employ. For it is a well-known fact that kikes are a mischievous people, neurotic, mentally ill, sick, almost animal-like than human in terms of how they act. Not intelligent, but cunning, as proven time and time again. Kikes themselves often admit to this kind of behavior as well, going out and using false names, trying not to stand out or draw too much attention over them, hiring people to create ‘anti-Semitic’ incidents and what not. All of those things, referred to, in their minds as well, by their own accounts, as it’s been aforementioned, as ‘tactics’. It is an unnatural thing, it leaves one devoid of any kind of humanity. Tying in to social aggressiveness, as well as trying to communicate various things through social-signaling as well. It is not normal, under no circumstance whatsoever.

The way in which it is treated as, as well as normal behavior, in comparison to theirs, that is to say, how normal, humans act; normal human beings don’t resort to ‘tactics’ in order to get things done. It is a sign of not only inferiority, that seems to plague my mind as well, but a reassurance that the kikes cannot by any circumstance change or get rid of their racial characteristics.

‘I’m probably going to end up coming in her moist pussy.’

It’s been a few months since either this Tits-Tits said a thing and Boils, standing in front of her, thinking.

‘There’s a network of them, they keep contact with one another, acting, destroying, infesting what they can, with their Masonic Judaic rackets, driven by nepotism. It stretched inside every store, every aspect of our society, whether it’d be the media or any other outlet that can be put to their use; rats, filthy rats, rats with big asses, for some reason, since the Kikesses are as flat as boards, the mass migrated in the opposite direction. A drivel that’s hard to look at when considering the sag, up-front. Some have even managed to already infest the academia, to fund their colleges, where they connive, with the help of nepotism as well, privately funded by Zionist Organizations, to destroy the white-folk, that they hate the most, instead of doing the right thing, that being, lynching niggers. I hate them niggers, I loathe those filthy monkeys. Kikes do not belong to Europe, nor any other country, as in, alive; for the good of the world, they need to be ethnically cleansed, just so everyone can be spared of the disasters and the unnaturalness they promote as a result of their already and beyond degrading minds propel upon the easily impressionable youth they aim to corrupt on the long run. Painting themselves as the fore-front runners, leading the fight against ‘racism’, ‘hate-speech’, ‘discrimination’, etc.; when in reality these things are only tactics, made as to distract everyone else from the system of Jewish-Kike Rackets they’ve set up to steal, to commit acts of fraud, theft, robberies, acts of pedophilia in their Entertainment business, faking the Holocaust numbers so they can receive even more, up to this day, reparations, since they’re all inter-connected, they have to ensure that not a single racket can fall. If one falls over, it’d be like a domino effect. If one day a man is made believed, as to convince his fellow man that this event that didn’t happen and was no different than what happened throughout history during a time of war, is nothing more than a ploy to, and a testament to the kike-nature, then all of them will eventually fall. The kike-credibility will fall, crumbling, slowly but surely, as their control will wane. Every single time, every single country, they’ve ever lived into, which kicked them out, all’s well preserved in history, and it’s only a matter of time until their time will run up. Since every Empire that’s ever existed fell, and theirs was never an empire to begin with, there’s absolutely no chance whatsoever for it to be long-lived or them, as a race, a nation, as a people, as a bunch of sub-human mongrels whom preserved big bottom lips, swarthinness, big-wide-eyes, hook-noses, Armenoid-like skull shapes and features that seem to be extremely awkward when seen from the side, not to mention their general neuroticism as well as their racial characteristics, in the same way niggers act, when they commit a lot of crime, since they’re more violent than other races, in the same manner so are Kikes, yet instead of violence that would actually happen to be, exploititiveness, trying to even contort the ideas of racialism since, as it happens they’re easy to stop, therefore, they would have a hard time trying to infiltrate and destroy, causing a lot of damage in their eternal quest to destroy the Western Nation as well as every other non-racially-bastardized nation they could never prosper or rule over. Kike-intelligence is a myth, easily disproven, and their ‘achievements’, for some ‘reason’, magically appeared during the nineteen and the twentieth centuries, and just as soon they stopped. No more kike-ivy league, no more ‘innovations’ in physics or any other field, only a simple, ‘poof’, all gone. As if never existed; strange; they moved away from that racket once they found it profitable no longer, moving onto new avenues where their grubby, filthy hands can destroy and contort everything, indeed.’

While they were talking, a giant almost humanoid creature with an elongated building-cubical chest-in the general shape of a swimming board that bore a lot of growths attached and coming out of it, lodged onto it as if they were barnacles and it a ship drowned into the Mariana’s gulf, whose head was a giant grub-contortion in the general growth out of this fat-long torso, set-in twist that, at its end bore a gas-mask but flatter and without the eye-protectors, not that it bore many features, since they were tinier and were as tiny as men’s pores as well as the features, that would at times elongated as well, like squirming worms spitting acid pus in the air as well as carrion and other kinds of birds that would spit out lynch-nigger ropes as well, appeared to have its arms completely forming two great serpentine spreads of wing-cut-origami-like-folded after, but with spheres jolting up and down, flying- coating-shield- with zigzagged ended zippers that could form rounded-cup holding like protectors. Like leather wings but with wooden coat-hangers making them gliders of some kind, but segmented like scorpion tails, flaps-or-sheets of some weird material that would bear spherical devices between one another as well as the wooden supports that were lodged in the material itself. They were like paper-sheet-parchments that had been unrolled then cut as their ends, then awkwardly folded as to be intertwined or hybridized with the spherical devices they were attached to, coming out of the 'arm' stumps that came out of the strange chest, as some sort of almost many sheeted whip-formation. Both legs were humanesque, although crudely placed, squatting as well as the left one being wider, having the leather strips attached or the ropes of a balloon of some kind as well as a giant peg-rounded at the top hump placed on a many structured thing with appendages that were sharp and down-pointing, kind of like a lid-wearing or bottle cap on top of it, on which stood the hump-hill, platform. Off the side of its belly, a giant, as if water-shot out of it, clotted formation with a giant rose-bud twisted head, that also had two 'arms', that were dark power-lines-tools that had all of the lines attached to every part of its body, being constantly shot, then released, then withdrawn back in, grappling-hook like, through which strange body-bagged figure-maggots would slowly make their way inside of it, reveling, once it's had enough, an opening, around its mask, that could barely be seen from the distance unless aroused by some of the off-ground beings that by now devoured some of the grounds and people on them. It leaped too fast in the air, thumping down, then charged on a plain downward set trajectory as if he was a dark set in flight, crushing into a mountain, only to have it completely shattered, twisting around, since out its swoon had the impact awakened it, before shooting to its left, as a rolling barrel's ballerina's pirouette, stopped, turned up-front as it was met by one of the burnt-out by one of the incendiary GOV-driven cement-drivel of fire-napalm strike-order of eighteen hundred consecutive days, having done enough, it began running some of the barely grown out of their sockets, on his left's side, the charge having set-him up-front, past through, on cue, running over the spared part of the forest as he turned on a scythe's cut, rolling as if on his back in a pile of hay but in the air, while maintaining himself still, levitating but frozen solid, still squatting in the air, when turned onto the ground, acted upon by the unseen hands working on a marionette, when finally, front-shot as he was, quickly, the fiend found itself delivered upon a platform of most peculiar, trees-kept in baskets, which deformed, as they melted into a most peculiar wooden-shrapnel filled, with ships and soldiers as well as melted wild acorns and leaves, peculiar chemical mixes that began twisting everything in terms of color, having given life to a miasma of winded clutches and other unnatural things as well, that, were on the side of the street, from which it return, carrying the platform that was now lodged in its chest, like a busy-bodied waiter whom was desperately trying not to spoil or ruin the night by tripping on top his squatting, although peculiar, this being the custom, clumsiness, that could possibly serve as the infamy-led-to-belief-breach in equity that's longed by the common man as to be avoided. For some reason, this as well as the many put together soups that were given birth by the most atrociously given life onto, with spoils of breaths, chemicals that began, slowly-yet progressively becoming even more virulent as they would attempt to still themselves, since this destructive rage was only given life onto, as to be triggered by the mere existence of this bimbo-kikess by the name of Tits-tits, it held a particular angst and hatred towards, for some unknown and unspoken of reason. Non-human entities appear to hold a particular resentment towards one another, that's hardly a thing to be denied by many.

‘Why do they do that? Why did she avoid me? Why do they have to treat me differently? I wish I was treated the same as everyone else, I wish I was left alone and ignored. I wish they didn’t have to ‘react’ to what I do, for, as long as that happens, I will not stop, and I will never stop hating them. I can’t help it otherwise, I can’t help myself. It bothers me, a lot.

I’d be a hypocrite to complain at this point in time, especially since I’ve tried asking for help as well, when I hit a rough patch in life. Anything but to be out there and I still failed. I deserve this. It is this type of behavior that got the kikes kicked out and hated by everyone else.

And it doesn’t feel right.’

A few dire-in-need of being heard, some echoes misplaced, there in dirt, were they in call of shine. But not a single blind could have them going.

‘It must’ve been a psychological trick. She must’ve been aware of me staring at her for the past few five or six minutes or so, trying to get an accurate estimate of her head breadth, skull shape and nose size. She had to. It is a psychological subtlety in terms of manipulation that was put to her employ. While my trajectory had been set on a perpendicular but on an isosceles kind of curve, towards that worked-upon side of the street, I believe I saw, as it was being projected into the tail of my eye, that, she cocked her head in my direction; my sudden change in terms of a general route, as did hers afterwards had been noted by her, it must’ve served as a reason for avoiding me. Why would she go out of her way to go around and end up behind me? Since we were headed, after all, in the same direction? I began, soon enough, after crossing the street again, to run as fast as possible, to see whether or not she would follow me, but as it turned out, I had not been followed, nor had she caught up with me afterwards. A strange occurrence indeed, as this Whorish Seductress, of a beakish type, simply vanished out of existence, no longer present in my current thought. I am left most confused as to what happened.’

It all makes sense now, it all makes sense. It all makes sense.

‘I’ve yet to ascertain the precise reason behind my reprimand as to my previously displayed behavior in terms of how I treated the people whom I had previously or who are the ones who came into contact with me, for reasons I cannot explain, regardless of vigorous assertions, sessions of poured into ruminations, petty self-promoted lapses as to attempt to bury them before another chance for either of them to resurface could facilitate their re-entry into my immediate awareness or solicitude as to feign any guilt or sign of remorse, to which I hold no resentment towards since I’ve come to accept the things that only come naturally to me as being yet endowed by the natural order who so-far dictated by every action, in spite of various attempts come from my environment, I’ve reached the sole conclusion that it is because of them, that I find myself in the same place, relinquishing in the little hope I have left that eventually, I shall manage to get back at them, by one means or another, for this unnatural ‘‘gift’’ of inferiority I have inherited from their blood, that I am forced to live with, that I am constantly being reminded of with every single passing day of exposure to other people, to their ever-burdensome weary looks I’m forced to be content with, for being reminded that I am offered little to no choice, as for what I’ve done, am doing and will continue doing, expressing it in as vigorous a manner, barring myself from entering any other country, place of refuge or any other place as a result of an ‘adversary’ reaction to my beliefs, for that I am left with nothing other than brooding, tirelessly, in locked solidarity, left alone, for the time being, to my own devices, an inmate kept under solitary confinement, having failed to adapt or assimilate as opposed to my fairer skinned, more prone as to adhere to connivery in an outwardly displayed manner, counterparts, who are the scum of this very plane of existence I live in; in this Eastern-European country where their very well-known as well as document, historically speaking - ways of modern-usury are being prompted, planned, and executed in an attempt to destroy it, from inside-out. My cursed blood allows me the certainty of seeing them, recognizing them by their features as well as by their types, to a margin of error that's insignificant, therefore easily dismissible. I am aware of their existence and they, themselves, in their turn are aware of mine as well, which in turn lends me to believe that I am under attack, a most divisive, conniving thing that is only befittingly evident, as to it being propagated by them. It's come to my awareness that they are displaying their violent niggardish tendencies outwardly, towards me, as a sign of warning, of some kind. I've seen it all happen time after time again. They are trying to exterminate me, but I need to exterminate them before they exterminate me! I have to exterminate the Jews!

First, I must garner people's voices, so as to enmesh my strategically emplaced plots out of their grubby noses's reach. It would be as if my appeal to the populous will have graced me with the liberty of doing with them as I please, enamoring me in a shell of most-sublime veil of encroaching the outer reaches of the common law the normal man is incapable of even pondering let alone hope to twist, contort and manipulate to one's pleasing, as to get away with ethnically slaughtering them.'

But in order to do so, hmm.

Beheading a kike wasn't going to be any easier than dissecting a nigger, since there are many things that are in need of being taken into account before any further, progression could be taken in terms of trying to cultivate enough strength of will, blocking the inhibitors that are preponderant in terms of responding to an outright similitude of an ounce of the odorous scent their wretched unwashed, hobble-bodies produce, especially when the specimens or one select, one of the selected few that are carefully rigged, testing the waters as one might try prodding a cattle's sphincter with a hot-iron poker in order to see the full extent of their pain pressuralization, compression of pain-nerves as well as the other, barely taken into account inner-workings in regards of trying to curb their breakings, so happens to be a kikess whose nasty-smelling scent as well as general unappealing fridge-sque bodily contortion, as for her uneven anatomical composition being thoroughly defined as being something near-nigh, in terms of closeness or relatedness to a beaked niggardous fiend, whose physiological despondencies are utterly adherent to a shared-common, relatively recent, ancestor, whose subhumanity rears its ugly head in, that no amount of surgeries, done by well worked-plastician hands, well-done jobs, well-made fingers, tiny finger-tipped buds, a little wriggle, a little cut, a little in-between but, he can't hide that, he can't worked on the clock removing all those sprouting hook-noses they're so ashamed of having, such inferiority self-accepted by them, especially by the women who'd have themselves butchered for mimicry, means acceptance, acceptance that they are inferior and that the people of European stock they're so desperate to be more-like are superior to them, whether they admit it or not, and they won't, it's self-evident by their acts alone, by how desperate they are to remove their hooked noses, their ugly guttural-feeling producing, outwardly disgustingly wretched filaments, these superficial but filled with dark cartilage, beings of their own they're trying to shove deeper and deeper into their skulls, into their bodies, into their hearts as well as into the gap, the empty egg-shell left behind that's in need of being filled, lack of soul, cracked-open, filled with, whereas a human would, under normal circumstances have an ardent, oozing hope-filled, puffing with energy, glowing symbol of hope as well as his own being, theirs is filled with noses, many, many, many, many, many, many, many, many, uglily-contorted self-devouring hooked-noses, wrapped around one another

